Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. John A. Powell went insane at Findley, Ohio, because a book which he had written met no sale.

SINCE Talmage's last sermon, announcing that "religion is dead," his antics in the pulpit are fully explained. He is only waking the corpse.

IF the Jews in Germany had been sound, thoroughgoing imperialists instead of the incorrigible liberals that they are, would Court Preacher Stocker be so hot against them?

TALMAGE reported to his congregation recently, as the result of his observation on a recent trip of 2,000 miles in the country, that "religion is dead." What sort of company does the Tabernacle preacher keep on his travels?

WHILE Mrs. Jessie Martin, of Hampshire, was coming out of church she slipped upon the icy steps and broke her leg. This should be an all-sufficient warning to people who will insist upon going to church on Sunday instead of going skating.

IT is whispered in Vatican circles that Leo XIII. intends to resume quietly and by degrees the state ceremonies of the Pontifical Court as they were celebrated eleven years ago, even to going down into St. Peter's and reviving the splendid ceremonies in that famous basilica.

THE "Aurora," the Pope's organ, announces that two hundred yards outside the gate of San Pancrazio a priest has discovered a new catacomb, with various galleries, and containing twelve chapels, the greater part of which are adorned with paintings admirably preserved. The new catacomb extends from San Pancrazio to the Villa Pamfily-Doria.

A BUG has turned up in Asia Minor which feeds upon the eggs of the locust. Where a cluster of locust eggs is examined the destroying insect appears in the midst of them. Locusts from time immemorial hav made themselvs disliked in Asia, and the new bug, which is believed to deposit its eggs in the live locust's body, has general sympathy and encouragement.

FOR the great cathedral at Melbourne an anonymous gift of $50,000 has been made. If the money that has been thus foolishly lavished in building up the grossest error and fraud the world has known could hav been used in the dissemination of real knowledge, and in providing for the comfort of the poor and homeless, how much better the world would be to-day!

MR. FROUDE is about to be anticipated by Mr. F. Martin in the promised biography of Carlyle. There is no averment that the author of the "Statesmen's Year Book" has gone into the merits of Carlyle's life with the same care as the author of the life of Cesar would be sure to go, but he has collected a multitude of facts, and is qualified by previous training to arrange them in a systematic and effectiv way.

A LOT of reverends of Brooklyn are accusing the Rev. Mr. Talmage of the same godly city of lying and perjury, and, what is worse, they are proving it, too. It is a pity to see Presbyterian clergymen show such animosity toward each other, and that they should be guilty of such crimes. Verily, verily, if all the bad deeds of these "men of God" could be shown up, what a monstrously large and monstrously black record it would all make!

IN the municipal cremation furnace at Gotha, in Germany, you can get yourself incinerated for $16. Since the establishment of the furnace, two years ago, thirty bodies of the nobility and gentry hav enjoyed its hospitality. Persons, progressiv but poor, who are prejudiced against interment should go to Gotha while they can still call their souls their own, since the German railroads charge high rates for the carriage of earthly tabernacles from which the spirit has flown.

ONE of the advantages pertaining to the new method of engraving by electricity—an electric spark pen having been invented for the purpose in Paris—is that the artist does all parts of his work, and with no more trouble than if working with an ordinary pencil, and can even operate in a dark room, without any other light than the glare from the induction spark. If a sheet of thin paper be attached to a plate of copper or zinc, it is said that an engraving may be made with extraordinary facility by this device.

THE Disciples' church in Louisville, Ky., tried to make a creed which would suit all the members. They found it impossible to agree either theologically or otherwise. Theological discord grew into pugnacity, and at the latest accounts the business of creed-making had reached a point at which the pastor and his adherents, comprising about one-third of the church-members, were excluded by the rest. Those who remained are said to contemplate leaving the creed business where it is, in order to avoid any more unpleasantness.

WHILE the unrecognized religious orders in France hav been dispersed, the recognized ones are threatened with the loss of all their privileges. Bills now pending in the Chamber propose to oust them from sites or buildings belonging to the state, and to abolish their exemption from direct taxes. A circular has also been issued by the taxing department giving instructions that convents and monasteries carrying on any kind of labor shall henceforth be subject to trade licenses, no matter though the receipts be appropriated to charitable objects.

IT took an informer, a warrant of seizure, four United States marshals, several lookouts, and a horse, truck, and driver to arrest a wretched, poverty-stricken German in an east-side tenement house in this city, who, after being out of work for weeks, took to making cheap cigars without a license in order to keep a wife and three sick children from perishing by famin. The value of the 364 cigars seized is about six dollars. The colossal malefactor was trapped, red or rather brown-handed, at his nefarious work, and now lies in jail to await the action of the grand jury.

MR. SEEBOHM, a recent traveler in Siberia, says that "birds go to the Arctic regions to breed, not by thousands, but by millions." And he tells us that the cause of this migration is the search after food, which is there provided for them with lavish prodigality. "Seed or fruit eating birds find an immediate and abundant supply of cranberries, crowberries, and other ground fruit, which hav remained frozen during the long winter, and are accessible the moment the snow has melted; while insect eating birds hav only to open their mouths to fill them with musketoes."

THE attempt to introduce an organ into the Presbyterian church at Toronto gave rise to a violent row. The question of instrumental music in the worship has been discussed for years, and recently a majority of the session voted to permit the use of a small cabinet organ in the weekly singing-school in the basement only. The opponents of the measure regarded this as the beginning of an abomination which would next be carried into the Sunday services, and the older members became greatly excited. Bro. McMichael, the chorister, ordered the organ sent to the church, but when it arrived the sexton refused to open the door, and several young men carried it in surreptitiously by a back way. The music circle met that evening. The Rev. Mr. Kirkpatrick occupied the chair, and made a short address to the effect that even an organ might be sanctfied for religious purposes. Then the practice of a psalm for the ensuing Sunday was begun, with an organ accompaniment. Only a single verse had been sung when the venerable brother Bain, a trustee, entered at the head of a party of anti-instrument men, and ordered them to carry out the organ. The young men of the circle rushed forward, and a scrimmage ensued; but the old men were stalwarts, and the organ was thrown into the street.

AT Belleman, near Reading, Pa., was laid the scene of a holy fight. Great excitement spread over the surrounding country. In the village aforesaid is a church which has been jointly occupied by two different denominations, but for worshiping the same unknown God. The rival denominations were Lutheran and Reformed Dutch. Their zeal in fighting the devil is surpassed by their ardor in fighting each other. A recent letter from Reading to one of our dailies give the following statement: The Rev. B. D. Sweizig is the Lutheran pastor, and the Rev. R. S. Apple is the pastor of the Reformed body. Some months ago there was a difficulty between the two congregations, but the trouble was amicably adjusted. Now there is a split in the Reformed congregation, owing to the pastoral relations of the Rev. Mr. Apple with the church. The congregation has divided into Apple and anti-Apple parties. Some weeks ago there was an election to determin whether Mr. Apple should continue as pastor, and it resulted in eighty-two votes being cast against him and only three votes for him. At that time Constable Kraemer, of this city, was deputized by Sheriff Kemp, and he was present at the election, which passed off quietly. Yesterday was the first time since the election that the Reformed congregation were to hold regular services, and the anti-Apple party were determined that those services should not be held if the old pastor was to preach. Representativs of both factions were in Reading on Saturday. The latter party engaged Constable Jno. M. Sharp and Sergeant Ressler of the city police to preserve order. The officers left this city on Saturday evening, and took the train for Leesport, about eight miles from Reading. They found several officers of the church waiting for them at the station, whence they were rapidly driven across the country, a distance of about six miles, to the church. Sergeant Ressler, who arrived here to-night, givs the following facts: "We were driven to a building that was formerly used as a schoolhouse. We found that the church building was in possession of the anti-Apple party, who had stationed a guard on duty for the night. There were three of these guards, who were relieved every few hours. About a mile and a half from the church building we saw bright lights burning in the windows of a farm residence, and we were told it was the headquarters of the Apple party. The rain came down in torrents. Services were to begin at ten o'clock. At about nine o'clock Sheriff Kemp and a squad of deputies arrived on the scene. The officers say that the Rev. Mr. Apple's friends were in the majority. In all, over four hundred persons were in attendance. They were aroused to the greatest excitement. The members of the party opposed to Mr. Apple had placed their men at the door of the church, tightly wedging them in so that no one could effect an entrance. The anti-Apple party hav engaged lawyer Becker as their attorney. By noon the Rev. Mr. Apple arrived upon the scene. He was soon surrounded by his friends, and began to use harsh words, which soon led to blows. The fight was kept up until the sheriff was compelled by force to quiet the riot. After the excitement had subsided everything was in confusion. Benches, chairs, Bibles, hymn-books, and other articles used in the melee, were strewn around the church. Fortunately no serious injuries were inflicted. The sheriff, with his deputies, then left the scene, and the crowd soon dispersed." This afternoon word was received from Belleman that the trouble had been renewed and twenty of the anti-Apple members arrested and held for trial for being engaged in the affair of yesterday. More arrests are to be made to-morrow.

ON account of the troubles in Ireland, the British Parliament has been called together a month earlier than usual. Not only are the prospects of a favorable settlement of the land trouble poorer than ever, but the agitation is spreading into England, and English farmers talk seriously of seeking relief from the curse of landlordism.

Sunday Lessons and Musings.

Constructiv Liberalism.

LESSON I.

Agnosticism is not Atheism, but the negativ side of the scientific affirmation of, and resignation to, the Infinit as the basis of Scientific Cosmology.

TEXTS.

N. B.—It would be well if the following texts could not only be committed to memory, but "learned by heart."

THE HINDOO SKEPTIC.

I think till I weary with thinking,
Said the sad-eyed Hindoo King,
And I see but shadows around me—
Illusion in everything.

How knowest thou aught of God,
Of his favor or his wrath?
Can the little fish tell what the lion thinks?
Or map out the eagle's path?

Can the finite the infinit reach?
Did the blind discover the stars?
Is the thought that I think a thought,
Or a throb of the brain in its bars?

For aught that my eye can discern,
Your God is what you think good,
Yourself flashed back from the glass,
When the light pours on it in flood,

You preach to me to be just;
And this is his realm you say,
And the good are dying of hunger,
And the bad gorge every day.

You say that he loveth mercy,
And the famin is not yet gone;
That he hateth the shedder of blood,
And he slayeth every one.

You say that my soul shall liv,
That the spirit can never die—
If he were content when I was not,
Why not when I hav passed by?

You say I must hav a meaning;
So must dung, and its meaning is flowers.
What if our souls are but nurture
For lives that are greater than ours?

When the fish swims out of the water,
When the bird soars out of the blue,
Man's thought may transcend man's knowledge,
And your God be no reflex of you.

Evolution is a change from an indefinit and incoherent homogeneity to a definit coherent heterogeneity, through continuous differentiations and integrations. (H. Spencer, First Principles, p. 216).

The extent of the difference and subordination of convergent parts is the measure of the progress of the organism, or organization. (Goethe.)

Ist's denn so grosses Geheimniss, was Gott und der Mensch und die Welt sey?
Nein! Doch niemand hort's gerne; da bleibt es geheim.

Is it then so great a secret what God and the World and Man may be?
No! But no one is willing to hear it, so it a secret remains.
—GOETHE.

INTRODUCTION.

Politics are fate, said Napoleon, and he told the poets to base their tragedies upon the catastrophies which his "destiny" made the uncontrolable power of his modern world,

Finance is our fate—as yet, but is not, let us hope, always to be the capricious, inhuman power by which we liv or die, as the golden God, without moral law or right, crushes us to earth in poverty, or lifts us to affluence, and therefore to honor and happiness among our fellows.

This God has condemned to Sunday banishment in rural solitude one formerly accustomed to speak to his fellow-inquirers on that day of the more serious matters of law and life.

To lament this absence, or, like Ovid at Tomi, to send back Tristia to absent friends, would not avail or serve. Let us rather become present to each other in spirit and review and muse over the lessons we sought to learn when younger years and hopes were ours. In that way many who now, alas! can liv and be with us only in our heart may still giv us their love and cheering co-operation.

What, then, were the first words we found it necessary to learn as the beginning of a new life which should be Liberal, scientific, and constructiv?

They were these:

1. Resignation as to the unknowable Infinit.
2. Trust in Law as the basis of life and the solution of the world.
3. Courage, faith, and labor in and for the progress and triumph of Humanity.

Let us take the first word as our subject for to-day.

Resignation (Entsagung, or the saying of ourselvs away, is Goethe's word for it) must be the first lesson. We can learn its meaning, in rudimentary forms at least, in every age. The Stoic Emperor Antoninus taught it as well as the ideal Christ of Palestine nor less Goethe, "the soul of his century," in modern times. But it has lately come to us afresh as the "Light of Asia" in the beautiful poem of that name by Edwin Arnold. Those crowded, toiling millions of Asia hav suffered most, and so hav learned to resign themselvs as none others hav or can.

They learned to feel delight in annihilation, in the idea of absorption into the Infinit, when life, "like the dew-drop, slips into the shining sea." That is the acme of the enthusiasm of resignation. From a similar view the little poem, "The Hindoo Skeptic," printed above, is inexpressably sweet and of permanent value. Let it be "learned by heart" and kept in the heart, as that good old Anglo-Saxon phrase, learning by heart, implies. Those verses echo the fathomless sea of sorrow, sadness, and contradiction which has always underlain human life, and from which a noble resignation in the conception of the infinit, and rest upon a world of law about us, is the only escape or relief.

Our modern science has certainly and happily brought us much more than this conception of resignation—but this it has brought too, and has enforced and justified it in a new light so as to enable it to stay evermore. Omnia exeunt in mysterium. All things go out into mystery, said the old theologian. But, properly speaking, there is no mystery. Nothing is mewed or sealed up by a God, as that word means. There is simply a limit to human capacity to find out and understand, that is all.

All things go out into the Infinit, say the modern scientists. And before that fact and the conception of the infinit we can only bow in silent reverence.

The Infinit is a modern discovery that takes the place of the old universe. There was once, before the Copernican astronomy, a supposed universe; i. e., a world revolving on itself, with a personal God outside of it to rotate and govern it, and who therefore created it. That world, and the whole conception it expressed, has passed and vanished before the new astronomy. That universe and all of the gods and ideas based upon it hav vanished because of the modern and true conception of the Infinit, and "like the baseless fabric of a vision, hav left not a wrack behind." "The infinity of worlds and of space," as the martyr Giordano Bruno taught it, has finally taken their place. (See Draper's "Conflict," Theology-Weaving.) The questions of firmaments, spheres, cycles, epicycles, and gods hav disappeared and become past issues. Those who now discuss Theism or Atheism are as far behind the age as those who discuss antipodes and the four corners of the earth.

Negativly, therefore, scientists are Agnostics (from the Greek a, not, and gnosco, I know). That is, they recognize that the old Ptolemaic system, which was the origin and basis of a personal God and of all theology, is gone, and that its childish notions of a universe and of gods cannot be properly affirmed of the Infinit. They do not know how any one can know infinity, nor how the assumption that it is a person, or this or that, can be affirmed of it without illusion or fraud, or blasphemy, or all of these three combined. But has not this Agnosticism an affirmativ side?

Look at the laws of evolution and progress which are given above as our texts from Herbert Spencer and Goethe. We learn at once from these the all-important law that all analysis, all differentiation, all negations, must always be the result of a higher and more comprehensiv synthesis, integration, and affirmation. Things are loosened asunder only because a higher combination calls for them. When, therefore, we see things, creeds, theories, and beliefs going to pieces we must not run around howling, as the theologians do, and cry that all society and everything and everybody are going to chaos and destruction. They thereby simply prove that they are "blind leaders of the blind," wholly incapable of reading the signs of the times as their ideal Master taught them to do. Instead of flying backward we must look forward into the bearings of events, and follow the higher law of combination, that is, the new integration, which has really brought about the dissolution of the old, and that will certainly let us fall unless we clamber up upon the new.

The great policy of practical safety is this recognition of new integrations. That is the true law at once of reform and of all true conservatism. We shall see in our future lessons that we hav in this law of integration the ever-ready key, the philosopher's stone, the compass, the true means of observation by which the latitude and longitude of human life, social and individual, may be calculated and its safer conduct secured.

Now, when we apply this chief of the laws to Agnosticism we find that it is miscalled, because it is the negativ expression of the highest possible affirmation and integration man can know of the infinit world about him. Negativly it knows no personal God, because affirmativly science has discovered that there is no conceivable limit to space or time, matter, or force, using the term force as a synthesis of the changes of matter. This affirmation of the Infinit excludes limit or vacuum. It is the highest integration conceivable. Within its boundless ocean of existence, as we conceive it, floats our little knowable world or Cosmos, with its suns and galaxies, and our solar system as our center in space.

The first lesson of resignation before the infinit world, the first lesson of constructiv Liberalism or Positivism, is, therefore, in the highest degree affirmativ. It affirms the infinit, and lets fall into a limbo of vanity the vain imaginations and the unverifiable notions of theology, which science does not and can not affirm. Agnostics could be named more truly from the affirmativ side Infin-itists in distinction from Finitists, Personalists, and all Anthropomorphists.

Hereafter we shall see that self and selfishness, here and hereafter, really depend upon and are caused by this personal contradiction of the Infinit to an extent few of us as yet apprehend.

It is a sufficient point for this lesson to show that Agnosticism is but a negativ name given by those who only look behind them when standing before the greatest affirmation of all of the ages. The Infinit is the necessary affirmativ basis of a Cosmos knowable to us by laws; that all laws of science suppose this infinit, and our modern world can not be conceived as existing without it. For instance, if the law of gravity operated in a finite world all its matter would long ago hav gravitated to a common center and hav existence only in the eternal equilibrium of death. Every other law has its similar necessity of infinit background. So, too, the human mind never could exist in perfect liberty without this conception of an infinit world of time, space, force, matter, and law about it as a boundless field of thought and feeling. A limit would otherwise be felt by the soul, which would make our pent-up life a prison term.

The Infinit is not, therefore, a negativ conception only, but the great affirmation upon which all which we can conceive must be thought of as resting. It is the necessary back-log of existence and practically the most useful thing or conception of all. Before it science lights the fire whose light and warmth banishes the ghosts, bogies, and hobgoblins of theology, and at the same time givs life, knowledge, and comfort to those who learn to know its value.

What, then, is the proper order of the affirmativ conceptions or steps from the infinit down to man?

What is the new cosmology which science has given to us in place of the old?

Let us follow its steps:

1. The most general conception of an Infinit existence about us, and wheih includes all we can know, is commonly and properly called by the Anglo-Saxon name, "THE WORLD." This word means by its root age or endurance, the old, the age unending, that "which endureth forever." It is a term at once simple and true, and either it or the term "THE INFINIT" should take the place in use of the scientifically false word "universe," which will always keep us tangled up with the false Ptolemaic astronomy and the Christian theology, which is at bottom merely a corollary of it.

2. Within this infinit world floats the starry space or the starry world, which we commonly and properly call by the Greek word, "THE COSMOS," i. e., the beautiful order. This is the knowable world to man.

3. Through this cosmos our sun-world floats and moves, and has its own wondrous laws by which we conceive of it as a whole, our solar system.

4. The next step is down to our own little planet, the Earth, with its moon and world of tides, motions, and laws. It is hardly poetry to think of Hertha (the hearth as "The Mother of all; the Mother and the nurse." Between the earth and the Infinit lies the sublimest of sciences, astronomy, which describes for us the knowable celestial cosmos, as its Greek etymology teaches, i. e., aster, a star, and nomos, a law.

5. As we alight upon the earth we are interested in the nature of the objects which are the forms of matter in mass. This study we call natural philosophy or physics, from the Greek word physis, nature.

6. We next pursue the component parts or the elements of these objects in mass as far as we can (about 67 of them) and learn their properties, and call that science chemistry, a word having its root and idea in the Greek words chymos, juice, from cheo, pour.

7. Among the chemically compound substances found on the earth exists one, the most wonderful of all (and changing into many forms and variations) to which is given the Greek name protoplasm (protoplasma, the first formation or substance of life). This is the most wonderful of substances because it possesses the property of internal change and action, i. e., the process we call life. We do not know that life does or can exist, or where or when or how, except as a property of this kind of culloid or jelly-form matter.

a. The simpler forms of this matter are found in the lower forms of living organisms, called monera or protists.

b. Out of these protists arise the almost numberless species of vegetation, including all plants, trees, etc., and also from the same source are evolved:

c. The species of animal life leading up to the anthropoids, and terminating in man.

8. The next step is the Society of man, the sociology of Humanity. Man arose out of the brutal state by gregarious and associativ habits. He has never been able to exist except as a part of a society of some kind.

Sociology is therefore the great human science or history of Humanity as a whole.

In this Humanity as a whole each people and nation or state must find its origin and its true place.

Each individual has his origin, duty, and place in his people, nation, and state, and is controled or influenced by their laws and customs, i. e., MORALS, under which he is born. These he must practice with more or less concurrence with others or he cannot liv in society at all.

Morality is, therefore, the next science, and is inevitably deduced from sociology.

10. Next follows Language, or LINGUISTICS, the common instruments of feelings and thought.

11. The next step or science may be called ESTHETICS (from the Greek aisthanomi, I feel).

For the individual man is composed of emotions summed up by a figure of speech as if located in the Heart, from whence we are told "are the issues of life."

12. Psychology, including Logic, would follow as the next science, for feelings result in thought commonly located in the Head.

13. Then comes action or Practical Life, the next and last step, because it is the result of thought. It may be said to be located as the Hand.

This order of the sciences makes them the thirteen steps of the modern golden ladder which reaches from the simplest act or thought of every individual upward to the Infinit. Each science is a round or step by which that ladder is let down to us in a regular series of correlation of the forces.

The solution of the World about us which they giv is the Positiv Philosophy. It is the cosmology of science and of Liberalism. Every religion rests at bottom upon its cosmology. Theology is weak now simply because its cosmology has failed. It is becoming known that there is neither firmament nor universe nor a creator possible in an Infinit World.

The cosmology of science, as above sketched, must take the place of the old childlike, and now childish, story of Moses and Ptolemy, and be made familiar to every Liberal mind. Before its conceptions of the Infinit and of the beautiful order of the Cosmos, with its sciences as circles of knowledge ever descending down to Man, he can never stand without the deepest feeling of awe, reverence, and noble resignation.

This is the new Cosmology, and the first lesson which it not only teaches but, as we shall find hereafter, inspires.

Our next lesson will be the Trust in Law.

Report of a Debate

BETWEEN THE REV. A. HATCHARD AND MRS. ANNIE BESANT, AT THE HALL OF SCIENCE, LONDON.

Some few weeks ago, when Mrs. Besant was lecturing at the Phœnix Hall for the East London Branch of the National Secular Society, a challenge was offered to her by a church of England clergyman, the Rev. A. Hatchard, to debate "The Existence of God." This challenge was at once accepted by Mrs. Besant through Mr. Haines, a most earnest East London Freethinker. The reverend gentleman then wrote, asking that Mrs. Besant would change the question, substituting for a two nights' debate the propositions: "That the Jesus of the Gospels is a Historical Character," to be opened by the Rev. A. Hatchard; and "That the Influence of Christianity upon the World has been Injurious," to be opened by Mrs. Besant. Mrs. Besant accepted this change, and the debate on the first proposition took place on Wednesday, November 24th, before a large audience. The chair was very impartially filled by Mr. Turpin, one of the official representativs of the Christian Evidence Society. The Rev. A. Hatchard is curate of St. Savior's, Shadwell, and has been a curate in the diocese of Manchester. His opening speech was his best, but in making this he seemed to hav exhausted his store of arguments, and his later speeches were not always in good taste. It is possible that Mr. Hatchard may not be used to oral discussion, and may hav, therefore, been occasionally hasty in some of his expressions. In one instance, where the reverend gentleman presumed that his antagonist and his audience were equally unacquainted with German literature, he was simply clumsy. To treat the translator of Buchner with Buchner's approval and indorsement as if possibly unfamiliar with Buchner's language was worse than pointless, and scarcely served to gain favor with his auditory, who sharply expressed disapproval. It is a pity that the whole of the audience could not keep perfectly quiet when words of an unpleasant and irritating kind are spoken, although we are obliged to record that a good deal of provocation was given by Mr. Hatchard. Mrs. Besant's speeches must tell their own tale; but we may say that we never heard her to greater advantage, and the ringing applause and waving of handkerchiefs at the conclusion of her last quarter of an hour were full evidence as to the effect she had produced upon the audience.

THE DEBATE.—FIRST NIGHT.

PROPOSITION: That the Jesus of the gospels is a historical character.

Mr. Turpin in the chair.

The chairman in opening the proceedings stated that he had expected his friend Mr. Cowper would hav taken the chair that evening, and that Mr. Cowper not being able to be present, another gentleman had been named; but he also was unable to preside, so that the lot had fallen upon him. It was, however, not the first time he had taken the chair in the Hall of Science, but he was pleased to see that since he had last occupied that post there a change had taken place in the Materialism of the hall, and he hoped that in course of time a change might also be effected in the Spiritualism of the hall likewise. He hoped that they would allow him to sit still, by listening quietly and without interruption to both the speakers in the ensuing debate. The Rev. A. Hatchard was to contend that the Jesus of the gospels was a historical character, and Mrs. Besant would contend that he could not occupy that position. The order of the debate would be as follows: The Rev. A. Hatchard would open in the affirmativ, occupying half an hour; Mrs. Besant would then follow in the negativ, occupying another half hour. There would then be four speeches of a quarter of an hour each, two from each speaker; and Mr. Hatchard would close the debate with another speech of a quarter of an hour's duration. He concluded by asking for a fair hearing for both sides of the argument, which, he said, was better for the subject, better for the debater, and better for the audience; and he trusted that the dignity and character of the disputants and of the audience would be such that that debate might be looked back upon in the future as a model debate. He then called upon the Rev. A. Hatchard to open in the affirmativ.

Mr. Hatchard, who was greeted with applause, then rose and said:

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Bradlaugh, Ladies, and Gentlemen: I stand before you here this evening to prove that the Jesus of the gospels is a historical character. Now I can well understand that some persons may think that a superfluous task in the present day, but as there are those on the present platform who question it, it may be necessary for me to go through some of the evidence by which we prove this matter. But as it is utterly impossible to make a jump in the mind from now to more than eighteen hundred years ago, so to speak, I do not intend to ask you to make what I call a jump from now to the time when Christ was born. I intend to take you back by what is called the bridge of history, the bridge of history over the gulf of time.

Now here is an ordinary English copy of the scriptures. I put that in the hands of a man, and he looks at it and examins it. After this examination he says, "I see here an account of an extraordinary character, but how do I know that this is a true account? and how do I know that these books really come down from the time you say they come down from?"

Now you know very well what the authorized English Bible is, and you find that the same Bibles are in the hands of Christian sects all over the world, for between the Roman Catholic Bible and the English Protestant Bible there is really no difference. Here we hav the church of England and the Roman Catholic church, and a large number of bodies of Dissenters, of Independents, Baptists, Wesleyans, and many other sects or parties, who all accept the same book. Well, now you see that this is the fact that the Christian world receives that book to-day.

We may make a jump right back from now certainly to the time of Mohammed, who believed in the historical existence of Jesus, and we may make another jump backward to the fourth century. Now, you may ask me how do I prove that the Bible was not altered during those centuries, and my answer is that the Bible we hav is the same as the book was at the invention of printing, as you may see by the Bibles which are now in the British Museum. Now, you are well aware that it is something like 400 or 450 years since printing first came into use, and we jump back over that period without any difficulty. Now, during the age of manuscripts, we can go back without any difficulty at all to the year 325, where you see the Council of Nice. Through that period, the age of manuscripts, what guarantee had we that these manuscripts were not altered? Simply this: These manuscripts, in various languages, were scattered about all over Europe, over a good part of Asia, over the north of Africa; they were in the hands of conflicting sects and parties, so that no one could alter them in the slightest degree. It would be impossible to interpolate the story of Jesus of Nazareth without its being discovered.

Now, you see from these diagrams that I hav taken you back to this period here (pointing to the diagram fixed on the platform). I hav taken you over the easiest period. We now come to the time of Constantine, who was the first Roman emperor who proclaimed himself a Christian. I am not going to discuss the character of Constantine. I dare say those of you who hav paid any attention to this matter know that in the time of Constantine there was a great dispute between the Arians and the orthodox party, and I suppose you are well aware that Athanasius was the person who maintained orthodox, and that Arius was a man who maintained unorthodox Christianity. Now, Eusebius really is the man who is said to hav presented to the Council of Nice the Nicene Creed, and, although some of you are Freethinkers, you hav been in the church of England, and I venture to say that a large number of you hav been baptized in the church of England. Consequently you know the creed of the church of England which I refer to when I speak of the Nicene Creed.

The Nicene Creed is said to hav been presented to the Council of Nice by Eusebius. I stand here to tell you that from the work of Eusebius we receive a very important part of the evidence respecting the Christian church, that is, as regards its early history. It has been disputed by thinkers whether Eusebius is a truthful historian, but I put him before you to-night as a truthful historian. As to what is said in Taylor's "Diegesis" and other similar works, I do not trouble myself to answer them, for I maintain that the "Diegesis" is an utterly unreliable book, and that its quotations are inaccurate. I could giv you plenty of instances to show that Taylor is quite unreliable; and I make nothing at all of the remarks of such writers as Taylor.

We hav the Christian faith promulgated and pronounced in that Nicene Creed that we read every Sunday in the communion service of the church of England. I hav got back now to the time of Athanasius, Arius, Eusebius, and Constantine, when Christianity was proclaimed as the religion of the Roman empire, and when, as you know well, it became allied to the state. In this fourth century I find the very same Christian creed maintained by those writers whose names I hav placed here (pointing to the diagrams), viz., Augustine, Jerome, Chrysostom, and Basil. Here are these writers belonging the to fourth century, by whom the Christian faith is promulgated and taught as it is put forward in the four gospels and in the writings of St. Paul. We find it substantially and practically the same as in those writers whom I hav mentioned to you as belonging to the fourth century.

I now go back into the third century. I hav here the name of Tertullian, who, as you are well aware, was one of the greatest writers of the Christian church, and Cyprian, Minucius Felix, who was a Latin writer, and who wrote what would now be called an "Apology for Christianity." I next come to Origen, who was one of the greatest writers of the church, against whose name you will see I hav placed the dates 184 to 253. Now, this Origen was in many respects one of the most eminent writers the church has produced, according to my own opinion respecting him and his teachings; but he teaches clearly the same Christian faith as we hav.

We now come to Clement of Alexandria, who was a predecessor of Origin, and we get to Pantænus. It would take me too long to enter into the details, but it is perfectly clear that Pantænus was a Christian teacher. We hav only some fragments of his writings preserved to us. He is said to hav been a great traveler into the East, and discoverer of a manuscript containing an account of the gospel. He is one who is put forward by the Christian thinkers as a link in the chain of historical evidence.

I now come to what are called the so-called apostolic constitutions. I do not put them before you as the work of the apostles, but they hav come down to us by that name. Mrs. Besant will lose her time in attacking me upon these [laughter]. Don't laugh until you hav heard what I hav to say. I put them before you as occurring in the third century, simply as a record of church practices and customs that were popular in the third century. Coming now to the second century we find an eminent man named Polycarp first mentioned. He, also, was a professor of the Christian faith, and is said to hav suffered martyrdom. Tertullian, you will observe, is mentioned in the second century as well as the third century, because he reaches over a part of both of them. I hav next the name of Irenæus, who was an eminent Christian of the second century, Irenæus, who also was an eminent believer in the Christian faith. We now come to the crux of the whole thing. When we get here, then begins what Freethinkers call the difficulty. I present to you Justin Martyr. Justin Martyr is really a most important man in the history of the Christian church, and also in the record of the history of the Christian faith. He was a very popular Christian in his day, and he presented one Apology (so-called) for the Christian faith to the Roman emperor. Of course there are two apologies which are known to the world under his name. I stand here to maintain one. I could maintain the two. I maintain the first one. What does he tell us with respect to the Christian faith? He tells us the same thing as we hav in the four gospels in the present day. I will giv you one or two of Justin's quotations. It has been arranged that the quotations shall be printed from the books, so that there will be no mistake whatever about what is read. I giv you a quotation from his first Apology, which runs thus:

"At the same time an angel was sent to the same virgin, saying, 'Behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb by the Holy Ghost, and thou shalt bring forth a son, and he shall be called the son of the Highest, and thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins;' as they hav taught who hav written the history of all things concerning our Savior, Jesus Christ."

Another quotation from the same: "For the apostles in those memorials which are written by them, which are called gospels, thus delivered it, 'that Jesus, taking bread, blessing it, commanded them to say, Do this in remembrance of me; this is my body; and taking the cup in like manner and giving thanks to say, This is my blood.'" I need not tell you that this refers to what is called the institution of the Lord's Supper; "For in the Memoirs which I say were composed by the apostles, and those who became their followers, it is written that 'His sweat fell like drops of blood, while he prayed and said, If it be possible, let this cup pass from me.' In giving up the ghost on the cross he said, 'Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit,' as also I learned from the Memoirs" (Exeter Hall Lectures, pp. 140, 141).

I hav given you now one, two, three quotations from Justin Martyr's Apology. I stand here to tell you most distinctly that the Christian faith, as taught by Justin Martyr in his first Apology, is practically and really the same as what we hav in the four gospels which exist at the present time. Now, I know that some person may say that it is not quite the exact words, the same as we hav them to-day; but I say, What of that?

I present you with a short notice from a well-known book, which I got with considerable difficulty. It is an old copy. It is called, "Introductory Lectures to the Study of the Books of the New Testament," by John David Michaelis, published by Tonson, in the Strand, 1761. The reason I quote from this is simply this: I could hav brought you a number of the modern writers in Germany, but Freethinkers are very fond of quoting from this book, so I was told. I believe it to be a substantially good account of the gospels. These acccounts, "like other ancient writers, they quote merely from memory, and therefore inaccurately." You know that was not an age of printing, but was an age when they had only manuscript rolls on which the scriptures were written; and it was a custom to quote from memory, and therefore not so verbally as we should do in the present day with the carefully printed book lying before us. I say that the four gospels, as we hav them to-day, is substantially what Justin Martyr teaches us here in the second century.

Two other confirmatory evidences: All of you present, I suppose, hav read what is called the letter of Pliny Junior, or Secundus, to the Emperor Trajan with respect to the treatment of the Christians. If you want outside testimony to the testimony of the Christian sects or societies, and if you want a record as to their practices, you hav the reference most clearly and unmistakably in the letter of Pliny. He records in the public letter to Trajan, which of course was well known at the time, the existence of this people, who held substantially the same Christian belief which we hold to-day.

I go back now to another heathen writer, Suetonius, who certainly does make distinct allusion to the Christians. He makes an allusion to the Christians, but then again we hav here the testimony of Ignatius. This Ignatius is a great name in the early church. I put Ignatius before you as really one of the Christian writers who bore witness in his day and generation for the Christian faith. Clement of Rome comes next. I place him before you to-night boldly; boldly I place him before you as a Christian writer who is well known, and who bore testimony in the first century to the same facts as we hav in the present day.

Next to Clement comes Hermas, who wrote what we call "The Shepherd." Under the head "Apostolic Writers," or writers in their days, we get, first of all, St. John, who lived according to the Christian church until the end of the first century. I place before you the testimony of Tacitus, recorded by the skeptical historian Gibbon; I place before you Tacitus as a witness to the truth substantially of the Christian faith. I also place before you the testimony of Josephus. I know all that Freethinkers say with respect to Josephus, and I may be told that he was a Jew; that he would never hav written the passage which, I dare say, you all know, but I say that Josephus seems to be something of the Freethinker himself, and I place him before you as one who just mentioned and alluded to the fact of the Christian church or sect.

I next pass to St. Peter and St. Paul, and I defy all the Freethinkers in Europe to break down the testimony of the Apostle Paul coutained in these four epistles—the Epistle to the Romans, the two to the Corinthians, and the Epistle to the Galatians. Even the Freethinkers of Germany hav allowed that these are the works of the Apostle Paul.

If I undertand rightly, Mrs. Besant does not believe in a great first cause and moral ruler of this world. I do. I am not ashamed to say it. To me a universe that has always been, human beings whose life is simply confined to this world, and who hav no souls, are simply ridiculous and monstrous. I stand here before the Freethinkers in England, and I am not ashamed to say that I believe in a great first cause, a great moral ruler of the universe, who I believe exercises a superintending providence over all things.

The testimony of St. Paul proves indisputably that Jesus of Nazareth was a historical character, an extraordinary character, and I say a divine character or person. Let me remind you that there can be no dispute that St. Paul was present at Rome in the time of Nero. I find in the time of St. Paul, or about that time, Claudius Cæsar ordered the Jews out of Rome, on account of a disturbance.

Time being called by the chairman, Mr. Hatchard sat down amid loud applause.

Telling Experience.

To THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Reading in your paper Goddard's letter to Leland—a letter chock full of vim and soul, and yet from a "small fellow," as he calls himself—the thought struck me whether or not a little experience and personal history from a large fellow, weighing 225, and over six feet tall, on the devious ways of a checkered and liberal life, would be acceptable to you and your dear readers, to whom we are friends, and they can't help themselvs.

Well, here I am at my own sweet home in Berrien Springs, the sweetest village in Michigan.

> "Three score years and ten are on me,
> And my hair is white as snow."

But my heart is warm, my head as level as usual, my affections strong, my love of truth (as found down at the bottom of things) most sacred to me, mild as a cooing-dove to look at generally (I send you my picture to verify this); but when truth, my immortal pet, is assaulted, then the thunder and lightning come in, I grasp my old army musket, hold it at "present," place my back against the rock of immutable truth, and say,

> "Come one, come all, this rock shall fly
> From its firm base as soon as I."

This is my doctrin, as Robert says.

Walk in, dear friends, readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER; be seated, and I will tell you a thing or two of the life and theological times we hav had in Berrien Springs.

I am well known as a Liberalist and Spiritualist. I saw the world covered with theological darkness, and gross unreason hanging over the people. I knew that the great ten-to-one outside of the churches do not and cannot accept and believe theological dogmas as taught, and that doubt is permeating and honeycombing the evangelical world. I knew that the religion of humanity is the religion to be, in its own good time, and I thought, and think, that time is near at hand. I thereupon conceived the idea of starting an organization of, the outsiders into a body, founded upon humanity and natural morality on a basis so simple, specific, and self-evident that all unconverted persons could unite and accept its principles. I accordingly, by the approbation of a few noble minds, instituted the Brotherhood of Humanity at Berrien Springs, placing on its primary card, as a central and basic principle, the following:

> "Believing what is known, to no creed confined,
> Our brothers are the true of all humankind.
> Love truth, do good, be just and kind to all:
> Exalt the right, though every ism fall."

The above gem of principle and goodness was written for me by that dear, good, aged, poetic soul, Eliza D. Valentine, of Natick, Massachusetts. The principles on the primary card (which I append) came right home to good sense and good heart, and the Brotherhood of Berrien Springs soon numbered two hundred members of Berrien county and one hundred honorary members, scattered through the states and cities from Maine to California. The holy people took alarm. They saw "their craft was in danger." The timber from the forest, relied on to build up their churches, they found leaned from them. "A low, slumbering earthquake lay pillowed in fire," but they could not find a vulnerable point of eruption. But they found one, as they thought. A member of the Brotherhood died, directing that his Masonic brethren only should do his funeral service; but his remains were preached over by a right reverend in a hell-fire-and-brimstone sermon, pronounced with a vim and a spite. All but the pious (I should say good) were pained. The Brotherhood criticised the proceedings by resolutions. Then "the ball began." The right reverend preached three sermons against the Brotherhood, using bitter, insulting, yet "Christian" words. Not satisfied with this, he wrote a letter to one of our papers, signed "S.," denouncing the Brotherhood in such amiable Christian phrases as the following: "Fiendish resolutions," "haters of God," "fiendish hate," "infernal falsehood," "vile and execrable wretches," etc., etc.

Anthony Comstock, Jr., and two stupendously pious ladies of high culture in the cause of Christ, large in faith, and small in reason (smaller feminin lights promising to assist), armed with a paper containing charges against the Brotherhood, and exhorting members of the order to withdraw, went through the town like medicin and made a "blue Monday" for Berrien Springs. One sweet lady told her good husband if he did not withdraw from the Brotherhood she would not sleep with him. Under like fears of dire disaster fourteen of the members withdrew. The "causus withdrawi" of some business men was simply trade. The vacuum was filled in a little longer than no time by thirty-six new members.

Meanwhile of the attack by the good, "We, Us & Co.," the Brotherhood looked as placid as the moon, and I fear a trifle blank. I knew I was the target of these, the good, and was the cause of their wailing and woe, though they dared not mention my name in print or pulpit. But their accusations came thicker and faster; and upon the accumulations of gentle sweetness and blessedness I spake, as said Othello. I will explain further.

I am playfully called by friends the "Bishop of the Brotherhood," and to a share of the good who know me I am the head-center of their hate, for the only reason, so far as I know, that I do not believe as they do. They had nursed courage in me and kept it warm until I took down my old war-musket, loaded it with a stub-pen, aiming and shooting right at eyes through the papers. Instead of injury, it opened the eyes of the public, and the previously blind saw just as well. I will quote you a card to show how gently I dealt with the right reverend's letter signed "S.:"

CARD.

"The undersigned does not think the Brotherhood will condescend to reply to an anonymous and irresponsible communication signed 'S.,' in regard to the Order, published in 'The Journal' of last week. Gentlemen—and much less the followers of the meek and lowly Jesus, who, 'when he was reviled, reviled not again'—do not use toward those who differ from them on religious and moral questions the language of revengeful and uncultured society, to wit, 'fiendish hate,' 'haters of God,' 'fiendish resolutions,' 'infernal falsehood,' 'vile and execrable wretches,' etc., etc. The public will be slow to believe that any such language was used by any Christian man or woman, or approved by such, and will infer that the said article is spurious, tending to bring into disrespect the cause of Christ and the good name of the Christian people and churches of Berrien Springs.

"May the good God, from whom all blessings flow, forgiv the writer of that article and all who may approve it!

"WORTHY PUTNAM, C. of A. B. of H."

I administered a like treatment, seriatim, to all the combined forces of evangelical alliance and holy war against the Brotherhood here, and it gave them all a quietus, so they could not, or at least did not, peep in press or pulpit after that. They were defeated, and gave up an open fight and fair field, but resorted to guerilla warfare. "Anything to beat that Putnam" was then the war-whisper. They knew the hold I had upon the schools, the young people, and the children. They may have learned that the sweet little girls would come of an evening and hang bouquets of flowers upon the knob of my door and run away like little sprites. The holiest of the female persuasion circulated freely and enjoined the young, under holy influence at home, not to notice me on the streets. This worked quite well with a few for a time; but I sent a circular to every house in the village, in which was the following paragraph:

"If, however, any lady, lady's boy, or lady's maid, should, in their simplicity, frown on me on account of my convictions of truth, good, and duty, I shall giv them a silent passing notice, pitying their folly, and, not annoyed in the least, go right on in my search after the good and true."

This put a quietus upon that foolishness.

There was one more shot in the locker; "one more left," as the autioneer says; a dernier on the "sitting-down-upon" principle," in the shape of a public insult to me, directly, by four holy sisters, two very strong in goodness, and two weak in intellect, which culminated on this wise: A man once well known and beloved here had become a poor wanderer. He died in a distant state, and his good wife went and brought him home for burial. I was selected to perform the last sad rites to his memory at his grave. On my commencing that service those four holy women started and walked away from the grave with a gait, vim, strut, and spite, in look and action, which, if compared to the locomotion of tom-turkies, would demoralize the turkies badly. They halted at about fifteen rods distant, and stood in the cemetery, four living monuments of the grace of God. When I pronounced the last sad farewell to poor Frank, and said gone (the saddest word in the universe), but not lost to the loving memory of father, mother, brothers, sisters, wife, and children, and these other dear friends who hav known him long and loved him well, tears fell like the gentle rains, and sadly the mourning friends took their homeward way.

A "poor sinner" (all such are natural friends of mine) remarking to me soon after upon the godly conduct of those four retiring sisters in the Lord, said, "Putnam, if those women should find you in heaven they would retire in the same way, and the whole heavenly host would stop their singing, swing their harps over their heads, and yell, Good-bye, ye bogus saints, you are not welcome here!"

What a wicked thought!

I will just say in conclusion, as the minister says, that those dear sisters in the Lord injured themselvs so much in that "sitting-down-upon" process that they hav remained standing ever since.

Thus endeth the first lesson, and an item of my religious experience. I hav now mostly ceased writing and religious fighting, yet I hav much data of experience on the musty leaves of memory which I might not write up and out except upon strong temptation; but I giv special notice to my dear Christian friends they must not even attempt to punish me for my religious convictions nor assault my life-long reputation nor my citadel of immortal truth, for the foundation of which I hav dug down to the bottom of things. I am not provided with a swivel in my neck so that when one cheek is smitten I can turn the other to the assailant. I will not do a wrong and I will not endure one. I hav an arsenal of swords, pistols, pitchforks, guns, bayonets, brickbats, blunderbusses, and battering rams (all mental you understand), by which some one might get hurt. You will not infer this from my very amiable-looking picture, but my ever faithful and magnanimous friend, shown at my side, has the real grit, with all that that word implies, you may be assured.

Now, my dear Bennett, I want your picture, I do, as Bro. Babcock says.

The right reverend referred to, by previous design and arrangement, left for other pastures green in ten days after receiving his quietus by the Brotherhood, with our hearty indorsal through the paper as being a great helper of the order (indirectly). His church, the foremost in attacking us, we left to pursue their own ways of goodness, knowing that like the earth it contained internal elements of eruption. The result was a new minister, who first bounced the church, then the church bounced him; and now the both parties lie heels up, hors du combat, at the beam ends of the even scales of justice.

The Brotherhood, though reported, in the interest of the cause of Christ, dead, yet they are alive and well, making no public fuss about it, but think firm, act firm, stand firm, believing what is known, and no more, taking truth for authority and not authority for truth. Its fundamental principles are so self-evident, simple, and natural that nothing but work is needed, backed by means, to bring in and organize the great unconverted of the country. I think I do know this from our experience here. If one man of independence, talent, and means in each county could and would do all the thinking, all the writing, all the thinking, all the walking, all the talking, all the praying, all the paying, all the extending, all the defending, and stand up bravely and bear all the cursing, all would be lovely. But no one can work for nothing, board himself and others too, all his life. His body, patience, and pocket will grow seedy and ragged after awhile. I refer this matter to Leland, Elmina, Goddard, Walker, Green & Co., for consideration and essays on the cause and cure of this condition of things.

Allow me to switch off from the track of experience to exposition of the use of Liberal work. Cui bono, what good? I answer, the world is enslaved in thought by the evangelical and Roman alliance of the civilized world that still holds the fort. But in what way? In this—the unconverted unbelievers are denounced, and that continually, by pulpit and press, in modified terms in this age to be sure, but in fact and effect, that such are enemies to God, criminals in fact in his sight, so great and infinit as to deserve and receive by the judge of all the earth a sentence to the agonies of fire of eternal duration; and for what? Why, simply because the outside world do not and cannot believe as the church does. I tell you, Liberals of every class, name, and nature, in the name of humanity and in sight of all the gods and demons of the univercœlum who, if reduced to the least common denominator of diabolical atrocity, could not and would not do it; and no god that is a god has ever said he would. (The logical deduction is that Christians are worse than demons.) I denounce it as a damnable lie in two senses; I denounce it as against the universal natural sense of justice in mankind; I denounce it as against every law of justice in the universe. That concentrated demon should arrest every Christian teacher and church in this world for criminal libel of his better nature, if there was a court of adequate jurisdiction to administer justice upon it.

You say that the rack, the dungeon, and the stake hav passed away. First, let me tell you that the Liberals passed them away by standing up boldly in the face of civil power and demanding that such atrocities should cease, and they did cease. But I will tell you how they can and do punish you in this age for asserting your diverse but honest religious convictions. They will slander you by lies (for the glory of God like St. Paul) to affect your moral character or general good reputation; they will undermine your business; they will injure your social standing; and when they are permitted to perform service over your remains by preaching the "truths of the gospel," as they call it, they calmly pretend to believe and leave others to infer that you are a great criminal before God, who will consign you to eternal torture for the sin of unbelief. This is what they do and delight to do. And this is what they will do and continue to practice till you arise in numbers and in the might of noble men and women demand the unpunishable liberty of honest religious conviction.

But you say, What can we do about it? Now, Bro. Putnam, what means of action and plan of revolution do you propose? I will state them negativ and affirmativ. First, reforms that are permanent, civil or religious, work slowly as the accretions of the rock, solidly, gradually. Cyclones are iconoclastic but they do not build. Disputations, earnest or angry, do not convince any one, but confirm more strongly previous convictions.

Reading is the thing, and that exactly. I hav demonstrated it as a mental problem and can announce the result as an axiom. Reading excites reflection, and reflection produces conviction. Remember that unpunished liberty of thought is the goal, and that we hav been made mental slaves, and are still kept so by the Christian forces, who still hold the fort and punish us as for crime for powers of thought, innocent per se, and beyond our control.

Our most effectiv reading is perused by the Liberals themselvs, who do not need it, except for daily mental food, as "the whole need not a physician, but those that are sick," which means the poor bigoted sinners who hav had the most monstrous untruths pounded into them, as was once the case with us. This reading should go to them. Some who are fond of fire for something or somebody else will treat it with flames, but most will read it quasi-confidentially, and the reflection upon it will tell. The tendency will be to loosen them, and eventually cure them of their horrid ideas and orthodox foolishness. The article of good Elmina on Liberal libraries is a brilliant idea, really a golden nugget presented to the Leagues and Liberal forces. I say to the Leagues all, and Liberals generally, Go right to work and do something about it.

Send out THE TRUTH SEEKER far and wide, on its mission of mercy, good sense, reason, and truth. It is the most effectiv missionary on the Western Continent, a two-edged sword that always hits and hurts, and never fails of results. A clergyman of talent, in charge of a good congregation, who is my confidential friend, tells me that he reads it, and knows that other ministers do in private. I know this friend does not believe the doctrin he preaches, and he strongly hints that he knows that other clergymen do not. The ways and means are to let THE TRUTH SEEKER and compeers, Liberal books, and tracts by mail, and circulating libraries, fall thick as leaves in Valombrosa into parsonages and orthodox homes, thus turning the tables of missionary work, and placing truth where it will do most good. But how shall this be done? I answer, By the use of money. But how shall this be obtained? I will rise and explain. Liberals, of every name and sort, my voice is unto you, and unto you I call. I mean especially the rich in means and strong in faith. I say, "Shell out!" not so much as a donation as for your own protection and happiness. The orthodox pay out liberally to prevent being damned in future, but you are damned already by them; and from the fort they hold, and from behind the coward's castle, they treat the interest and reputation of yourselvs and families most damnably. Think and talk of this by night and day, at home and abroad, by land and by sea; remember this intensely when you make your wills, and "shell out," "giv down," and thereby giv happiness and religious liberty to your fellow-men, and gain for yourselvs great names. Again I say, "Shell out!"

Perhaps you may say, "Shell out yourself." Well, I hav done that till my hairs are gray, my motion slow, and my exchequer cries aloud for mercy; but I look at the humble efforts I hav made for liberty of thought, and I see arising a little monument to my memory.

Liberals all, to you I call. I offer you my hand, and hav a "good bless you!" in my heart for every one. Don't fight, don't wrangle, don't hate each other! Don't divide yourselvs, but your enemies to conquer. Universal law works in harmony, and that always tells in results. Don't throw overboard the captains of your ships; they might sink by such foolishness. Strive to see who can best work and best agree. Don't hit Robert G. Ingersoll because he varies from many of you in ways and means. You cannot hurt him if you do hit him. He is the noblest Roman of you all. He is a brilliant star in the zenith of this country, throwing out his blazing beams of golden thought and light, backed by great moral worth and intellectual strength, while in the dismal nadir is a countless host preaching about the fall of man and total depravity, and praying that Ingersoll may be cast down. This won't do, don't you see?

So much, my dear Bennett, from your friend Worthy, and I would it were worthier. But "what is writ is writ." Like Hamlet's ghost, my thoughts would not down.

Receive the benediction: And now may grace that is grace, great peace, harmony, and loving kindness be and abide with you and all Liberals, of every name, now and henceforth. WORTHY PUTNAM.

P. S.—I inclose the card of the Brotherhood of Humanity: W. P.

BROTHERHOOD OF HUMANITY
AT BERRIEN SPRINGS, MICH.

OBJECTS OF THE ORDER:

To promote Unity, Sociability, Charity,
Friendship, Kindness, Honesty,
Truth and Justice in the Humane.

ITS PRINCIPLES:

Believing what is known, to no creed confined,
Our brothers are the true of all humankind.
Love truth, do good, be just and kind to all;
Exalt the right though every ism fall.

ITS GOLDEN RULES OF LIFE:

Keep an Even Mind.
As ye would that others should do unto you so do ye to them.
Let every thought and word and act promote the kingdom of heaven on earth.
Contented with the Past,
Thankful for the Present,
Hopeful for the Future.
Love to Father God and Brother man;
Adoring the Good, the Beautiful, and True.

PLEDGE:

We, the undersigned, do solemnly pledge ourselvs to follow the Rules of this Brotherhood according to the best light we hav, asking "charity that thinketh no evil" to consider, in its judgment of our conduct, our organization, location, education, and temptation.

Another Step Toward Centralization.

The centralizing influence in the Republican party in Congress is again at work upon the mails. A provision has long existed on the Federal statute books authorizing the Postmaster-General to refuse the delivery of letters or money orders to illegal or fraudulent lotteries. It may be within the province of the United States government to prevent the prostitution of its mails to the use of swindlers, and there certainly would be no objection on the part of honest citizens so long as the prohibition operates only against that class of people that prey upon the credulity of others; but there is danger enough in the principle of putting an espionage upon the mails, though for the best purpose, to make even the provision of the Federal law extremely doubtful in its benefits. It is giving the Postmaster-General the arbitrary power to adjudicate ex parte upon the business of citizens, determining without any opportunity to them to be heard in their defense that they are swindlers, denying them mail facilities, and fastening an odium upon them which no man ought to be compelled to bear without a fair and open trial.

But the amendment now proposed, at the suggestion of the Postmaster-General, too, is to strike out the words "fraudulent" and "illegal," thus authorizing that functionary to prohibit the use of the mails to all lotteries, no matter how legal their status, or how honest their operations.

There is a graver question involved in this proposal than the mere question of the moral character of the business of carrying on a lottery. It is an act on the part of the general government which would deprive the states of their rights respectively to regulate the business of their own citizens. It would establish a police regulation within states whose policy might be opposed to it, and it would withhold the use of the mails from men engaged in a business which their state might recognize and protect as legitimate and legal.

Such a proposition ought not to be considered in connection with the particular business which it aims to cripple, but upon broad, general principles, for if the precedent is once fully established that Congress may deny mail facilities to one class of business enterprise, which has a legal standing in any state, they will sooner or later widen the scope of their prohibition, and every kind of business to which the mails are a necessity will be subject to the will of Congress.

A less radical movement was frowned upon by the Senate in 1836. It was in connection with the slave-holding interest. John C. Calhoun proposed that all antislavery documents should be destroyed by postmasters immediately upon coming into a slave state through the mails. It will be observed that he did not go so far as to propose that antislavery documents should not be carried in the mails, which would hav been analogous to the proposition now before Congress; but his bill was defeated upon constitutional grounds, such senators as Clay and Webster arraying themselvs against it. From that time until Anthony Comstock's law against the passage of vile literature through the mail, it was understood that Congress had no power to regulate mail matter by its literary character. It was assumed that any letter upon any subject, however expressed, might go through the mails, and that any interference with such productions as ought to be distributed would work more mischief in the dangerous precedent it might establish than it could do good in its particular application. Comstock, however, aimed at the suppression of a traffic so vile and demoralizing which had spread itself over the country under cover of the sanctity of the mails, that there was no dissenting voice when he proposed to prohibit its transmission through these channels.

This law was speedily followed by the one prohibiting the delivery of letters of fraudulent and illegal lotteries, and now it is proposed to go a step further and put all lotteries, honest and legal as well as fraudulent and illegal, under the ban.

Should this measure be carried into effect, it is difficult to conceive what may come next. The prohibition party might become sufficiently strong in Congress to deny mail facilities to the liquor trade, notwithstanding that that is a legal and legitimate business in nearly every state of the Union. The next step might be to shut out heretical religious publications from the mail, and from that point the chasm is not very wide to a suppression of political documents.

The Rostrum.

[A Lecture Delivered at Applebee Hall, Chicago.]

The Clergy.

BY GEORGE CHAINEY.

There are in these United States of America seventy thousand men and a few women who come under the title of this lecture. They do nothing to increase the world's wealth, and yet they are fed and clothed. They travel on their local railroads for half price, and are dead-heads at most of the lectures, charity concerts, and circuses. They do not always go to the circus, and when they do, it is for the laudable purpose of studying zoology. They are called "reverends" and "right reverends," "deacons" and "elders," "fathers" and "priests," "parsons" and "preachers," "bishops" and "archbishops," but all varieties come under the general title of "the clergy."

Before I go any further let me tell you that this lecture is not devoted to the abuse of the clergy. I do not intend to say half such bad things about them as the man did whom they worship as a god. He called them "ravening wolves," "whited sepulchers," "blind leaders of the blind," "liars, and children of their father the devil." Taking into consideration the service they are engaged in, I verily believe that they are, on the whole, better than we hav any right to expect them to be.

Though the thing for which I am most truly thankful this morning is that I am no longer a clergyman, still I bear those whose company I am quite willing to dispense with for the future no malice. They are more to be pitied than blamed. There are among them many of the best of men. There rises before my imagination many a minister's home, sacred with kindly memories of the past, of eyes soft and tremulous with light and love, of hands clasping in strong but tender embrace, of footsteps as soft as the velvet foot of time, of voices as gentle as a summer breeze, laden with the breath of many flowers; of a sweet welcome that left no room for doubt, and of greetings that slew at once embarrassment. Remembering these things, and how unselfishly many of them labor for humanity, I say again that they are better than we ought to expect. Still I believe they would all be better men, at least more manly men, and do more good in the world, if they were engaged in some other work.

What are the facts in human nature and history that are responsible for the existence of the priest? By going back to the cradle of humanity we find that the priest and king were produced by the same principle; and that principle was fear. Our savage ancestors feared two kinds of foes, seen and unseen. About them lurked other savage tribes ready to attack them at any time. They wanted some one who was strong and valiant to lead them in battle. If one of their number could wield a heavier ax, bend a stronger bow, run a swifter race, or throw a spear a longer distance, he was chosen chief or lord or king. About them, they ignorantly imagined, lurked unseen powers. To their untutored minds the lightning's lurid bolt, the earthquake's rude shock, the volcano's fiery storm, the destroying pestilence and famin, were all wielded by evil spirits seeking their harm. To their thought the woods, the seas, the mountains and leaves, were all infested with these unseen foes. They wanted some one to coax or buy them into good behavior. They had sheep and oxen, enemies taken in war, the first fruits of the land, and sometimes, out of the impotence of their fear, their own children to giv to them. The men who officiated in these rites of sacrifice were supposed to be made sacred by their labor. Thus was born the priest, fathered by fear, mothered by terror, and empowered by a supposedly sacred character springing out of the idea that these unseen powers must think more highly of those who offered them these gifts than of the common people. This simple fact is at the bottom of all distinctions between laity and clergy. These first priests naturally established numerous rules concerning these offerings. Some of them were the most trivial and disgusting, such as shaving their bodies, putting blood on their right ear, right thumb, and right great toe, or anointing their bodies with ointment, or the pronouncing over the entrails of a bird killed above a running stream certain magical words. The Old Testament is full of these sickening and barbarian details. Many of these priests being sincere in their fear of the gods they served, would fast and pray until, in their excited imaginations, they beheld the faces or forms of these ghosts, and heard them speak. What they heard they told to the people, and these words were received as revelations. All the first priests were thus looked upon as mediators, or go-betweens. As these revelations hav generally instructed the people that they couldn't please their gods in any better way than by taking good care of their priests, they hav been so liberally cared for that they hav always had much leisure time to devote to study. Hence they at first were the oracles of wisdom and the cultivators of knowledge. As long as they retained their superiority the power they wielded was enormous. In the history of humanity no power has been so exacting and cruel as that of the priesthood. Many times they hav become like a great overgrown cancer on the body politic. Through their fanaticisms and inordinate ambitions they hav plunged whole nations into the most blood-thirsty wars that ever laid waste the fair fields of earth.

From time to time men hav risen who hav sought to reform the priesthood, like Jesus and Luther, but on their work a more powerful hierarchy has been built. Jesus himself is looked upon as a great high-priest. Both king and priest were born of fear; both are eternal paupers; both are relics of barbarism; both retain their power by virtue of our reverence for antiquity. What a farce is a king in a civilized country! He livs in costly palaces. At his feet thousands of better men and women kiss the dust in servil humility. Vast revenues must be raised by taxing the creations of labor with which to support him. He is clothed in vanity, and plays but a harlequin's part in the great drama of life. All the ambitions he kindles in the hearts of his subjects are vain and selfish. Instead of protecting the people from war, he is more likely to involve them in it. Where valor and wisdom are needed on the battle-field, he is found often entirely destitute of the demand that called him into power. His vanity and folly keep the land impoverished in times of peace by maintaining a vast standing army. Now, we hav learned in this country that the people are the true sovereign power. Instead of serving in degradation a king, we strive to select men of capacity and statesmanship from our number, and bid them serve us. We hav learned that to cover the land with a network of railroads is better protection than all the glittering steel of bayonets. We hav found that to dot the land with furnaces and factories is a surer safeguard than a Chinese wall or a coast-line bristling with cannon. We hav learned that the intelligent volunteer soldier, who fights for the protection of a happy home and a free republic, is better than the soldier who is trained to fight as a profession. We know that the best way to avoid war is to make no preparations for it save in the general prosperity of the land. But while we hav in this country outgrown the king, we are most grievously priest-ridden. The creation of mortal fear is to us a hideous mockery, but the offspring of immortal fear has his foot upon our necks. All our property is taxed indirectly to support these servants of shadowy ghosts and defunct hobgoblins. Though we no longer murder the bodies of our children to appease these specters of fear, we still murder their hearts and minds by the wholesale. When a fanatic like Freeman repeats the inhumanities of the past, we cry out against these murderous practices, and yet the finest buildings in all our cities are the endowment and support of the same.

Christianity, in its primary meaning, is only an offering of humanity to appease a villainous and a blood-thirsty God. Theology is the barbarian's interpretation of the universe, and, in the light of science, is all the baseless fabric of a dream. Every god is the fossilized nightmare of a savage brain; every miracle is the folly of ignorance. All worship of the unknown is the stammering of fear. Ages of devotion change the name into love, but the serpent is coiled within the flowers. These seventy thousand men are all employed to feed and keep alive a crawling, deadly, slimy serpent of superstition. Every black robe is symbolic of the dark clouds of gloom and terror that hav risen from the swamps of the world's ignorance and brutality. I am not blind to the fact that there are plenty of people who still believe in gods, devils, ghosts, heaven, and hell, and that these beliefs are the comfort of their lives, and that it is a dear and sacred privilege for them to maintain the ministry. Nor do I deny their right to do so. They hav always been taught that this is the consolation of life. They hav never had any chance to compare their experience with that which looks upon all these things as degrading superstitions. They know not the high joys of a free mind and a fearless heart. They hav never compared the intoxication of courage with the stupor of faith.

The power of habit and woe is something wonderful. Many a slave has hugged his bondage as a divine blessing. In olden times men tormented their poor bodies with stripes and hunger for pleasure, lived in caves and tombs, or crouched for years in one position on the tops of pillars for sweet consolation.

The history of religion is the history of self-deception. The blessed consolations of religion are still of the same order as those of the pillar and tomb. Thousands of people expect to praise God for sending their fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, to hell. Millions hav believed that the torments of the damned would augment their pleasures in heaven. Many people find more pleasure in a funeral than a wedding, while to thousands a hanging is a feast of joy. It is principally the same strange freak in human nature that leads people to find pleasure in going to church, to be told of eternal torments, or of the pleasure that awaits them after death in the embrace of a ghost.

A veil of poetry and mysticism is drawn over theology by human love and genius, but there is always a ghost at the banquet table that will not down, a skeleton in the closet that cannot be got rid of. I know as much about so-called religious consolation as anyone, and I know that whenever its meaning is confronted with an honest and earnest purpose, going to church is like gathering nettles for roses, or kissing the cold and pallid lips of death and declaring that they are warm and tremulous with life and love. When the world was honest in its faith, they called it ghostly consolation, and only sought it when there was no more hope of earthly comfort.

Every priest is a salaried servant in a carnival of death. His work is to hold a false mask over the horrid skeleton of superstition, and to twine flowers around the dagger of fear. He is a pall-bearer at the funeral of human joy, and a hangman at the murder of human intelligence. In escaping from this service I felt like one who had fled from a charnel-house. I do not say these things from any ill-will, but even as an escaped slave might describe the bondage from which he had fled in order to hasten the delivery of his friends and brethren from the dominion of the lash and bloodhound.

I would take from the clergy their priestly functions. I would withdraw them from the service of ghosts to that of suffering human flesh and blood. I would keep them from gazing idly into the skies, that they may see the flowers blossoming at their feet. I would stop them from spending valuable time to save people from imaginary hells, that they may help to fill up the real ones of ignorance, poverty, vice, and crime. I would take from them the livery and badge of servitude and clothe them in the beautiful garments of liberty.

I hav no fault to find with individuals, but I do say that this whole thing is like the worship of a deadly serpent, the sowing of thistles, the culture of a cancer, the working for peace by maintaining a standing army, the spreading of a pestilence by giving away for charity's sake the garments of the dead, as the pouring of oil instead of water upon a destructiv fire. Seventy thousand men in this country alone employed to teach people to despise the flowers of earth to gather impossible ones in the skies; to hold the embraces of human love as sinful in order to enjoy those of a ghost; to be ignorant concerning the revelations of science in order to be wise in the wild imaginings of some half-savage Eastern sheik; to shun as vanity the grand creations of immortal genius in the drama and opera for the sake of enjoying the dull monotonies of the sermon and the prayer-meeting.

This cannot last. The intelligence of the world has left the church. The real intellectual leaders of our day hardly consider it worth noticing. The great world is too much engaged with more important concerns to trouble itself much about these follies. Thousands of men who go to church do so out of mere complacency to a superstition they deem too powerful to oppose. The books that the church writes are no longer read. Pious people buy them out of a sense of duty, but seldom read them. Church people are no longer controversial, because they are ignorant of the fundamental articles of their churches. Ministers who are influenced by their congregations instinctivly shun theology. A good sermon is a bundle of pretty sentences that don't mean anything in particular. If a church gets a minister who preaches so that the people remember and talk about what is said, there is sure to be trouble. Whole regiments of ministers meet in convention and pass resolutions upon almost every subject beneath the sun, without changing to any perceptible degree the things they resolve about. The intellect of the world has left the church stranded upon the barren rocks of speculation. No flower blooms there. No wave of joy kisses them. They are all black and moss-grown. Science has conquered. It has already rung upon the dial of time the death-knell of superstition. We no longer fear the church as an intellectual power. The stamp of inferiority, as Mr. Ingersoll says, is upon every orthodox brain. Even children laugh at its old wives' fables. Political parties begin to beg for the votes of its opponents. Publishers cater to the tastes of unbelievers. The name of Joseph Cook, the latest champion thereof, has become a byword and a reproach. The brightest minds of England, France, Germany, and America are openly infidel to its doctrins. A French drama that stabs superstition through and through was nightly applauded in New York. The passion play is to be a part of this winter amusements. In every city leading church members are to be found willing to pay Ingersoll a dollar to hear him smite with all the power of wit and ridicule, of pathos, of tears and laughter, all that they profess to regard as divine.

It is useless to ignore these things. Straws tell which way the current is going. But these are logs which can be seen by all. For the present I am willing to acknowledge that the clergy may be in part a necessary evil. Millions of people still think they need their services. Young men still enter upon it in the spirit of unselfish devotion. But we who know these things cannot keep silent, nor keep from doing our best to teach mankind that they will be much better off when they can dispense altogether with the services of priests. I intend to do what little I can in this direction, because the life of every minister who is not stupid is a tragedy. I know that you will find many ministers with a self-satisfied and contented look who go around hugging their honors and easy life. But while their stomachs may be full, their brains will be empty. Many of these are good, well-meaning men, against whom it would be folly to be vexed; who, because they are sincere, find favor and comfort in their profession. But with the men who read, who understand the world, who hav the passions and ambitions of men because they hav brains enough to see the probabilities and opportunities of life, existence is a tragedy. The life they liv in their studies is divorced from that of their public ministrations. The intellectual sweets of their lives all hav to be stolen in secret. A blush of shame degrades them in their own self-respect every time they stifle their honest thought. The authors whose company they keep, whose glowing thoughts and living words of genius are to them more than their daily food, are by their creeds condemned to eternal torment. Their real life must be hidden beneath lock and key while they masquerade in artificial face and unnatural garments before the public. Having the wants and ambitions of men, they are forbidden to satisfy them. Because they wear a false face, the world puts on a mask whenever they come before it. From them men and women hide their natural lives. It is almost impossible for them to know the world. They are always treated as company, and kept in the parlor. They become effeminate and unnatural. They are as unpleasant company to natural men and women as an egg cooked only on one side is disagreeable food to most people. Do you think they are not sensible of this? Do you imagin that they are complimented to hav the world play hide-and-seek with them? Would you like to feel as though you were regarded as a hired eavesdropper to a God? Would you feel it an honor to hav men and women afraid to let you know what they are made of, for fear you would tell tales out of school? It is true they are called embassadors from the court of heaven, but they are none the less treated as though they were spies. Do you think that they do not know that they are employed to help people deceive themselvs and one another? They enter upon this work, most of them, in all sincerity. Gradually, however, as reason's flame grows brighter, the darkness and falsehood of theology are revealed. This discovery, that they are wedded to a body of death, and consecrated to the service of the grave, is a tragedy in itself. You say if they do not believe it, let them renounce it. That is easier said than done. With their faith in these doctrins goes trust in a divine Providence. A wife and children are dependent on them. To them the world is all strange. The material wants of life become more real and valuable as the spiritual fade away like ghosts at the dawn of day. Occasionally the circumstances are such that one has the courage to break the fetters and be free, but ninety-nine out of every hundred who come to this awakening find it impossible to break the strong net of destiny. A church is not like a boarding-house, out of which one can go because he does not like the coffee. There is in it, especially to the minister, a good deal of the character of a marriage for better or worse, for richer or poorer. It becomes a home from which it is hard to go in obedience to the stern voice of duty and conscience. Soft, honeyed words of love entreat them to stay. Bright eyes and fair arms hold them back. All the gathered friendship of years of devotion holds them captiv. Their whole training has deprived them of that healthy manhood that prefers the "storm and tempest of thought rather than the dead calm of ignorance and faith." To forego the love and confidence of dear friends is by no means an easy task. It is easy for us to excuse those who thus turn aside from the path of rectitude because blinded by the gathering tears of human affection.

The ministry is not perhaps so much to blame for this hard state of things as those are who sit in the pews. Let the congregations hire them as teachers rather than as attorneys sworn to defend a cause, whether true or false. Let them invite them to preach their doubts as well as beliefs. Let them be willing to treat a man decently and respectfully even though he does renounce their creed. As it is, churches pay a premium on insincerity and hypocrisy. They tempt their ministers to deceive them by showing their teeth to everyone who tries to undeceive them. You who belong to the church may denounce me with your lips for telling these things, but in your heart of hearts you know I speak the truth. Every man and woman of common sense will see at once that these things are sadly and fearfully true. While, then, I excuse the clergy; while, then, I say nothing against them personally; while some of the best of men are to be found in the ministry, yet I claim that they would be far better out of it, for no one can continue subject to these influences and not suffer from them. They not only tend to emasculate, but also to make heartless. There is a show of humanity, but on the whole it is so artificial that there is no real warmth and comfort. If you were in real, downright trouble, there are not many ministers you would send for. You know too well that there is Tom or Harry, who swears and drinks, and gets the better of you when he can in a bargain, but who will come and take you by the hand, and say, "Cheer up, old fellow; I will stand by you as long as I hav a dollar to help myself with."

Ingersoll's Creed.

LACONIC AND EPIGRAMMATIC EXPRESSIONS FROM HIS LATEST LECTURE, "WHAT MUST WE DO TO BE SAVED."

I do not wish to be a charity angel.

Honest industry is as good as pious idleness.

Every demonstrated fact is a verse in my Bible.

Every schoolhouse is a cathedral in my religion.

Real charity is to help the poor to help themselvs.

The Presbyterian God damns people to glorify himself.

No devil has ever been so bad as the Presbyterian God.

Christ believed the temple of God to be the heart of man.

There was never a Presbyterian half so bad as his creed.

I hav no ambition to be a winged pauper of the skies.

If ever I go to heaven I want to take my reason with me.

If I owe Smith $10 and God forgivs me, that don't pay Smith.

If we can't hav a heaven without a hell, then abolish both.

God will not damn a good citizen, a good father, or a good friend.

Upon the shadowy shore of death the sea of trouble casts no wave.

If there is a God in the universe he will not damn an honest man.

There is only one true worship, and that is the practice of justice.

Whenever a man can climb, help him climb, and make him climb.

Fear is a kind of dagger with which hypocrisy assassinates the soul.

After baptism you belong to the firm and get rascality at first cost.

I will never ask God to treat me any fairer than I do my fellow-men.

Our murderers are all saved. They go from the gallows direct to glory.

People who hav the smallest souls make the most fuss about saving them.

Make the best of this world; do the same of the next when you get there.

Let any church get control of power and you hav the end of political liberty.

If I go to heaven and see even one of those I love in hell, I'll want to emigrate.

There is not a word in the gospel about keeping Sunday and going to church.

The most sacred edifice ever reared is home; the most sacred altar the fireside.

As if an infinit God would stand angry forever and ever at the insect called man!

Christ was a blasphemer in his day, and the scribes and Pharisees crucified him for it.

The first church is the Catholic. She is the mother of all, and she believes the most.

The men who saw the miracles all died long ago. I wasn't acquainted with any of 'em.

Dignity is a mask some people wear to keep you from finding out how little they know.

Just in proportion as a nation is most religious it is nearest being a nation of paupers.

John Calvin and John Knox fitted each other like the upper and lower jaws of a wild beast.

Presbyterianism looks upon a baby as a lump of total depravity; I, as a bud of humanity.

I want to satisfy every mother rocking her baby that she is not raising kindling wood for hell.

I would rather be annihilated than sit at God's right hand and know that a man was damned.

If you go to hell it will be for not practicing the virtues which the Sermon on the Mount proclaims.

The church of Rome teaches that we can make God happy by burying girls in his penitentiaries.

If you forgiv others God will forgiv you. That's a fair bargain. You get nothing more than you earn.

Reason is the light of the soul, and if you havn't the right to follow it, what hav you the right to follow?

The churches for hundreds of years hav always been willing to trade off treasures in heaven for cash down.

It is more important to love your children and home than Christ; you can't help him and you can't hurt him.

The Episcopal church is very fond of dignity. Let everything be done decently and in order, no matter who goes to the devil.

If Christ were to come again and the churches were to try to crucify him, as they did before, I would do my best to prevent it.

The church of England exists by law and a man is saved by act of Parliament. I suppose thousands of uls hav been damned on demurrer.

Whitfield believed in slavery because the negro stolen from Africa would be benefited by the Christian example of the gentlemen who stole him.

If preachers would turn their attention to cooking for the next three months they would do more good than they hav done by preaching in the last 300 years.

A man has a better right to love his wife than love God. He cannot help God, but he can surround his wife's life with a halo of love and tenderness and joy.

"They shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover." This was foretold of the preachers. But when they get sick themselvs they fly to the doctor.

A little miracle now, right here—just a little one—would do more toward the advancement of Christianity than all the preaching of the last thirty years.

Study the religion of the body in preference to the religion of the soul. A healthy body will giv a healthy mind, and a healthy mind will destroy superstition.

Jesus Christ was a Nazarene peasant, a great, good, and serene man, and I pay him the tribute of my love and my tears. But for the theological Christ I hav no respect.

The best man ever God made deserved damning, according to the Presbyterians, the moment he was done, and then think that we must go back to the same shop for repairs!

If I meet in heaven some man whom I gouged on earth out of $300, and which God forgave me, he'll be likely to make it uncomfortable for me and make me wish I'd settled in another star.

It is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven. But when did you see a rich church member unload because of this text?

An infallible pope is no more absurd than an infallible book, and a good deal better in some ways, for you can change the pope but you can't the book, unless you keep revising it all the time.

The Protestants say miracles ceased with the apostolic age. The Catholics say they are going right along now just as much as ever they were; and I think they are. The new ones are just as good as the old.

George Chainey.

George Chainey, the new recruit to Liberalism from the orthodox pulpit, is doing a grand work in western New York and northern Pennsylvania. During the last few days he has lectured in Farmington, Macedon, Palmyra, Salamanca, Steamburg, and Randolph. Next week he will speak in Bradford, Olean, and Corry, Pa., two evenings each. Mr. Chainey would like to speak every evening during the next two months in some place in western New York or northern Pennsylvania. His terms are reasonable, and parties desiring his services are requested to correspond with the undersigned at once so that arrangments can be made some time in advance that will save railroad expense. Mr. Chainey is an able, eloquent speaker and admirably adapted to the work he has undertaken, that of giving the people mental liberty. I hope my Liberal friends in every town in the vicinity above mentioned will immediately arrange for one or more of Mr. Chainey's lectures. Friends, let us now improve this opportunity of greatly accelerating the Liberal movement in this section of country. H. L. GREEN.

Encouragement and a Correction.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I thank you for the nice bundle, forwarded last week, containing all of your foreign letters. They read as if they had written themselvs without any effort whatever. I hav no word of fault to find with them except they do not last long enough. Now that you are home again, may peace and plenty wait on you during the coming new year. To this end I hope our friends will all renew and pay up their subscriptions very promptly.

Dear Liberal friends, let us realize how much better our editors can labor if we, their readers, all do our parts without begging, even if we hav to make a little sacrifice. I giv you all a kindly greeting, and may each and every one of us liv at peace with ourselvs and all the world, making our lives gracious with a healthful, natural morality, growing each day braver, grander, more tender, thus showing our myth-believing friends that real goodness is not dependent on a hope of heaven or a cringing fear of hell.

And, friend Bennett, allow me to correct a statement I saw in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 4th in regard to Bro. Walser's paper. Instead of its being "suspended," it is to become a weekly. I received the last monthly issue yesterday, and mailed him to-day my subscription for next year. I would not hav the nice little Liberal lose a single subscriber because of a mistake. I feel much interested in Mr. Walser's conception of a town for Liberals. To some of us, footsore and weary from long journeyings over a via dolorosa, it looks like a real city of rest, a home beyond the storms.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

D. M. BENNETT, EDITOR.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of reading matter than any other journal of its kind.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 1, 1881.

New Year's Greeting.

We wish a Happy New Year to every patron of THE TRUTH SEEKER and to every reader under whose eyes these lines mey fall! May 1881 prove to be the happiest year of your lives! Many of you hav enjoyed a due degree of happiness and comfort in the years that are passed away, but may this new year excel them all in this respect!

And if by chance sickness, trouble, or sorrow should visit you, may you hav the fortitude and philosophy to bear it manfully and not cringe or quail before it! If the defenders of superstition and old theological errors asperse you and traduce you for the truth's sake, heed it not, and remember that it has ever been so since man had the courage to advance beyond the masses and oppose the musty old errors of former ages. Independent and brave thinkers hav ever had to pay this penalty to the powers of darkness and intolerance. Bear in mind that blessed are ye when bigots shall revile you and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for righteousness' sake.

According to the predictions of Mother Shipton and many prophets, astrologers, soothsayers, diviners, etc., 1881 is to be a year of dire calamities, including the baneful influence of planets, famin, pestilence, war, bloodshed, with numerous other direful evils, not the least of which is the total end of the world, according to Mother Shipton, who said,

> "The world to an end shall come
> In eighteen hundred and eighty-one."

Believing no more in Mother Shipton's prophecy than in Father Jeremiah's, Uncle Ezekiel's, or Cousin Daniel's, we look for this comparatively diminutiv globe to continue to course round the sun every three hundred and sixty-five days many thousands of years to come, as it has in millions of years in the past. So we wish all the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and THE TRUTH SEEKER itself, may find a happy, prosperous year in 1881—a year which reads backward and forward the same.

Our New Dress.

We trust our readers will be pleased with our improved appearance. The change can hardly escape the notice of the most unobserving. This type is new and clear, and even those with failing eyes can read it with ease. It is from the foundry of Ph. Heinrich, 195 William street, in this city. The change from the old to the new has necessitated an outlay of several hundred dollars, but it is hoped the investment will tell in the satisfaction imparted to our readers. There is no reason why THE TRUTH SEEKER in typographical appearance should not be equal to any other paper in the country. Where truth is found beauty should also dwell.

Extra Truth Seekers.

Two copies of this issue will be sent to every patron with the hope that they will be used in obtaining new subscribers, commencing with the new volume. We particularly request that each friend will place the extra copy sent him in the hands of a person most likely to become a subscriber. Let us again urge our readers to use their exertions to obtain as many new subscribers as possible. THE TRUTH SEEKER family is already pretty large, but it ought to be ten times as large as it is. There are tens of thousands of people scattered over the country who are not believers in theological fables, but yet take no Liberal paper. They should become acquainted with THE TRUTH SEEKER and read it from week to week. It is hoped the extra outlay incurred in sending out these thousands of duplicate copies will be bread cast upon the waters, which will return again before many days in the form of hundreds and thousands of new patrons and readers.. There are great numbers of men and women now sitting in darkness who are in need of the light which is to be found in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Those of us who are blest in making our escape from the mental slavery arising from a belief in the myths and superstitions of the dark ages of the world should make an earnest effort to enable others to enjoy the same benefits. Let us see who will send in the names of most new subscribers within the next sixty days. We hav promised an appropriate present to the one who will send in the greatest number. It is a very justifiable emulation to endeavor to excel each other in leading other less favored mortals to the light of truth. There are many souls to save. Who will do most to save them? Our Christian friends think it of the greatest importance that souls be brought to Jesus, but we think it of far greater consequence that they are brought to the temple of reason, and that they learn to know the laws of the universe and the importance of obeying them. Yes, let THE TRUTH SEEKER hav a widely-extended circulation and a healthy growth.

Reasons Why The Truth Seeker Should be Supported.

1. Because it is an outspoken, unfaltering, and fearless foe to supernaturalism, ecclesiasticism, and theological falsehoods.

2. Because, besides being an unbeliever in the fables and myths of the past, it is a firm believer in the eternality of the universe—the sum of all matter, all forces, all existences.

3. Because it is the largest Liberal paper in the world, containing more than a third more reading matter than any Materialistic or Spiritualistic paper published at the same price.

4. Because it is equally fair to Spiritualists and Materialists, giving both sides a chance to be heard.

5. Because it has no stockholders or rich bankers to furnish means to keep it going, and has only to depend on its friends and patrons who are willing to make a reasonable effort to make it a success.

6. Because its editor has been vigilant and industrious in the discharge of his duties. No American editor has put in more hours of toil in the same period.

7. Because its editor has been economical and self-denying. No editor has come nearer living on bread and water to keep his paper alive.

8. Because it was not engaged in for the purpose of making money, nor for losing money, but to giv the Liberal-minded people of America, at a reasonable price, an organ of free thought, free speech, and a free press.

9. Because its publisher, besides giving the largest and cheapest Liberal paper in the world in the seven years he has been at the work, has published a greater number of books and pamphlets, and at lower prices, than any other Liberal or Freethought publisher.

10. Because its editor, besides attending to the duties of the paper, has in seven years written more books and pamphlets—more pages—than any other Infidel or Freethought writer in the world, and in three times as many years. No Materialistic or Spiritualistic writer is known who has written eight thousand pages. But very few in any line of authorship hav written so much in a whole lifetime.

11. Because the paper is the object of the intense hatred of false teachers, the lying, hypocritical priestly class of the country. Their enmity has been distinctly shown on many occasions.

12. Because the priestly, ecclesiastical power has made the editor a victim, with the hope of crushing him and destroying the paper. On a base, false pretext they arrested and convicted him, and immured him in prison with the hope he would die and that his paper would also die.

13. Because at the behest of this intolerant ecclesiastical power he served out an unjust sentence of thirteen months in a dismal prison, at hard labor, shut up with felons and criminals of the lowest character.

14. Because, notwithstanding the cruel and malicious attacks upon him by his Christian enemies and their coadjutors, two hundred thousand Liberal-minded people of this country not only expressed warm sympathy for him, but he has been recognized and indorsed by the principal and best Freethinkers of Europe, as a co-worker with them in the cause of human progress and mental emancipation.

15. Because THE TRUTH SEEKER, from its inception, has earnestly fought the unequal warfare of unpopular truth against popular error, and will continue to do so as long as it exists; and when from old age and debility its editor lays the harness off, he trusts brave successors will assume it and keep up the irrepressible conflict with error which he has waged.

16. Because three dollars a year—twenty-five cents a month—is a very slight tax upon those who do not and should not pay any pew-rent, contribute aught to the feeding of idle priests, nothing to the building and decorating of churches, nothing toward spreading "the gospel" in heathen lands. There are but few who are not able to devote twenty-five cents a month toward the spreading of truth, especially when they receive full value every week in return.

17. Because every Liberal-minded person in the country ought to feel a laudable pride in seeing the paper liv and flourish, carrying the glad tidings of truth and mental freedom to every town and city, every village and hamlet, and to every humble household.

18. Because it is a bond of union and a medium of social exchange between those holding liberal and progressiv views. Here all—from all parts of the country—hav a chance to be heard and to commune with each other.

19. Because, while the advocates and supporters of superstition and pious fables giv in the aggregate vast sums to placate the priests and spread falsehoods, those who hav the truth and hav discarded error should be willing to contribute a little to dispel the hell of ignorance which still curses the world.

20. Because there is no better way to disseminate the truths of Liberalism than by the general circulation of Liberal periodicals and publications, and because there are none better calculated to meet this want than THE TRUTH SEEKER and its publications.

These remark are not written in a boastful spirit, but as statements of fact susceptible of the strongest proof.

"Stop My Paper."

There are many disagreeable sounds to be heard in the course of a lifetime, many phrases and sentences most unpleasant to the ear; but to a publisher none is so harsh and grating as "Stop my paper." To the publisher of a Liberal journal this is particularly disagreeable, because, in the first place, his list of supporters is pretty sure to be only of moderate length, and in the next place he has the painful conviction that the reader who says, "Stop my paper," thereby deprives himself of the mental pabulum which he stands in need of. To the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER the command to "stop" has a most dolorous sound, and he trusts that those who have the least regard for his tender feelings will not giv it. To please him and keep him in a happy frame of mind is by no means a difficult task; and the whole secret consists in having a good full list of enthusiastic patrons who do not suffer themselvs to get far in arrears, who are interested in extending the circulation of the paper, and who never grow weak-kneed and cry out "Stop."

The sum of three dollars a year, or twenty-five cents a month to help keep up the circulation of such a paper is certainly not a heavy tax, and there is probably no better way in which the same amount of money can be expended to do more real good. It is better to cut off some other luxury, to economize in some other direction, than to shut off this food for the mind, and thereby endanger the very life of the journal which most of all should be sustained. If friends and readers could only realize how much more agreeable it is to receive the name of a new subscriber than an order to "stop my paper," some would doubtless do differently from what they do. To "stop the paper" is virtually a stab at its very life, and if enough giv such stabs its death must inevitably take place.

There are some who have given such orders, and we have thought they ought not to be obeyed. We shall send this issue to such, hoping they will reconsider their vote and giv it that THE TRUTH SEEKER shall liv and flourish. But if there are those who are positiv that they want THE TRUTH SEEKER no longer, and are determined they will not pay for it more, will they be kind enough to drop us a postal card informing us of the fact? We trust, too, there are but few Liberals who wish to stop the paper while they are owing for it, and are unwilling to pay the debt. "Honor bright" should be our motto.

More Light! More Truth!

This issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER will be brought to the notice of many persons who hav not been in the habit of reading its pages. To such we wish to make an earnest appeal. If you approve of the objects and purposes of the paper, if you think it ought to be sustained in the effort it is making to educate and convince the people that there is something higher and better than a belief in myths and fables, you are requested to become a patron of the paper, and thereby render a little aid in the promulgation of nature's truths. Three dollars a year, or twenty-five cents a month, is not a heavy tax on any man, especially when you obtain in return the full value of the little investment. Let those who can remit for a year do so; let those who do not wish to go in so deep try it for six months and send $1.50; if there are others again who prefer to begin with three months they can do so at the same rates. The terms are twenty-five cents a month, whether for twelve months or for a single month. Let every one who reads these lines send in his name for a year, or some portion of it. Let those who hav become converted make an effort to convert others. Let every one who decides to take THE TRUTH SEEKER try to induce his neighbor or friend to take it also. Let the good leaven of reason and truth leaven the entire lump of humanity.

Only a Reasonable Request.

We wish not to be importunate in our demands, but now that we are beginning a new year, we urgently wish that all our readers who are in arrears would square up their accounts, and thereby furnish us the motiv power to keep the car of progress in motion. It is imperativ that we should hav the money to meet the heavy weekly bills which hav to be paid. We would gladly publish THE TRUTH SEEKER and other publications, and send them free over the entire land, but we are not able to do so. They all cost money, and a good deal of it, and we hope our friends will not ask us to wait on them longer. We need it for spreading truth and doing good. We hope no one will object to pay his just dues to aid in so worthy an object.

Of course every real truth seeker whose time has expired will renew as promptly as his circumstance, will permit.

The Cost of Publishing.

There are a few who complain because the price of THE TRUTH SEEKER is so high, and who think it ought to be furnished as cheaply as the New York Tribune, Sun, and other weekly papers which hav a very large circulation. These people arrive at a conclusion without understanding the facts of the case, and it is not strange that their conclusions are incorrect. Let us try to throw a little light upon this subject..

The most expensiv feature about getting up a paper is the type-setting. With THE TRUTH SEEKER the type is all set up expressly for this paper, while with the Tribune, and other papers of a similar class, the reading matter is principally made up from the type used in the daily issues, so that the composition for the weekly costs little or nothing. This item alone saves about three-fourths of the expense. Again, in order for a paper to be published at a low price a large circulation is very essential. It costs as much to set the type for one copy as for fifty thousand. Until Liberal papers can hav a circulation much larger than at present it cannot reasonably be expected that they can be published as cheaply as the Tribune and other papers which hav a circulation nearly ten times as large.

Another important feature in the profitable conduct of a paper is making the advertising space available. All the expenses of some papers are more than paid by the revenue from the advertising columns. With THE TRUTH SEEKER not one-fiftieth part of the expenses of the paper is thus paid. Again, THE TRUTH SEEKER has nearly double the amount of reading matter that many of the cheap weeklies afford, and of course it must cost more to get it up. These combined causes must be sufficient to convince those of ordinary perception that THE TRUTH SEEKER cannot be furnished as cheaply as the New York Tribune.

If any of our friends hav taken up the idea that THE TRUTH SEEKER is paying a profit, and that money is being made by it, they are much mistaken. It is by the practice of the strictest economy that it has lived till the present time. Were it not for the moderate profit that has been made on the books which hav been sold, it is doubtful if the paper could hav lived till the present time. It is hoped that the Liberals of America will not be too parsimonious and begrudge THE TRUTH SEEKER the means necessary to life and health. Every dollar made by it besides sustaining life shall be devoted to the dissemination of the literature calculated to enlighten and elevate mankind. To make the paper cheap, giv it a large circulation. As soon as its enlarged circulation will justify a reduced price, the reduction shall be made.

IN our next a list will be given of the English works we hav for sale, and we will now only call attention to the "National Secular Almanac," of England (Bradlaugh's). It contains a great amount of Liberal reading matter of a highly interesting character. Price twenty-five cents. We will also hav for sale a similar Secular Almanac published by Watts & Co., London. All our English books are still in the Custom House, but we will hav them soon, and be prepared to fill orders.

Letter from an Old Veteran.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: Returning your album enables me to add a word for your private ear, or, if worth your space, send it abroad.

There seems to be peace at present between us and his grace of the department of obscenity in our theocratic republic.

For which let us congratulate ourselvs in general and yourself in special and particular, on whom our double sovereign, civil and religious, laid the iniquities of us all.

Indeed, it seems to me we are passing under a new yoke of three bows—capital, the Republican party, and the evangelical church. And these three are one. And as an old English saint long ago said of the Christian trinity, "More one because three, and more three because one."

And I see that we are expected to hold our tongues and wipe and lay down our pens and accept in silent submission this diabolical conspiracy against all civil, political, social, and religious liberty, and permit it to triumph unchallenged, unresisted.

For one of the most popular Protestant pulpits in your city, or in the nation, has already fulminated its decree that unless we desist in our efforts at self-preservation, "the American people will rise in protest and carry out the purpose of the society which is seeking to incorporate into the fundamental law of the land the name and the government of God."

Probably you hav seen the audacious threat in the newspapers. If so, you can witness that, though I hav transposed the words, I hav not in the slightest perverted or disturbed their exact meaning.

And the pulpit voices the omnipotent power as well as purpose of almost the whole evangelical church, as now virtually wedded, in most unhallowed union, to the Republican party. And an accredited Christian clergyman is to be head of our theocratic, plutocratic-republican nation.

And, friend Bennett, never forget that in the church, not up in the pulpit, but down in the church, are myriads of earnest men and women, conscientious after their sort, who are just as ready to die as to kill for their religion and their God. And they are the mightiest element in the new confederation. They are its spirit, its soul, its conscience, its "in hoc signo vinces," and by that sign we are to be subdued if subjugated at all.

The wealth, the numbers, the respectability, as the world esteems it, the influence of office, the educational institutions, the trade, the commerce and the conscience of the nation, such as is counted conscience, or religion, all these are marshaled as our common foe. And all these we are to face and be conquered by them. But pardon so long a letter and believe me, dear Mr. Bennett, yours for all good words and works. PARKER PILLSBURY.

Slade's Mediumship.

The editor of the Rockland Advertiser has recently paid a visit to Dr. Slade, and published an account of the same in his paper, from which the following extracts are made. We are personally acquainted with the editor and are sure he will make no statement which is not correct or which he does not believe to be correct:

"So much has been said of Doctor Slade and his so-called mediumship that we determined, for the benefit of ourself and our readers, to make a personal investigation of his powers, and accordingly, a few days ago, we directed our steps to his residence at No. 238 West Thirty-fourth street, New York city. We were the first caller that morning, and having made the appointment by letter we found the doctor in readiness. From the reception room on the first floor we were immediately invited to the seance room, which is apparently an ordinary sitting-room, on the second floor. A cheerful fire was glowing in the grate and two large windows flooded the room with daylight. We were invited to a seat at an ordinary leafed table, which, at the doctor's suggestion, we inspected minutely and then slightly changed its position in the room. Upon placing our hands upon the table it creaked and trembled and loud raps were immediately heard. We then took two clean slates and placing a small particle of pencil between them laid them on the table before us, when the movements of the pencil were immediately distinctly heard.

"We requested the medium to hold the slates from the table and immediately beneath our chin, and under this change the writing continued. Meanwhile our hands were upon the table; we raised them slightly two or three times without the knowledge of the medium and we noted that the moment we broke our contact with the table the writing ceased. This suggested the idea of asking Dr. Slade if he could get communications alone, and his reply was, "Never." Three taps upon the slate indicated that the writing was finished, and upon examining the inner surface we found a communication in telegrapic dots and dashes, which, as transcribed by the young lady in charge of the Nyack office, reads as follows:

"'Omnis sufficientia nostra a Deo est. (All our sufficiency is from God.')

"Immediately after this came the following:

"'Dear Sir: Try the spirits. Prove all things and hold fast to that which is good. This is our object in coming to you, is to hav you prove all things before passing judgment. You don't know me. I am Wm. Perry.'

"Our next experiment was with a pocket compass, which we placed upon the table, and to our astonishment the magnetic needle was moved in any direction we requested, either verbally or mentally. Many other slate communications were received under the most varied and rigid test conditions, precluding the possibility of the medium's instrumentality in their production, and finally a lengthy communication in Latin, signed L. de Long, of which Dr. G. Bloede, of Brooklyn, has kindly given us a literal translation. This message is apparently from an ecclesiastical source, and is probably a quotation from the Catholic vulgate. We hav not yet had the time to investigate.

"Next occurred a series of remarkable physical phenomena. A slate held in our left hand was suddenly seized and carried underneath the table to the opposit side, far beyond the reach of Slade, whose feet and hands were held beneath our own; here it remained a moment in a perpendicular position and was again suddenly returned to our hand. We then placed upon the slate a pencil and held it beneath the table, when the pencil was immediately thrown, by a circuitous course, upon the table. Invisible hands appeared to pat us familiarly and tug at various parts of our apparel; an upholstered chair was moved across the room and turned upside down, and the table at which we were sitting was raised about eighteen inches from the floor, where it remained for a moment and then gradually descended.

The testimony of our senses in the above remarkable manifestations is no less reliable than in the fact that we liv, move, and hav our being. Who will present the true hypothesis upon which these marvels can be explained?

[In corroboration of the foregoing will be added the following condensed statement by Moses Hull. The thousands who know him will unitedly testify that he is a man of truth and veracity:]

NEW YORK, Dec. 23, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A few days ago I called at 238 West 34th street to see Dr. Henry Slade. A sitting was proposed. I first carefully examined the table at which we sat and all the furniture in the room, and was fully satisfied that there were no connecting wires or other machinery or accessories of fraud.

I had a pair of slates which were joined with hinges, and were entirely clean, having no writing upon them. A piece of pencil half the size of a kernel of wheat was placed between them, and they were closed and laced upon my arm, and while in that position, in broad daylight, Dr. Slade not touching them, a message was written upon them by invisible agency. I could hear the movement of the pencil while the writing was being done, and feel the consequent vibration. The following is the message which I found upon the slates when I opened them:

"Dear friends, it would do me a great favor to hav you call at 34 East 34th street and say to my friends I came to you here. I am anxious to hav them know we liv after what is called death.

"I left the earth form on the 26th day of October, 1880. My age was 66 years. I had my own private opinions as regards death, and I find I was not far out of the way. I came here last week and made this request, but it has not been noticed. I am in hopes to reach my friends and let them know I still liv. My name is CHARLES FROST."

To test the correctness of this communication I determined to visit the street and number designated. Upon calling at the house, the following dialog took place:

"Is there a family by the name of Frost residing here?"

"There is."

"Can I see some member of the family?"

"Whom do you wish to see?"

"Any member of the family. Would prefer to see Mrs. Frost."

"Who shall I say wants to see Mrs. Frost?"

"Mr. Hull, from Boston."

The servant retired, and in a few moments returned and said:

"Mrs. Frost cannot see you to-day."

"Then let me see any other member of the family."

Again the servant retired, and again returned, saying:

"If you hav anything important, send it up."

"I can't send my message. I wish to see some member of the family."

The servant retired. In a few minutes a gentleman came to the door, and in an imperious manner inquired:

"What do you want?"

"I am on a tour of inquest, of investigation, and you will understand it all in a moment. Do you know, or hav you ever heard of, Dr. Slade?"

"No, sir; I never heard of him. Who is he, and why do you ask?"

"He is a Spiritual medium."

"Well, sir, we in this house know nothing of Spiritualism or Spiritual mediums, and what is more, we want to know nothing of them."

"That will make your testimony the more valuable. It also confirms what I hav on these slates. I am an investigator of Spiritualism, and with that view a little while ago called upon Dr. Slade. When in his presence, and with no visible hand touching these slates, the pencil, while the slates were closed and lying securely on my arm, wrote this message. Please read it, and tell me whether it is true."

He read the message, and said:

"Charles L. Frost did liv here; he died on the 26th of last October; his age was sixty-six years. The facts here stated are all true; but then you could hav got them out of the newspapers."

"I liv in Boston, and usually hav enough to do without consulting the New York papers for obituary notices. This messsage came in the manner I hav described. I did not come here to persuade you that I am an honest man, or that this is an honest message, but to convince myself whether the message is true, as well as to fulfil a promis I made to the writer. I hav done my duty. The statements you say are all true. The message indicates your lack of interest in Spiritualism. You hav inadvertently confirmed that part of this communication. Good day."

The foregoing statement I am ready to confirm by oath if desired. MOSES HULL.

Communications.

Truth Seekers—Who Are They?

I often wonder if those who profess to be lovers of the truth stop to ask themselvs seriously what the truth is, and whether, after all, they are honest with themselvs and others in their professions and practices.

Truth seekers should be ready at all times, and under all circumstances, to accept it, whether found "on heathen or on Christian ground."

Truth seekers should be men and women of high moral and iutellectual courage, for along the highways and byways of truth there is not standing room for a coward.

Outside of mathematics there is little that is absolutely true, while there is much that is relativly so. Like good health, it is always more or less tinged with some shade or admixture of pain and error.

The trouble with most of us that are sincere in our efforts to reach the best possible condition of mind and body, which is the truest condition and the one most in accord with truth, lies in the fact that we carry into the investigation some preconceived opinion, some intellectual bias, that we esteem as true, and around which we desire to group other thoughts and opinions we deem important, as words and phrases in a sentence.

The researches of science and the inroads of radical thought hav cleared away much of the rubbish and many of the stumbling-blocks that impeded the march of mind. The very narrowness of ecclesiasticism has been its ruin. Its foolish attempts to dam up and destroy the swelling tides of investigation hav been as futil as the puny efforts of a child to stay the current of a brook by his tiny obstructions. The onward flow of intellectual investigation will brook no delay. It laughs at all opposition. Neither prisons nor cowardice or treason can check its progress.

What is truth is a question that each individual will answer for himself or herself, and the more important one to our individual selvs is the method we adopt in our search to obtain it.

Of this we may rest assured as a starting point, that all that is written or recorded in any form, or preserved and handed down to us by tradition, is but the opinions of human beings like ourselvs, with no right to arrogate what we shall or shall not believe; and that every "thus saith the Lord" is an unjust assumption of an authority they do not possess, which true reason at once rejects as spurious and despotic.

The mind thus freed from all theological incumbrances, reason is enabled to sift much of the chaff from many questions of importance that in their order will present themselvs.

One of the most important factors in an honest seeking for the truth is the element of justice, for it is much better to suffer wrong than do wrong. We must be careful in seeking after new truth not to discard any of the old and tried, for there is no more false position than a disrespect for the right and feeling of others.

No line or system of thought, political, religious, or social, among any people in any age of time, but what contained some grains of truth; and it is not likely that any system will be devised, however it is aided by popular science, but what for generations to come will be tinged with error.

These I hold to be self-evident truths, and these alone should dispose us to assume the proper mental and moral attitude as true investigators, as honest truth seekers.

We look back with pleasure on the great amount of good the schooling of the Episcopal, the Methodist, and the Universalist churches hav done for us. Their earnestness, conscientiousness, and persistency put to shame the laziness and cowardice of many Liberals.

We look upon the work of Mother Ann Lee as one of the greatest contributions to a true material and social state the world has ever known; and while we do not accept it as the ultimate, its demonstrations in the line of a true life are too valuable to be lightly thrust aside or talked about with levity.

We esteem the phenomena of Spiritualism as an aid to the broadest, clearest, and most educated conception of the great principle of all truth, of which material science only touches the outer rim; and upon Materialism as an excellent teacher in the same direction. As a truth seeker, or seekers, no isms should or will stand in the way.

We must lay aside all those precious little hobbies we hav been riding to our several vanity fairs, and hav only the simple object in view to attain to that condition of moral and intellectual stature that will exhibit the best and purest man and womanhood. "By their fruits ye shall know them" is a truth that no Liberal can dodge. If our searching for truth does not make us better, 'tis quite evident we hav sought in vain.

Liberals must not bolster themselvs up with the idea that they are advancing the well-being of mankind if their lives do not show the fruits of a larger generosity, a more exalted nobility, and a finer and clearer sense of justice in letter and spirit. Good words, fitly spoken, are jewels of inestimable value; but unless accompanied by good deeds are in many cases but sounding brass.

I think, as a rule, we are too captious; and while we exhibit a good deal of courage to get out of the old traces, we are apt to carp at those that are unwilling to be saddled and bridled with our new harness.

The weakest intellectual feature that seems very visible to my mind is the disposition of many advanced thinkers, and apparently earnest searchers after truth, to retain the childish disposition of man-worship. The following of Col. Ingersoll was a case in point, and one that exhibited more weakness than any orthodox following for many years. We trust the very amusing outcome will cure this childish distemper in our ranks.

If we are truth seekers our work is clear, for our one main object is to make mankind better and nobler in all respects.

All our investigations and researches will keep in view the simple principle of human culture. To attain this end we must know ourselvs; and in order to obtain this knowledge we must acquaint ourselvs with the uses and functions of every organ of the body and mind, and with the true relations of the masculin and feminin elements.

The proper relations of the sexes will at once determin the truth of the how to perpetuate the race, and will settle beyond dispute many of the false conditions that result in crime and misery.

We are losing more by timidity and cowardice than from all other causes combined. Were we as courageous for the truth as we are desirous that it should be universal, the Comstock laws would not long disgrace the statutes of the country.

Why should we as "truth seekers" care for Mrs. Grundy? No class of reformers ever made any headway that wasted time in trying to appear respectable. We are outlaws to the church, and 'tis better to realize the fact and make the best of it. They claim divine origin. We deny it. They claim a divine right to dictate what is right for men to believe, and what they shall reject. We deny it. They claim to be God's special favorits. We deny it. They claim to be better than others. We deny it. They claim that Christianity is the only true religion. We deny it. They claim that Infidelity, as they term it, is an enemy to God or godliness. We deny it. They say that we are sure to go to an orthodox hell if we don't repent. We deny it. In fact, we deny nearly all they affirm, and affirm much that they deny. There is an "irrepressible conflict" between us. They are satisfied with the little measure of truth they hav, and consign us to perpetual torments for desiring more truth and refusing to magnify their little mole hills into mountains, and crowning them kings to rule over us.

The fight is between the truth seekers and truth fearers; and as for us, we are quite willing to be a soldier in the ranks of the former, and what pity we hav to spare is reserved for those little souls whose clear eyes perceive the truth, but whose timid minds dare not face its responsibilities.

It is at this particular point in our progress that we feel to realize our true conditions and relations. The larger measure of truth is accompanied with two distinct conditions, viz., a larger degree of freedom and an increased amount of responsibility. Strange and paradoxical as it may seem, it is nevertheless true that the freedom that truth offers has more fetters than chattel slavery. Chattel slavery lessened all responsibility, for a creature robbed of all his rights was under no obligation to be honest. The truth which enlarges the mind and givs full scope to the powers of reason and reflection obligates it to dispense as freely as it receives. We hav no right to waste or hide the blessings of mental and moral illumination while others grope in mental bondage and darkness.

As members of the race we owe it to our species to make the best of our opportunities. It is true that our good offices may be refused, and very often our best intentions misconstrued and misunderstood, but even that will not justify us in neglecting our duties or in persisting in pushing forward our work.

Men and women are but grown-up children; and because old systems of thought keep them in mental childhood we must treat them as we treat our children, that know not what is best for their well-being.

Hide it as we may, it will crop out that too many Liberals feel that as they are all right as regards many of the old slavish notions, what care they how others are or feel. This is supreme selfishness; and if this were all that Liberalism or truth seeking had to offer, 'twere better if they had kept on the old shackles.

If there is one thing more sacred than another it is finding the truth, and having it find a man or woman to dwell in.

There is no trouble in telling the Liberal and truthful soul, for it is an open, generous, and brave one. It is tolerant, genial, and courteous. It is cultured in the highest sense, as its honesty and equity are as transparent as the light of noonday.

You can always rely on such a soul, for no childish fears, petty ambitions, or trifling egotism mars its judgment. Such a one has not sought the truth in vain, for it is incorporated into every fiber of his or her being, and while we would not think of worshiping such, they do teach us the possibilities of human nature, and that the condition of Nirvana is attainable.

If the truth seeker stops to count numbers and draw a comparison between the hosts of the church and state that confront us, and the little army enlisted under our banners, we should expect the timid to shrink back in utter dismay, and declare it was folly to contend with such great odds against us. What then? Shall we quietly lay down our arms and submit, or shall we not rather gird on our armor more securely, and with a sublime faith in the omnipotence of truth, sing, with Gerald Massey:

"'Tis coming up the steps of time,
And this "old world" is growing brighter.
We may not see its dawn sublime,
Yet high hopes make the heart throb lighter."

The skeptical world has been called faithless and Infidel so long that those who do not understand it hav come to believe that we are chronic doubters, having little or no faith in anything or anybody. The very reverse of this is nearer the truth. We doubt little but insincerity and error. We hav the most sublime faith in the capabilities of human nature, in its innate goodness if placed in proper relations, in its touching sympathies if properly appealed to, and in its heroic self-abnegation under many circumstances.

Those whom the church esteems irreligious, and who themselvs accept the appellation, are often the most devoutly religious in the highest and best sense.

If a willingness to serve the race by example and precept, amid the jeers and scoffs and ridicule of those they seek to elevate, is not an evidence of the best religious culture, we will yield the question and say that religion is but a name, and that name a sham.

Of this fact we are assured, that every element of true reform is an enlargement of the area of truth, and that this principle has always been the inspiring motiv that sustained the world's greatest heroes who sought its elevation.

Surely the truth seekers of this day and generation do not purpose to manifest less courage and persistency than those who hav preceded them, for if so, one of the grandest elements of human nature is in the process of decay. Instead of degeneration, let us giv evidence of a more healthy and permanent growth, and let each truth seeker feel the measure of his or her responsibility.

GEORGE LYNN.

A Plea for Union.

Mr. Editor: We hav all read H. L. Green's plea for union on the secularization of our government. All Liberals are urged to walk up and stand up and lift up in support of the great bolt at Chicago. The indignation of every friend of universal liberty is invoked to head off the Christian bigots who are at this time as busy as Satan in a foolish and pueril effort to squelch Mr. Morse's "Passion Play." They think it is sacrilegous and somewhat blasphemous, and hav, it seems, for a season, shut it off in New York, and Mr. Green springs to the defense in genuin earnestness. What does this all mean? Why leave his own well-meaning, upright coadjutors to rot in jails, and rush into this sectarian quarrel between the writer of a blasphemous stage play and the Christian sects in New York? Is friend Green "changing work," or is he in earnest to defend what the sectarians denounce as wicked, destructiv of the "religion and morals of the young?" The young are the especial care of the Grundy family.

As a Liberal, I take no stock in the "Passion Play." I think it may, I hope it will, rive the old theological foundation still deeper; but what consequence can it be to a Rationalist whether or no the life and parentage of a myth be lauded or hissed on a New York stage? Did not the Chicago resolution in favor of free transit of mailable matter shock the chastity of some Liberals? and did not some noted Christians come to their succor? Now the account is balanced. Suppose the New York editors call this a Christian country, they don't mean anything by that, more than to repeat a popular lie.

But "you see by this that the church intends to rule." Gracious goodness! The church intends to rule! Will Mr. Green tell us when the church in this country did not rule? I am seventy-five years "in the country," and my memory runneth not to the contrary.

But the Rev. Dr. Newman said something in one of his late sermons about Col. Ingersoll. Says the Rev. Newman, "There ought to be a power somewhere to close his lips and prevent him from uttering his blasphemies." They put a notably good man in Leverett-St. Jail for blasphemy, and other good men in jail for circulating esoteric anthropological publications. I suggest to the Rev. Dr. Newman to put Col. Robert in the mail bags to the address of St. Anthony. Yet some people contend, and Comstock swears, that Col. Robert shall not go in a mail-bag, but shall go where Kneeland, Lant, Heywood, and Bennett went. No doubt it would be prayer and praise to his holy conception.

We hav Garrison, Phillips, Pillsbury, Parker, Mott, Chapman, Southwick, Lundy, and Jay as our fathers and mothers, and not a son or daughter of them bolted because Garrison introduced a resolution denouncing the United States government as "a covenant with death and an agreement with hell." Garrison and his associates were high-toned reformers.

The last and most uncertain way to preserve union is to "bolt." Friend Green has repeated this reason for his withdrawal from the Liberal League Congress until he believes it, no doubt. Priest Woodbury withdrew from the old Anti-Slavery organization in 1844 for the same or similar reason. "Too far and two fast."

Yours for Freethought and a right to say so,

A. H. Wood.

What is Light?

If on opening a text-book on geology one should find stated the view concerning the creation and age of the earth that was held a hundred years ago, and this view gravely put forward as a possible or alternativ hypothesis with the current one deducible from the nebula theory, one would be excused for smiling while he turned to the title-page to see who in the name of geology should write such stuff. Nevertheless this is precisely similar to what one will find in most treatises on physics for schools and colleges if he turns to the subject of light. For instance, I quote from a book edited by an eminent man of science in England, the book bearing the date of 1873:

"There are two theories of light; one the emissiv theory; . . . the other the vibratory theory;" just as if the emissiv or corpuscular theory was not mathematically untenable sixty years ago, and experimentally demonstrated to be false more than forty years ago. Unless one were treating of the history of the science of optics there is no reason why the latter theory should be mentioned any more than the old theory of the formation of the earth. It is not to be presumed that any one whose opinion is worth the asking still thinks it possible that the old view may be the true one because the evidence is demonstrable against it, yet while the undulatory theory prevails there are not a few persons, well instructed otherwise, who still write and speak as though light has some sort of independent existence as distinguished from so-called radiant heat; in other words, that the heat and light we receive from the sun are specifically different.

A brief survey of our present knowledge of this form of energy will help to show how far wrong the common conception of light is. For fifteen years it has been common to hear heat spoken of as a mode of molecular motion, and sometimes it has been characterized as vibratory, and most persons hav received the impression that the vibratory motion was an actual change of position of the molecular in space instead of a change of form. Make a ring of wire five or six inches in diameter, and, holding it between the thumb and finger at the twisted ends, pluck it with a finger of the other hand; the ring will vibrate, hav three nodes, and will giv a good idea of the character of the vibration that constitutes what we call heat. This vibratory motion may hav a greater or less amplitude, and the energy of the vibration will be as the square of that amplitude. But the vibrating molecule givs up its energy of vibration to the surrounding ether; that is to say, it loses amplitude precisely as a vibrating tuning fork will lose it. The ether transmits the energy it has received in every direction with the velocity of 186,000 miles per second, whether the amplitude be great or small, and whether the number of vibrations be many or few. It is quite immaterial. The form of this energy which the ether transmits is undulatory; that is to say, not unlike that of the wave upon a loose rope when one end of it is shaken by the hand. As every shake of the hand starts a wave in the rope, so will every vibration of a part of the molecule start a wave in the ether. Now we hav several methods for measuring the wave lengths in ether, and we also know the velocity of movement. Let v = velocity, l = wave length, and n = number of vibrations per second, then $n = \frac{v}{l}$ and by calculation the value of n varies within wide limits, say from 1×10^{14} to 20×10^{14}. But all vibrating bodies are capable of vibrating in several periods, the longest period being called the fundamental, and the remainder, which stand in some simple ratios to the fundamental, are called harmonics. Each of these will giv to the ether its own particular vibratory movement, so that a single molecule may be constantly giving out rays of many wave lengths precisely as a sounding bell givs out sounds of various pitches at one and the same time.

Again, when these undulations in the ether fall upon other molecules the latter may reflect them away or they may absorb them, in which case the absorbing molecules are themselvs made to vibrate with increased amplitude, and we say they hav been heated. Some molecules, such as carbon, appear to be capable of stopping undulations of all wave lengths and to be heated by them; others are only affected by undulations of particular wave lengths, or of wave lengths between special limits. In this case it is a species of sympathetic vibration. The distinction between the molecular vibrations and the undulations in ether that result from them must be kept in mind, as must also the effect of the undulations that fall upon other molecules. To one the name heat is applied, to the other the name of radiant energy is given; and it matters not whether the undulations be long or short, the same molecule may giv out both.

Now let a prism be placed in the path of such rays of different wave length from a single molecule, and what is called the dispersiv action of the prism will separate the rays in the order of their wave lengths, the longer waves being less refracted than the shorter ones; but the energy of any one of these will depend upon the amplitude of undulation, which in turn will depend upon the amplitude of vibration of the part of the molecule that originated it, but in general the longer waves hav greater amplitude, though not necessarily so. Consequently, if a thermopile be so placed as to receive these various rays, and their energy be measured by its absorbtion on the face of the pile, each one would be found to heat it, the longer waves more than the shorter ones, simply because the amplitude is greater, but for no other reason, for it is possible, and in certain cases is the fact, that a short wave has as much or more energy than a longer one. If the eye should take the place of the thermopile it would be found that some of these rays did not affect it at all, while some would produce the sensation of light. This would be the case with any waves having a wave length between the limits of, say 1-37,000 of an inch and 1-60,000 of an inch; any shorter waves will not produce the sensation of light. If instead of the eye a piece of paper washed in a solution of the chloride of silver should be placed where the dispersed rays should fall upon it, it would be found that only the shorter waves would affect it at all, and among these shorter ones would be some of those rays which the eye could not perceive at all.

It was formerly inferred from these facts that the heat rays, the light rays, and the chemical rays were different in quality; and some of the late books treating upon this very subject represent a solar spectrum as being made up of a heat spectrum, a light spectrum, and an actinic or chemical spectrum, and the idea has often been made to do duty as an analogy in trinitarian theology; nevertheless it is utterly wrong and misleading. There is no such thing as an actinic spectrum; that is, there are no such rays as special chemical rays; any given ray will do chemical work if it falls upon the proper kind of matter. For instance, while it is true that for such salts of silver as the chloride, the bromide, etc., the shorter waves are most efficient; by employing salts of iron one may get photographic effects with wave lengths much too long for any eye to perceive. Capt. Abney has photographed the whole solar spectrum from one end to the other, which is sufficient evidence that there are no special chemical rays. As to the eye itself, certain of the wave lengths are competent to produce the sensation we call light, but the same ray will heat the face of a thermopile or produce photographic effects if permitted to act upon the proper material, so there is no more propriety in calling it a light ray than in calling it a heat ray or an actinic ray. What the ray will do depends solely upon what kind of matter it falls upon, and all three of these names, light, heat, and actinism, are names of effects of radiant energy. The retina of the eye is itself demonstrably a photographic plate having a substance called purpurine secreted by appropriate glands spread over it in place of the silver salts of common photography. This substance purpurine is rapidly decomposed by radiant energy of certain wave lengths, becoming bleached, but the decomposition is attended by certain molecular movements; the ends of the optic nerves, which are also spread over the retina, are shaken by the disrupting molecules, and the disturbance is the origin of what we call the sensation of light. But the sensation is generally a compound one, and when all wave lengths which are competent to affect the retina are present, the compound effect we call white or whiteness. When some of the rays are absent, as, for instance, the longer ones, the optical effect is one we call green or greenness; and the special physiological mechanism for producing the sensation may be either three special sets of nerves, capable of sympathetic vibration to waves of about 1-39,000, 1-45,000, and 1-55,000 of an inch in length, as Helmholtz has suggested, or, as seems to the writer more probable, the substance purpurine is a highly complex organic substance made up of molecules of different sizes and requiring wave lengths of different orders to decompose them, so that a part of the substance may be quite disintegrated, while other molecules may be quite entire throughout the visual space. This will account for most of the chromatic effects of vision, for complementary colors, and for color blindness, by supposing that the purpurine is not normally constituted. This is in accordance with experimental photography, for it has been found that the long waves will act only upon heavier molecules. It is true, vision may be good when there is no purpurine, but there is no doubt but that this substance is secreted in the eye, and that it is photographic in its properties, and so far must be taken as an element in any theory of vision; but the chief point here considered is that objectivly light does not exist independent of the eye, that light is a physiological phenomenon, and to speak of it otherwise is to confound a cause with an effect. It is, hence, incorrect to speak of the velocity of light; it has no velocity. It is radiant energy that has the velocity of 186,000 miles a second. It is incorrect to say we receive heat from the sun. What we do receive is radiant energy, which is here transformed into heat. This is not hypercritical, but is in accordance with the knowledge we hav to-day. The old nomenclature we use, but without definit meaning; the latter is left to be inferred from the connection or context. If a man should attach to the water main in a city a properly constructed water-wheel, the latter will rotate; but it would not be proper to say that he received rotation from the reservoir. What he received was water with a certain pressure; in other words, a certain form of energy, which he transforms into rotation by the appropriate means; but by substituting other means he can make the same water pressure maintain a vibratory motion, as with the hydraulic ram valve, or let it waste itself by open flow, in which case it becomes ultimately molecular vibration, that is, heat. The analogy holds strictly. The trouble all comes from neglecting to distinguish between different forms of energy—energy in matter and energy in ether.

A New Year's Greeting.

Dear Friend Bennett: I do not know how I can better begin the New Year than by doing something for my own special pet paper, The Truth Seeker.

The world is full of good people and good papers, but the people are all possessed of a variety of tastes, propensities, aims, and desires, and no two of them are ever entirely alike, and so we always feel certain preferences and nearnesses for certain ones, and therefore while admiring and loving all that is good, and having a broad generalness of affection for very many persons and papers, I confess to feeling a special love for a special few, and as is very natural, I want all the world to see and appreciate the peculiar merits of these my personal pets, and help me make them more useful and desirable than they already are, and hence these few following words to the readers.

Just now is the very best time for us, who so love our darling Truth Seeker, to each one of us put shoulder to the wheel and do our share of work for it, and show by our deeds our appreciation of the efforts of its brave, indefatigable, industrious, and patient editor, D. M. Bennett, to make it the very broadest and boldest as well as most useful, interesting, and instructiv of all the Liberal papers. Its platform is so large that there is opportunity for all shades of belief, opinion, and doctrin to be discussed in its pages. The Spiritualist and Freelover, the Mormon and monogamist, the Catholic and Atheist, the Republican, Democrat, or Greenbacker, the tetotalist and moderationist, each and all hav a chance to prove, if possible, the especial doctrin they prefer, even though in direct opposition to the belief of the editor. And can we prize these privileges too highly or do too much to preserve them? Shall we be content to merely pay for our one copy of the paper and giv nothing more for the good of so glorious a cause as universal mental liberty?

While Mr. Bennet givs away thousands of copies each week, shall we not do something? Methinks I hear from each and all of you the jubilant cry, "We will!" And amen, say I, and here is my dollar to back it, to pay for two fifty-cent subscribers, who, I trust, will themselvs become admirers and workers for the cause. Begin, each one of you, this New Year, with a clean Truth Seeker record by paying all that is due, and getting as many new subscribers as you can, and those who cannot get one can do just as much by paying for three months for some appreciativ reader, thus giving a New Year's gift to a friend and glad encouragement to our brave and noble leader, D. M. Bennett, who, I trust, will not feel too modest to lay this greeting before his many readers, so that all may hav the chance to know that "many littles make a mickle," and our many aids will giv our pet paper such a New Year's boom as will put it high and dry above all danger of debt, trials, or discouragements.

"Our paper must now be dedicated
To truth's supreme control,
To virtue and progressiv thought,
Those riches of the soul."

Respectfully and hastily, Elmina D. Slenker.

W. F. Jamieson is now East to hold his debate with Moses Hull in this city (Republican Hall), Jan. 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th, on Materialism and Spiritualism. Address until Jan. 7th care of The Truth Seeker, New York.

Letters from Friends.

Shall the Journey Round the World be Made?

Two weeks ago we published a letter from friend D. C. Coleman, of Modesto, Cal., proposing that we make a journey round the world, and agreeing to be one of a necessary number of contributors to advance five dollars to make up a fund for the journey, and each contributor to be entitled to a book containing the letters of travel. We accepted the proposition, saying that if the necessary funds were furnished we would undertake the journey, and return to each contributor for the advance made two full volumes containing descriptions of the sights and incidents of the long journey. Since then numerous letters hav been received upon the subject. A very cheering one was from Mrs. C. M. Piper, Augusta, Mich. (which has strangely got mislaid), in which she spoke in flattering terms of our letters, ordering three copies of "An Infidel Abroad," and agreeing to contribute five dollars toward the journey round the world, and ten dollars if necessary. The following are letters from other friends bearing upon the same subject:

SNOWVILLE, VA., Dec. 24, 1880.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: We hav been thinking over the proposition of thy making a trip round the world, and hav come to the conclusion that we can not better invest five dollars than to send it to thee for this purpose, We shall probably never be able to see any of these far-off places ourselvs, and the next best thing will be to enjoy them through the eyes of an "Infidel abroad," who not only lets no important object pass his scrutiny, but has a happy faculty of letting others see with his eyes even better than they could with their own.

And we also realize that the more thee learns, sees, and knows, the better qualified thee will be to lead and guide us in the right way and tell us the highest and best truths.

But we shall miss thee every time we think of THE TRUTH SEEKER office and thy vacant chair. Still, as there is no good unmixed with ill, we are prepared for some slight drawbacks to so hopeful a plan as this.

We send our best wishes, and trust that not only three hundred friends, good and true, will follow our example, but many will feel able and willing to send double or quadruple the sum.

Affectionately, ISAAC and ELMINA.

CROSSWICKS, N. J., Dec. 26, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: In a recent issue of The TRUTH SEEKER there is a proposition for thee to resume thy travels abroad, making a tour of the world, and that a fund be raised for that purpose by a subscription of five dollars each. This arrangement meets my approbation, as THE TRUTH SEEKER makes no objection, and is willing to contribute to the pleasure of his patrons by writing a series of letters of his sight-seeing while on his journey. I will contribute ten dollars to a fund to aid in this enterprise. I hope there will be an early and generous response, not even putting off until the New Year to begin the good work. C. S. ELLIS.

HASTINGS, MICH., Dec. 21, 1880.

BRO. BENNETT: I wish to promptly second the motion of your California correspondent that THE TRUTH SEEKER constituency send you on a tour round the world and hav you giv us a pen picture of China and Japan. I agree with your many correspondents who hav complimented your "Letters from Europe." From them I derived a clearer idea of the habits and customs of the people, and the general aspect of the country than I ever had. After reading the first letter I felt that I had been on a voyage across the ocean, and just so with all the principal points visited and described.

Now for my part, a description, especially of China and Japan, written in your plain and easy style, would surely be very interesting. I will subscribe five dollars in support of the project if the requisit amount be raised at the time stated.

In addition to the fact that each subscriber would receive his money's worth in the books, it would be highly gratifying to thus add another to many honors of which the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been the recipient, and also show your enemies, such as Messrs. A., B. and C., that their efforts to crush, hav, and ever will, fail. Hoping you will receive the three hundred orders for "An Infidel Around the World." I remain,

Sincerely yours, GEO. WOOD.

FARLEY, IOWA, Dec. 22, 1880.

Count me one that will giv five dollars toward sending you around the world on the terms you offer. There ought to be one thousand such in this country. That would giv you a good send off. I think I can find one or two more here by a little effort. You will hear from me substantially in a few days. Our Library Association intend buying a few books soon. It will be a small order, but every little helps both you and the cause we hav at heart.

Respectfully, H. GILMORE.

BENTON HARBOR, MICH., Dec. 20, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I like your religion, but damn your politics. You will please find inclosed a five-dollar money order to pay my subscription.

Now in regard to your trip around the world, count me one of three hundred to subscribe five dollars for the trip; and if you go, don't forget to visit the rock temples at Ellora, India, and giv them a critical examination, and establish the fact whether they are cut out of the solid rock or not. I like your letters from Europe very much.

Very respectfully, N. CASTLE.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Dec. 22, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Put me down for one of the three hundred, as suggested. I doubt if you can serve the cause of truth in any better way. Your apology for occupying so much space is quite superfluous. In what way could your readers be more instructed and interested? Your descriptions are vivid and your applications are admirable, and we will be lonesome when they are ended.

Very respectfully, E. N. KINGSLEY.

NILES, MICH., Dec. 20, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: My son, Dr. C. R. Rowley, subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER principally in anticipation of reading your letters, which were written during your late tour in Europe. He was very much interested in them, and he says if you conclude to make the tour round the world, as has been proposed in a late issue, you can put his name down for the five dollars upon the terms stated, viz., that he is to receive the two "fat" volumes containing your working up of all the places you may visit. And, by the way, I feel quite confident that I could take quite a list of subscribers in this state for such a work. Fraternally,

C. S. ROWLEY.

DES MOINES, IOWA, Dec, 24, 1880.

READERS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I read in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 18th that D. M. Bennett, editor, proposes to anew peregrinate our planet, if three hundred of his friends will send him five dollars each to establish funds with which to commence his enterprise, promising in return for such favors to present each contributor of five dollars with two volumes brim-full of such interesting matter as will be gathered up on the journey.

Now here is an enterprise that comes within the range of easy possibilities. And judging by the character of Mr. Bennett's European letters we should hav a fund of reading matter that will be worth ten times the outlay.

Besides, his interesting letters to the paper will engage the attention of a great variety of readers, thus opening the avenues to more extensiv Freethought reading. So, by all means, let us send our hero out into the world to gather fresh stores of knowledge, where he will for a time be free from the evil influences of an atmosphere into which such detestable creatures as Comstock, Colgate, Benedict, etc., breathe. These caused him to drink the dregs of Christian gall at Watkins, in Ludlow, and at Albany. As he suffered mentally and physically, we suffered in degree with him, by the injustice done him and our common cause. But let us liv down the past as best we can and send him forth to gather fresh knowledge of men and things which he will send to us in due time, like a rich harvest of intellectual joys, real pictures of things, and Mr. Bennett will see them devoid of mawkish sentimentality.

Hoping this enterprise will meet with general approval, I pledge myself for five dollars, to raise when called for. A. CLEGG.

Several others hav written in a similar spirit. G. W. Smith, North Huron, N. Y., says, "You can count me in on D. C. Coleman's proposition." Chas. C. Moore, Clement, Ill., "I will be one to contribute on D. C. Coleman's plan and take a copy of the books." D. J. Bown, Meriden, Conn., writes that he will take two shares and two copies. J. Josephus, Pittsburgh, Pa., adds his name to the list. Wm. Smith, Geneva, N. Y., says he will contribute to the enterprise to the extent proposed. Daniel E. Ryan, New York, says he will be one; E. Gastineau, also of this city, says the same. E. R. Shoemaker, Waterloo, Ind., and others, do the same.

It remains with friends to decide whether we shall go or not. If sufficient funds to defray the expenses are forthcoming, we will not back out. Upon inquiry, however, we find the probable expense of the journey will be greater than our estimate. Four or five hundred will be required to giv five dollars each to make the undertaking safe. It would hardly do to get two-thirds of the way around the world, and then hav the money giv out; it would be an unpleasant predicament to be placed in. Of course those who are willing to contribute to the "Round the World Fund" will let us hear from them.—ED. T. S.

A LETTER FROM LONDON.

DEAR FRIEND: I hav received a parcel of TRUTH SEEKERS this week for which please accept my very best thanks. I hav not yet found time to read them all, but am hard at them in all spare moments. I am particularly interested in your letters from Europe, and at times greatly amused at your descriptions of the churches and their contents.

On Wednesday evening last Mr. Flint and myself went to the Hall of Science to hear a discussion between Mrs. Besant and A. Hatchard, a full report of which you will see in next week's National Reformer. The hall was well filled, I might truth say packed. The parson had the first half-hour, and no doubt did his best to prove that the Jesus of the gospels was a historical character. He declaimed very loudly at times, and if noise was argument would hav won his case. Mrs. Besant replied in her usual calm manner, and by the force of pure reason confuted her opponent and his authorities. At the end of half an hour she sat down and he rose to reply. He was very excited and waxed wroth, completely losing his head, He wandered from the question altogether, relating how he had been an army chaplain and wasn't afraid of anybody, and the audience had better mind what they were about and let him alone, as he would not be laughed at by anybody there—he knew all about Infidels and could confute them all. All this tirade, as you may imagin, caused bursts of satirical laughter, which was like a red flag to a bull, and almost all the rest of his time was taken up in defying his hearers and Charles Bradlaugh, who was on the platform, but took no part in the discussion. The chairman at last had to call the reverend gentleman to order, and get him to pursue the subject, but he really had very little to say when his authorities had been shown to be very sorry ones. The tables of the disputants contained several books of reference, and the audience was particularly amused when the parson on three separate occasions said, "I hold here in my hand" such and such a book; "this is a very rare work, and one which I obtained with great difficulty, and if Mrs. Besant has not a copy I shall be very much pleased to make her a present of it at the end of the meeting." The difficulty he seemed to hav in getting his books struck every one as somewhat comical. There is another debate to take place next Wednesday between the same individuals, at which I hope to be present.

When you see Prof. Rawson, kindly giv him my best regards. I wish I could hav seen more of him when in England.

My mother wishes me to say she was glad to hear of your safe arrival, and sends her kind remembrances. Yours fraternally, JOHN DRYDEN.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years and a half, and it is needless for me to say that I like it more and more as I become better able to appreciate the noble principles it so ably defends. It is so well freighted with substantial food for thought, furnished by the ablest and most heroic thinkers of the past ages, as well as those of the present, upon all subjects pertaining to the welfare of mankind in this world, and your duties as its distinguished editor are so onerous that it seems almost like imposing on good nature for your humble servant and patron, who has but just learned the A B C's of Liberalism, to send you a letter that will take up some of your valuable time and space which might be far more profitably filled. But after reading your article entitled "A Few Plain Words," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 27th ult., I resolved to write to you without delay and send you my subscription for the year, beginning on Jan. 27, 1881; and I was fortunate enough just then to get you a new subscriber for a year, so inclosed please find a post-office order for six dollars.

I was sorry to learn that, despite your rare abilities, energy, and perseverance in the pursuit of truth, and your great economy, you are again in circumstances incompatible with your happiness. However, there is nothing surprising in this, for it has been the fate of nearly all the noblest defenders of oppressed humanity that preceded you in the same cause to be very poorly paid for their great, persistent, and in the end successful effort to elevate their fellow-men to a strict sense of their rights and duties. But in your case, now it is made all the more painful to every lover of justice by the fact that your troubles are caused by the neglect of a large number of your readers, who hav received in useful knowledge from THE TRUTH SEEKER many times the value of the price charged for it. I hav no doubt that some may be unable to pay, but the most of them can pay if they only make up their minds to. Neglect to do the right thing in the right time causes a great deal of unhappiness among us and greatly retards the progress we all desire to see. I hope that Freethinkers, with their keen sense of right, will be the last to show ungratefulness to their benefactors.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has, with untiring energy and indomitable courage, defended all the rights claimed by the most radical in our ranks. Its editor even went to prison in defense of another man's right to differ with him. This act of his should prompt us all to giv him a helping hand in his present troubles. We will all be the happier for so doing, and thus prove ourselvs worthy the name of Liberals.

I read the "Letters from Europe" with great interest, and I believe they alone were worth a year's subscription. Inclosed find fifty cents in stamps to help THE TRUTH SEEKER. This is the best I can do at present. I hope you hav not appealed to your readers in vain. Accept my best wishes for your health and the prosperity of THE TRUTH SEEKER

Yours truly, PAUL GARIEPY.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav been a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months, and as I hav not seen a single letter from New Hampshire, I thought

I would write a few lines and let you and your readers know that there are a few Liberals in the old Granit state. I don't think that over a tenth of the people of Acworth and vicinity are members of any church, and about the same number are Liberals (though some of them are of the timid class); the rest—well, I don't know what they are, and I do not believe they know themselvs. They are not Christians; they don't believe that all of the Bible is true, but believe some of its fables are true, because they hav never heard the other side of the story; but don't know what Liberalism is.

I lend my papers and books where I think they will do the most good. I am trying to get some of them to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but they all plead poverty, but I am as poor as most of them. I know I can't afford to take so high-priced a paper, but had rather go without something else. And then I hav adopted a novel way to get the money to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Three years ago I found a sprout in my potatoes, and by carefully selecting the seed for two years hav got a new variety, which I call the Infidel potatoes (and they are the best I raise). Last spring I prepared a small piece of ground to plant with my Infidel potatoes, and dedicated the crop to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I planted, cultivated, and harvested them on Sunday, sold the crop, and paid for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I think my time was a great deal better spent than if I had gone to church to hear a minister preach ignorance. The plan worked so well this year I shall try it again next year.

Now there are but very few that can't get three dollars by a little extra work evenings or Sundays, or by saving a few cents a week from their expenses they can get enough to take a Liberal paper or buy a few cheap book. I know of poor women in this town who take in sewing nights to get money to pay their minister's tax with. I think Liberals ought to do as much to spread the truth as Christians do to perpetuate falsehoods. J. A. ALLAN, JR.

FRIEND BENNETT: Since my last to you I hav had the misfortune to lose my companion. She died suddenly at Valley Falls, Kan., after an illness af about twelve hours. She was a noble, true, pure woman, devoid of superstition and blessed with intellectual faculties which enabled her to merit superiority to many of her age, and, naturally enough, her loss is irreparable.

I delivered a course of lectures at Valley Falls and vicinity, which were well received. I wish to be considered a worker in the cause, and will be so recognized by the Liberal fraternity as soon as my surroundings will admit of an introduction. Excuse this letter; I am in no condition to write to-day. I inclose you names of a few who hav never taken your paper, as per request. M. FILLMORE GREEN.

MR. EDITOR: The Republican and Democratic parties, we discover by the election returns, are nearly equal in numbers. This seems to me to be the Liberals' golden opportunity, for we, if united, can hold the balance of power. Now, then, let us urge the demands of Liberalism upon the coming administration, and if they are granted we shall know the Republican party is in favor of common honesty, and therefore good enough for Liberals; but if these demands are not granted, then it will prove that, being not for us, they are against us and on the side of downright dishonesty. If such be the case it would be desirable that the Democratic party should not disband, for it may yet be our only salvation. We remember with gratitude that it was the Democratic senators who prevented the God-in-the-Constitution party from putting their bloody old Jew God into the most sacred of all documents, the Constitution of the United States. But we hav some faith yet in the Republican party. Let us test it and see if our faith is in vain. If such should be the case, then by virtue and authority of our united numbers let us put the reins of government into the hands of the Democrat party and prove if they hav any common honesty. Yes, let us prove all things and hold fast that which is good. Yours truly, ROBERT SWAIL.

MR. EDITOR: As so many hav set to for the object of giving their views, why should not I giv mine? I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 27th a call to Liberals to aid in pushing on the Liberal car, although not expressed in those words. Now I would ask of what is this Liberality composed—of Spiritual, Atheistic, Infidel, and half orthodox principles all combined? Let me giv my views of Spiritualism. I saw in a number of your paper some time ago a Spiritual dose by Isaac Paden. His best argument was to this point—that the life of a cornstalk passed into the ear of corn, and that proved a future existence.

I wonder what becomes of the life of a stalk that has no ear, and does it go where the ear ought to be and then fall off? I hav got over the orthodox distemper, and do not intend to catch the Spiritual epizootic if I can help it, and I think I can.

And if I don't intend to believe in a God perched up in the clouds or above them, and nobody now knows where—and those who hav known hav forgotten—I say, if I can't believe in this big thing I will not believe in this little one called spirit without better evidence than Mr. Paden's; for a big God is as possible as a little spirit.

Let me try one of Mrs. Slenker's arguments. She says sexual intercourse out to be only for procreation, and outside of that should be utterly avoided; and she undertakes to prove that this is likely to become practical by referring to the slow growth of temperance societies at first, and then the after-result of long-continued exertions.

But let us think awhile. If we are Freethinkers, let us see if there is any difference in the two natures, that of the sexual passions and of the appetite for intoxicating drinks. The first is natural, and the organs are natural. The other is artificial. The child that never tastes of rum will not thirst for it, and was not born with a rum-glass by its side, in its hand, or any place else.

I will send you one dollar to aid you in paying your expenses caused by comstock & co., all spelle with little letters. CHAS. CHAMBERS.

MR. EDITOR: We hav taken your paper about a year and think it the best paper we know of. We read with much interest your letters while you were in the Albany Penitentiary We often thought what cruel, unmerciful Christians President Hayes and wife must be to keep you in torment in that terrible prison when they could hav released you. Your letters from Europe were very interesting and instructiv. It is indeed strange that people with half common sense will be so fooled by those hypocritical old priests. I thank you for doing the greatest work that has been done to liberate the minds of the people from the degrading influence of Christian creeds and dogmas. Find inclosed a draft for $2.93. I wish you success in your noble work and hope you may liv to see the good time coming when Comstock laws will be blotted out and men and women will join in making laws that cannot be used to clog the wheels of progress.

Your friend, LURY A. CRAPSEY.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: I am so delighted to know you are safe home again, and those letters from Europe are so grand they are worth three dollars to any person who read them carefully. Now, right here I want to say to the patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER, pay your dues. I know it is not pleasant for Mr. Bennett to be reminding you of your arrears. I would rather do without coffee than be reading the glorious TRUTH SEEKER and be in debt for it. Always pay in advance, and it will soon become second nature. Mr. Bennett, the greatest writer of the age, is at work again, and we must furnish the means or the machine will stop. Truly yours, SARA VAN SICKLE.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find $3 as subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year.

Your European correspondence is excellent reading for me, and I hope this tour will giv you great satisfaction in your happy old days. You hav seen sights which I would like to hav seen myself, Your reception by our English friends must hav been grand, and pleased me very much. Apropos, won't you send me a copy of your diploma?

Very friendly yours, C. R. LEONHAUSER.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 on subscription. I hope to catch up some time. We find we could as well go without food for the body as the brain; in fact, I think the more the mental digests, the less the physical requires. We were glad to hear that you were able to break away from the hum-drum life of an editor and seek in travel that vigor and strength you so much needed. We see that while you were enjoying the sweet recreation (which no one knows better how to enjoy than yourself), you were gaining seeds of truth and intelligence to be scattered far and wide over our land, and it is hoped it may fall upon good soil, and thereby do much good to the cause of liberty.

Respectfully yours, H. E. HOWARD.

BROTHER BENNETT: I don't want to be among your delinquent subscribers. I would as soon think of going to a hotel and getting my dinner for three hundred and sixty-five days and six hours and not pay for it. I would not sponge the reading of another person's paper. If I think enough of a paper to read it, I will pay for the same. I hav received many sample copies of papers, and some of them I want to take and intend to soon. The Physiologist is one. No one will make a friend of Leroy and Flora Dutton by going out of their way to find fault with our friends Bennett, Mendum, and Seaver, and think we will furnish them means to do it with.

I hav got one more three months' subscriber. Please take it out of the order; the balance old Santa Claus leaves to get a good turkey for Christmas. I want to get all the subscribers for you I can. I don't want a premium for doing my duty; it is glory enough to help you in time of distress.

My friend, there are no words to tell the joy I felt at your release from prison. My heart was so glad for our only D. M. Bennett is coming home.

I am your friend, FLORA DUTTON.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find inclosed $1.25 to pay dues, and $3.25 to pay subscription. I could not tell when my subscription expired or I would hav renewed at once. The three dollars sent you last year was the best-spent money of my life Your letters from Europe alone are worth the price. All who read THE TRUTH SEEKER will in the end be made better men and women. The growth in honesty, consistency, and fairness can be seen in any one who reads your paper. I would like to hear of its increased circulation a thousandfold. Very respectfully,

CHARLES C. MOORE.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Though a stranger, to me you seem a friend. Your visit to the cathedrals, churches, fine palaces, and many other points of interest, in Europe is ended, and as a consequence of time your letters must soon end. They hav been very interesting and much enjoyed by our little home circle, for in mind we hav traveled with you, and now we bid you welcome home, where scenes more natural greet the eye.

Please accept the inclosed as a wee mite toward aiding your paper in its good work.

Hoping you may be blessed with a happy and prosperous New Year, I will close. Yours in truth,

ISORA PIPER.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: You will please put me down for one copy of the book containing your letters from Europe. So far I hav read them all, and I must say I hav enjoyed them about as well as anything I ever read in my life. They are always looked for and read before any other matter in the paper, We like the paper generally, and pass it around as soon as we hav read it. I hav taken it since your Humphrey-Bennett discussion, and one year extra besides, and I've not one copy left for any reference. If that don't get the subscribers I'm beaten. I think I can get one or two more to take a copy. I will if I can do so, as all your writings are good to read. Fraternally, W. HOLGATE.

D. M. BENNETT: I congratulate you most heartily on your safe return home.

With renewed determination and improved health I feel sure THE TRUTH SEEKER will not be allowed to flag in the slightest degree, but will continue to be the most interesting paper now published in the interest of Freethought.

I sincerely wish its circulation could be increased twofold every three months. You know how I am hampered here, but still I will do all I can to help enlarge the sphere of its usefulness. I inclose three dollars to renew for 1881. J. A. WALSHAL.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am once more reminded that my subscription is out and that you desire it to be renewed. I know you would prefer it for a year, and I would rather make it so; but having so many ways for my small salary, I am compelled to divide and take smaller doses. So you will please find a dollar inclosed and will continue the paper in accordance with that amount.

Glad to hear you are safe back from your Brussels trip and that you had a right good time. I hav followed you along by the light of your European letters with interest and pleasure. I can agree with one of your correspondents in saying that the literary labor you hav accomplished would kill six government clerks. How you ever got time to see all you did and then write it out so elaborately as you hav, and get your proper sleep too, is a mystery to me. I think we can call you the "machine writer." I was hoping you had got an audience with the pope, and am real sorry you did not. I think it would hav been a rich exhibit as you would hav shown it up, the meeting between God's great vicegerent on earth and the biggest blatant Infidel of modern times. Why did you not push your way in anyway? I am sure your nose is good enough and handsome enough to be poked before the pope or any other dignitary, divine or mundane. And I think your nose has a backing able to take care of it too, let who oppose that may, pope or plebeian. After giving us such a wilderness of churches, monastries, etc., etc., in and about Rome and other places, to miss seeing the pope was almost a fault in you, but we will let you off this time.

Yours truly, C. GARWOOD.

DEAR BRO. BENNETT: I inclose you three dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER from Jan. 1, 1881, to same date in 1882. My old friend, you can scarcely imagin what an immense satisfaction it is to me to enjoy the privilege of reading so excellent a paper as THE TRUTH SEEKER. Some three or four years since Dr. E. Moyer showed me the first copy I ever saw of the paper, and I was almost about to say I had rather lose one-half of my farm than forego the pleasure of reading so grand a sheet as the ever-welcome TRUTH SEEKER. Your letters from Europe are worth more than three times the subscription fee. Depend upon me as a life subscriber, and also my assistance in getting you new ones. You certainly deserve the support of every true, sensible Infidel in our country. You can well afford to do without the high-toned assistance of "The Liberal Association" folks when so many thousand common-sense Infidels are willing to render you assistance. Your friend and brother, SOLOMON HILL.

"AN INFIDEL ABROAD"—or letters written during our ten weeks in Europe—850 pages, with an index, is printed and in the binder's hands. Orders are now in order. Those wishing them to contain a steel-plate engraving of the author should say so, as a portion will be put up in that way. Price $1.50.

R. MCCLEAR writes: "I like 'John's Way' very much, and so do all here who hav read it or heard it read. I inclose a dollar for six more copies."

A New Year's Welcome to Truth.

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Onward and sunward is the truth's delight;
It leaps to morning from the womb of night;
It loves the glorious splendor of the sky,
Therefore we seek the truth with courage high;
With ardent soul unto the hights sublime
Where glows the secret wealth of endless time.

Some dread the truth, it looms so dark and strange,
And brings to honored custom such wild change;
It seems a whirlwind that will rack the earth,
And raze the temple where love once had birth
And saw the gladsome vision of the day;
Truth is a giant that men still would slay
Because it is so vast and swift and grand,
And rages with such thunder through the land,
And whirls discomfort when they dream of peace,
And will not from its dreadful tumult cease;
Men hate the truth for its relentless force.
Would bind it from its fierce wide-wandering course;
Make it a petty slave, a smiling clown,
To weave for them the glow of fashion's crown,
But truth despises this small narrow play,
And still unto the stars it wheels away;
It would be monarch of the farthest zone,
And so men fear it and its fire disown.
But we do take the truth because we know
That in its pathway lies the heavenly glow,
That in its darkness lurks a noble world
That by its living breath will be unfurled;
We know that it will bring to golden shore
From the rude billow and the tempest's roar;
That it will flash immortal hope and joy,
And gleam the splendid light without alloy;
That it will turn crude nature into blaze
Of cosmic grandeur, into jeweled days
Of wondrous peace and quiet and delight;
That it will be sweet angels to the sight,
And all the hidden worth of things unroll,
And clothe with royal garniture the soul.
Ah, though a giant, still it works in love,
And rings the music of the spheres above,
And we will hail it with the glad New Year,
And with the march of time resound its cheer.
We greet it, ancient as the starry frame,
Yet fresh as every morning's dewy flame;
We fling the laurel o'er its conquering brow,
The only God to whom we giv our vow.

Onward and sunward, truth, pursue thy way,
Through the bleak night unfold thy sparkling day;
Through desert-pilgrimage we follow thee
To thy unbounded bright felicity.
We know thou wilt reward our every toil,
And sprinkle blossoms on the barest soil,
We seek thee, seek thee, seek thee evermore,
For thou alone canst stainless wealth outpour;
Through thee the light of heaven and earth grow sweet,
And sweeter as thou mak'st our life complete.
We are thy servants, and to thy stern grace
And darkling majesty we bend our face;
Thou art so bitter in to-day's despite,
And yet so glorious in to-morrow's light.
O truth, we love, we worship, and we strive
Simply and singly in thy way to thrive;
And we are sure that endless crownings come
From the deep heart of thine eternal home.

To The Truth Seeker.

BY MARY E. TILLOTSON.

Speed, speed on thy mission, brave herald of gladness!
Rich tidings of mercy and justice proclaim;
Shed light, love, and peace on the children of sadness,
And kindle in darkness Freethought's living flame!

Go scatter the gloom superstition entaileth
On vassals who fain would in freedom rejoice.
Where rancor and proud persecution prevaileth,
Lift boldly yet kindly a powerful voice.

Go travel where ignorance deeply hath shrouded
That mightiest marvel of nature, the mind;
Illumin lone spirits, long crushed and beclouded;
Be strength to the faltering and eyes to the blind.

Descend the dim vale, climb the cliff-traversed mountain,
Wherever a sorrowing soul may abide,
And point the debased and deceived to the fountain
Of truth, where redemption to work is allied.

Search out every nook that hath aught to make tearful,
And soothe by the hope of a hallowed day,
When nought shall remain to molest or make fearful;
Haste, haste on thy mission; speed, speed thee away.

The Prodigal Son.

BY ALHAZA.

"Oh, father, I hav sinned, down with the base and low.
Not in the highest place, 'mid mirth's wild, furious flow.
No ruined maid, no coward calls me vile,
As doth thy bleeding heart, thy mournful smile."

The tears flowed down the old man's snowy beard,
While the cool homestead's dewy shade they neared.
"A lovely wasted form I yonder see,
Some maid that loved thee well hath followed thee."

Down on the sward her tender limbs she flung.
"Yes, thou art safe, thy dearest friends among.
But my lost soul is left. Oh, can it be?
No friend in earth or heaven to pity me?

"'Tis dark, the beauty wakes on every side,
While scented dew-drops bathe the lily's pride.
For lust and pride hav dashed my life away.
My God cares not for me, why should I pray?"

"Take her, my son, begin the opening year,
With every duty that can make life dear.
Though poup and show the swinish heart may move,
The music of the universe is love.

Special Notice from Bliss' Chief's Band.

Me, Red Cloud, speak for Blackfoot, the great Medicin Chief from happy hunting grounds. He say he love white chiefs and squaws. He travel like the wind. He go to circles. Him big chief. Blackfoot want much work to do. Him want to show him healing power. Make sick people well. Where paper go, Blackfoot go. Go quick. Send right away. No wampum for three moon.

This spirit message was first published in "Mind and Matter," January 10, M. S. 32, with the announcement that magnetized paper would be sent to all who were sick in body or mind that desired to be healed, also to those that desired to be developed as spirit mediums, for three months for three three-cent stamps. The three months closed with the following result: 3,405 persons hav sent for the paper by mail, one thousand persons hav received it at the office; and the hundreds of testimonials that hav been received of its wonderful work in healing the sick and developing mediums prove that Red Cloud and Blackfoot hav faithfully kept promises. From January 10th, M. S. 32, to January 10th, M. S. 33, over 15,000 persons hav sent for this paper, and thousands hav been benefited by its use. That all may hav an opportunity to test the merits of the paper, the price for the future will be as follows: one sheet, postage paid, ten cents; twelve sheets, one dollar. Send a silver ten cent piece if you can. Address James A. Bliss, 713 Sansom street, Philadelphia, Pa.

A Proposition.

I am prepared and will send to any one address, direct from my office, one sheet of "Blackfoot's" Magnetized Paper, postage paid, every week for one month for forty cents; two months for seventy cents; three months for one dollar. Address, with amount inclosed, James A. Bliss, 713 Sansom st., Philadelphia, Pa.

CATARRH
CANNOT BE CURED

By neglect, but one package of Graduated Catarrh Cure will give instant relief, and in most cases effect a permanent cure. This is the only remedy that may be graduated to properly affect any stage of this loathsome disease, from a slight local irritation to a nauseous scrofulous discharge. Catarrh is much easier removed when treated in time than when allowed to become firmly rooted in the system. Be wise and prompt. Send one dollar to H. J. THOSE WHO ARE BENEFITED MOST BY DR. BRYAN'S ELECTRO-VOLTAIC AND MAGNETIC BELTS AND APPLIANCES:

First. It has been generally conceded by the medical faculty that Electricity and Magnetism will benefit any person whose health is below the normal standard, that is, anyone whose health is bad, or who has any derangement of the system.

Second. All Rheumatic, Neuralgic, or Nervous Affections are more rapidly cured than diseases of a different nature; yet individuals suffering from mental inertia, Loss of Memory, and confusion of Intellect experience probably the most prompt relief, while Kidney Diseases and Diseases of the Heart or Liver are more slowly cured; but Consumptive derive rapid benefit, the condition soon changing to those more favorable, consequently they are highly recommended in all pulmonary diseases.

Third. Indigestion, Catarrh, Headache, Dizziness, Loss of Vital Force, Loss of Ambition, Nervous Debility, Seminal Weakness, Impotency, Constipation, etc., will receive immense aid and permanent benefit from wearing the Appliance, and it is believed to be the only Permanent Cure for these diseases.

Fourth. The Belts and Appliances will benefit all who are out of health, for they giv a constant current of life-inspiring influence, and every nerve, joint, and muscle in the whole system will fairly tingle with strength and vigor under the marvelous recuperating power.

Fifth. They are a perfect substitute for medicins, and will cure many old Chronic Affections that hav never been helped by medicin. They act as a Blood Purifier, and thus effectually cure Scrofula and Skin Diseases, particularly those resulting from Syphilitic causes, and they also act as a Tonic, by building up and strengthening the debilitated system, whether caused by imprudent habits, sickness, or old age.

Sixth. Applied in the form of a Truss, they are the only remedy that will make a radical cure of Rupture, and are so far superior to the ordinary truss that they giv no trouble or inconvenience in wearing them. For Prolapsus Uteri and Female Weakness generally they are unsurpassed.

Gems of Thought.

SURELY the serpent will bite without enchantment; and a babbler is no better.—Ecclesiastes x, 11.

"OF two evils, choose the less," is a just maxim then, and then only, when there is no other alternativ—when we must take the one or the other; but it is mere folly to incur either when it is in our power to avoid both. Those who speak of "a fault on the right side" should be reminded that though a great error is worse than a less, there is no right side in error.—Archbishop Whately.

IF I'm designed yon lordling's slave—
By nature's law designed—
Why was an independent wish
E'er planted in my mind?

If not, why am I subject to
His cruelty or scorn?
Or why has man the will and power
To make his fellows mourn? —Burns.

WHEN we say that pleasure is the end or object of life, we do not mean the pleasures of the debanchee or the sensualist, as some, from ignorance or malignity, represent, but freedom of the body from pain and of the soul from anxiety. For it is not continuous drinkings and revellings, nor the society of women, nor rare viands and other luxuries of the table that constitute a pleasant life, but sober contemplation that searches out the grounds of choice or avoidance and banishes those chimeras that harass the mind.—Epicurus.

LET us, if possible, banish all fear from the mind. Don't imagin there is some being—with or without a big B—in the infinit expanse who is not willing that every man and every woman should think for himself and for herself. Don't imagin there is any being who would giv to his children the holy torch of reason and then damn them for following wherever the sacred light may lead. Can I commit a sin against God by thinking? If God did not intend that I should think, why did he create me a man—the very word man meaning a thinker.—Ingersoll.

THAT which is past is gone and irrecoverable, and men hav enough to do with things present and to come; therefore they do but trifle with themselvs that labor in past matters. There is no man doth a wrong for the wrong's sake, but thereby to purchase himself profit or pleasure, or honor, or the like; therefore why should I be angry with a man for liking himself better than me? And if any man should do wrong, merely out of ill-nature, why, yet it is but like the thorn or brier, which prick and scratch because they can do no other. —Bacon's Essays.

IT is a slight thing to hack and mutilate the body, though it is the fairest temple God ever made, and to mar its completeness a sin. But to dismember the soul, the very image of God; to lop off most sacred affections; to call reason a liar; conscience a devil's oracle, and cast love clean out from the heart—this is the last triumph of superstition; but one often witnessed in all the three forms of religion, fetichism, polytheism, and monotheism, in all ages before Christ, in all ages after Christ. This is the superstition of the soul. The one might be the superstition of the hero: this is the superstition of the Pharisee.—Theodore Parker.

THE Middle Ages were more religious than ours in proportion to their ignorance and barbarism; and at present the same difference exists, for example, between Spain and Germany, or, in Germany, between Tyrol and Saxony. Religion and civilization accordingly occupy not an equal but an inverted position in regard to each other, so that with the progress of civilization religion retreats. . . . We may say, therefore, that the Middle Ages were more superstitious, not more truly pious, than is our era; and if culture in our era has really damaged piety, then it must hav been a false, superficial culture.—Strauss.

THE civilized world is fast outgrowing the idea that the sight of human suffering is pleasing to either gods or men; and as soon as this belief passes entirely away, hell will become an impossible myth, and all forms of punishment will slowly be done away with. A god who does not enjoy the sight of anguish, misery, and terror, could never hav created a hell on purpose to send his children to its depths, where he would be continually conscious of their misery and torment. A being with one single spark of gentle, loving tenderness, mercy, or charity, would be longing for some way in which to relieve the terrible sufferings he saw, forming, as they would, a dark and woeful background to every beautiful, pleasant, and glorious picture that met his eye.—Slenker.

I HAV read the Bible, and what shall I say of it? I find many good things in it, and not a few that I cannot but call bad. It is best, as the old Scotch song says, "to be honest and true;" and if I must speak of it as a whole, I confess that I do not believe it. Had I not better say so? People may tell you, if you do say so, you will regret it "when you come to die." Now, if that be true, I think I know a good many religious people who will hav no cause to regret it—they never tell their honest convictions about the Bible. There are two great arguments of the church—the miracle argument and the death-bed argument. Is not the religion of your fathers good enough for you? Certainly not. If we can turn out a better plow than our fathers, we are permitted and encouraged to do so. Why not follow the same course in matters of religion? Again, they say to me, Do you know more than all the theologians dead and living? Well, being a perfectly modest man, I reply, I think I do. Every man has a right to think and to say what he thinks, not as if he were the Pythian Apollo or even the Pope of Rome, but as a solitary individual. Would God, think you, giv a bird wings and then make it a crime in the bird to fly? Would he giv a man brains to think and then make it a crime in the man to think? Any God that would damn one of his children—the least of the little ones—for the expression of his honest thought, would, I venture to say, cut a sorry figure in the eyes of wise men and angels, if there are any such on the earth or anywhere in the infinit space that surrounds it.—Ingersoll.

Odds and Ends.

A VIOLIN—A low tavern.

GREAT guns—Mountain canons.

CHAMBER music—The beautiful snore.

A TWO-FOOT rule—Don't wear tight boots

THE school question—Know your lesson?

WAS the Maid of Athens made of Greece?

A PLACE for everything—Our baby's mouth.

THE Indian chief Ouray left a hundred thousand dollars, and his heirs throw up their hats and cry, "Onray."

AS a street car conductor took a rural passenger's money, the other day, he called it an agricultural fair.

A MEDICAL student declares that the sudden death of little Eva, in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," was calculated to awe Topsey.

"TREAT woman like a splendid flower," says Ingersoll. "So I do. I hav planted mine," says a widower who has buried three wives.

WHEN our foreman dropped the anchor of his new yacht Sadie, and then found he had neglected to attach the cable, he became can't-anchor-us.

'IF any one attempts to pull my ears," said Joe Cook, "he will hav his hands full." The audience looked at the great defamer's ears and snickered.

"IN what condition was the patriarch Job at the end of life?" asked a Montclair Sunday-school teacher. "Dead," replied little Al Wright, at the foot of the class.

A MONTCLAIR lady, on entering the ladies' cabin on a Hoboken ferry boat and finding the seats occupied by men, remarked that she had often noticed in the papers quotations of prices for dressed hogs, and it had never dawned on her mind what the article was until then.

"SO YOU hav finished your studies at the seminary? I was much pleased with the closing exercises. The author of that poem, Miss White, I think you called her, bids fair to become known as a poet."

"We think the authoress will become known as a poetess," remarked the young lady, pertly, with a marked emphasis on two words of the sentence.

"Oh! ah!" replied the old gentleman, looking thoughtfully over his spectacles at the young lady. "I hear her sister is quite an actress, and under Miss Hosmer's instructions will undoubtedly become quite a sculptoress."

The young lady appeared irritated.

"The seminary," continued the old gentleman, with imperturbable gravity, "is fortunate in having an efficient board of manageresses. From the presidentess down to the humblest teacheress unusual talent is shown. There is Miss Harper, who as a chemistress is unequaled, and Mrs. Knowles has already a reputation as an astronomeress. And in the department of music few can equal Miss Kellogg as a singeress."

The young lady did not appear to like the chair she was sitting on. She took the sofa at the other end of the room.

"Yes," continued the old gentleman, as if talking to himself, "those White sisters are very talented. Mary, I understand, has turned her attention to painting and the drama, and will surely become famous as a painteress, and even as a lecturess."

A loud slamming of the door caused the old gentleman to look up, and criticess and grammarianess was gone.

UNCLE MOSE, of Galveston, was not noticed near the polls on election day, consequently a colored striker was sent out to hunt him up. He was sitting by the fire in his cabin groaning dismally.

"Uncle Mose, has yer voted yit?" asked the colored rounder.

"No, chile; I wouldn't risk ketchin' cold on my lungses fo' all de money in de wo'ld."

"Here's one dollar to pay for your time."

The old man secured the subsidy, remarking:

"Ef yo' is comin' de bulldoze on dis ole niggah he weakens. Hev yo' fetched a kerrige fo' me?"

"It's waitin' at de do', Uncle Mose."

"Is yer gwine fo' ter bring me back after I'se voted?"

"Bring yo' right back, Uncle Mose; hurry up now."

"Gimme a dram fo' I starts."

"Here it is, take a pull," said the emmisary, producing a flask.

He pulled and asked,

"Gwine to gimme anudder pull when I'se done voted?" and then he pulled again.

"Yes. Take anudder pull right now. Don't be afeard ob it. Dar's plenty more where dat come from."

So the old man pulled again, and asked,

"Hev yer got anudder dollar bill wid yo'?"

"Look heah, ole man, yo' must 'low de compaign committee's made of money. Here's yer udder dollar. Now jump in. De polls is gwine ter close."

"Lor', chile, yo' makin' out yo' is a statesman. Yah, yah! I'se been foolin' yo'. I done voted de udder ticket urly dis mawnin, yah, yah, yah!" and the old image settled down in front of the fire and nearly chuckled his head off.

Notes and Clippings.

THE cold wave has rolled on, but let no one be deluded into a false security. Manitoba is just getting her hand in.

IN the present year's Jewish calendar for 5641 (A.D. 1880) the total number of Jews in the world is set down by the editor at 8,900,000.

THE Roman Archeological Commission hav sent an urgent protest to a Syndic against the granting of a concession for a tramway along the old Appian Way.

THE Mayor of Athens telegraphs to the Lord Mayor of London that a magnificent and complete statue of Minerva Victorious, a masterpiece of Phidias, has just been discovered.

THE congregation owning the Parker memorial chapel in Boston, which cost $110,000, has voted to sell it to Isaac B. Rich, a leading Spiritualist, for $15,000. The reason given is the rapid multiplication of Unitarian churches in that city.—Sun.

GOOD ENOUGH.—The Roman Catholic church authorities at Montreal hav abandoned the idea of completing the mammoth St. Peter's cathedral, which has been building at great cost for ten years. The walls will be razed and a church of moderate size will be erected.

IF the German persecution of the Jews goes on all winter, by March we may hav a marked influx of immigrants bearing the well-known Hebraistic features. They will perhaps feel a kind of hopefulness in the names of President J. Abraham Garfield and Vice-President C. Absalom Arthur.

A PASTOR at Grundy Center, Iowa, was recently very sick, and, believing that he was near death, confessed that he had not long before been on a most deplorable spree in Chicago. He did not die, however, and his wife not only deserted him but reported him to the church. His people are more charitable, and will probably let him off with a reprimand.

IT is hardly worth while for the English to complain that American rifles are secretly imported into that country, when they are sent in large quantities from Birmingham itself. Perhaps some of the English gunmakers and gun dealers disapprove of the Land League, but not in any such extreme way as to refuse to sell their arms and ammunition to whoever will buy.

MICHAEL SOLIS a citizen of Bogota, in the republic of San Salvador, is reputed to be 160 years old; he therefore beats the record of old Parr by eight years. Mr. Solis is extremely methodical in his life, and attributes his age to sobriety. He only eats nourishing food during a single half hour daily. On the 1st and 15th of every month he fasts, and only drinks water.

LORD LIFFORD, who is a resident Irish peer of unblemished honor and repute, writes in the Nineteenth Century: "Ireland cannot be other than the poor, degraded country that she is, not by any action of the British government, but by the vices of her own sons." Lord Lifford is descended from Hewitt, an English judge, who was about 150 years ago created Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

A PROSY bishop in the House of Lords rose to speak, and announced that he would divide what he had to say into twelve parts, when the Duke of Wharton interrupted him, and begged he might be indulged for a few minutes, as he had a story to tell them which he could only introduce at that moment. A drunken fellow was passing by St. Paul's at night, and heard the clock slowly chiming 12. He counted the strokes, and when it had finished, looked toward the clock, and said, "D——n you, why couldn't you giv us all that at once?" There was an end to the bishop's story.

THE deep sympathy which actors cherish for sorrow and suffering, despite all the friction with unpleasant sides of the world which most of them undergo, has just been shown in London. A member of this body died some weeks ago from injuries received on the stage and left one little daughter a friendless orphan. The principal persons connected with the stage in London gave a performance at Drury Lane to assist the child, and between money taken at the doors and subscribed $10,000 were collected.

A GALVESTON millionaire, applied to by his friends to allow his name to be put up for the United States senatorship, said he aimed at another office. "Seat in the cabinet, eh?" "No, not that." "Foreign mission?" "Nor that. Gentlemen, I'll be candid with you. For years I hav been trying to get the city authorities to hav the slop barrel at my back gate emptied once a month, and hav failed. I am determined to hav that barrel emptied, so I hav applied to the city council for the position of driver to a scavenger cart."

HERR MAKART is at present engaged on an immense picture which is likely to create a great sensation next spring. It represents the interior of an Italian bath house, ornamented in the richest style of the Renaissance. In the bath a number of beautiful women and children disport themselvs delightfully, while others sit or lie about in various stages of undress. Near the center one fair dame lies extended on soft cushions without any pretense of covering, while a number of charming little naked children play around her. It won't do for that picture to be brought to these shores. Comstock would go for it before he could sleep.

E. H. CHAPIN, the celebrated Universalist clergyman of this city, has recently passed the bound of earthly life. By the orthodox Christians he was for many years termed an Infidel because he did not believe in the sweet doctrin of eternal hell-fire for ninety-nine-hundredths of the human family. But as he made only about half the distance between orthodoxy and Infidelity (error and truth), he came to be quite respectable, and even some of the elect ventured to raise their hats to him and say, "Good morning, Mr. Chapin." He was a worthy and quite a talented man—head and shoulders above thousands of the hell-defenders and lovers of a hell for others to feel.

BISHOP ELDER, coadjutor to Archbishop Purcell, Cincinnati, in his diocese of the Catholic church, has issued a strict order to the clergy which causes some excitement. He enjoins plainness in dress for children at first communion, prohibits round dancing and church entertainments and dancing of any kind after dark, enjoins strict enforcement of church laws, and on all matters prohibits the clergy from receiving money on deposit; advises full Christian names for children instead of abbreviations or pet names; enjoins the use of plain music and such as is not heard in places of amusement or intended to show off the voice of the singer or the genius of the composer.

THE stir made by Dr. Tyng's sermon on "So-called Modern Miracles" has increased rather than abated. The discourse has been published in pamphlet form and is widely circulated. Dr. Tyng says he has been much misunderstood and misrepresented. Several of the religious papers hav attacked him sharply. The Christian at Work has asked the opinion of a great many theologians as to the possibility of present miracles, and publishes about thirty replies, nearly all of which take the ground that miracles ceased with the days of the apostles. The discussion has opened in such a way that the brightest minds of both Catholic and Protestant churches may be expected to take a hand in it before it is over. Meanwhile more wonderful cures are reported through the agency of mortar from the chapel at Knock.

AN aerolite fell on Bidwell's farm in California, and was sent to the state Geological Society. Bidwell sued the society for remuneration, and the terrestrial chunk was seized by the sheriff. In the sheriff's office a difficulty arose in entering the seizure. "Shtick it down as a piece av iron," said Mr. Ringrose. Mr. Walsh objected to Mr. Ringrose's coarse generalization. "There's as much shtone in it as iron," said he. "Call it an oxidized mass," said Mr. Cummings. Sheriff Murphy strenuously objected to this, however. He was satisfied to let the word "oxidized" go on the books, for no one would know what it meant. "But," said he, firmly, "every omadhaun knows what mass manes, and be hevins we can't touch religion."

MR. BRADLAUGH proposes attacking the pension list in the next session of Parliament by demanding the appointment of a commission of inquiry on the subject. He does not object to pensions that hav been fairly earned, but denounces the perpetual pensions granted to the families of the dukes of Richmond, Grafton, and Marlborough, the earls of Amherst, Kinnoul, and Nelson, and Lord Rodney. He reckons that if the money paid to the illegitimate sons of Charles II. and their heirs had been invested at 3½ per cent compound interest the fund realized would be more than the entire national debt. Mr. Bradlaugh claims that many persons now receiving pensions hav no claim upon the nation.

A WOMAN complains to the Cincinnati Enquirer that her sex is compelled by fashion to suffer dreadfully from cold. "Even when clad for the street," she says, "a woman is nowhere near so thickly covered as a man, unless it be about her chest and arms by a fur garment. Her head is usually not protected at all, and in the other direction her warm clothing stops at her hips, for below that her skirts are only a shield against the wind, without keeping out much cold. There is a general feminin aversion to flannel next the skin, arising from the prickliness of the one and the delicacy of the other. Below the knees the only covering is a stocking. So it is that the girl in the sealskin sack, looking so mighty comfortable, really suffers greatly."

NINETEEN of the brethren of the Methodist church at Bellamon, Pa., hav been convicted of rioting. The Rev. R. S. Apple had been reengaged by one faction as pastor, and dismissed by the other. Taking the benefit of the doubt, he resolved to continue preaching. His opponent barricaded the doors, and created such a riot that the sheriff was compelled to disperse them. Nineteen of them were prosecuted. By the latest advices the fight was still in activ progress, with the ante-Appleites considerably ahead. A church election was held with several officers of the law present to keep the pious brethren from killing each other, and the anti-Appleites were able to poll the greatest number. Up to the present moment no news of a murder there has been received.

A CHRISTIAN woman in Boston who was formerly in good circumstances is reported to be making shirts and clothing for a large firm, the members of which are church-members. For the sewing on a lady's ulster she receives one dime. For a shirt with six buttonholes and gussets the price is seven cents, and for lined flannel shirts eight cents. It was not a very "Merry Christmas" with this woman, as she had to work far into the night to earn enough to keep body and soul together. The good people who buy the garments made by this woman and other toilers of her class exult over the bargains they secure, and tell each other where they can get such things for the lowest cent. In the face of thousands of equally hard cases we are told that a kind Providence governs the affairs of this world, the destinies of individuals, and even that a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without his watchful care!

Report of a Debate

BETWEEN THE REV. A. HATCHARD AND MRS. ANNIE BESANT, AT THE HALL OF SCIENCE, LONDON.

FIRST NIGHT.—CONTINUED.

Mrs. Besant then rose, and when the loud and continued applause with which she was welcomed had subsided, said:

Mr. Chairman, Ladies, and Gentlemen: I am glad that in dealing with a question so important as the present I hav the pleasure of meeting one who deals fairly and honestly with the subject; so that if in this debate no satisfactory result comes to the audience it at least will not be the fault of the Christian disputant who opposes me.

A very large part of Mr. Hatchard's speech I shall not touch, because I do not think that I need in any fashion deal with it. I allude to what he has told you with respect to the fourth century and the time after it. The difficulty of Mr. Hatchard is not to prove that Christ was believed to be a historical personage after the fourth century, but to bridge over the years between A.D. 1 and A.D. 300. I conceive that if he can bridge over that, then my position would be a difficult one to maintain. I admit that from the time of the Council of Nice the Christian churches were strong and spreading, and that after that period Christ was recognized through a large part of the civilized world. But you cannot carry the history of Christ and the history of the gospels over that terrible chasm of three centuries after the birth of Christ. If even you can get so far as A.D. 200 you hav practically knocked away the supports on which the Freethought platform stands. I quite agree that we are not here to discuss the character of the Emperor Constantine, nor even of the Fathers. We hav to deal with the reliability of the views of the Christian Fathers; we hav nothing in the world to say to their character. They may hav been very good or very bad; we deal with them as witnesses of the truth or falsity of the particular Christian teaching with which we are concerned. The subject for debate is that the Jesus of the gospels is a historical person, and clearly the character of Constantine cannot make the historical character of Jesus either more clear or less accurate than my opponent can show it to be.

I am obliged to dissent from the view to which my opponent has given utterance, viz., that exactly the same Bible is in the hands of both Protestant and Catholic. The Douay Bible differs in many respects from the Bible received in Protestant churches; and nothing is more common than for a Roman Catholic to warn his hearers on the peril of their souls not to read the Protestant Bible, while on the other hand the Protestant cautions his followers that the Douay version of the scriptures is misleading and therefore not to be received.

Carrying back the same Bible through the era of printing to the era of manuscripts, and going back as far as we can, we find that no one pretends that there are any manuscripts in existence earlier than those of the fourth century, so that we cannot trace back our manuscripts over that critical period of which I spoke. But taking the manuscripts which are in existence and comparing them together we find they are not all alike, and the more we compare one with another the more discrepancies do we find. We hav it on the authority of Dr. Angus that there are no less than a hundred thousand different readings in these manuscripts. If there were but one set of manuscripts, so to speak, there surely would be no need for the years that the translators hav been spending on their labor of revising the New Testament. If there is one received set of manuscripts there would be no difficulty at all. Then again I come to the Arians and the Catholics; but I do not think I need dwell on them, because the Arians admitted the historical character of the Jesus of the gospels as much as the Catholics.

It has been urged by my opponent that the creed known as the Nicene Creed, which was adopted by the Council of Nice in the year 325, and which we are told substantially embodies the Christian teaching of that period, as well as of the present day, is the same creed as the one we now call by that name; but I would remind Mr. Hatchard that the last part of that creed was not adopted at Nice, nor presented by Eusebius, but that it was added at the Council of Constantinople, and was not consequently in use until many years after the time at which he alleges the creed was adopted and used as a whole.

I now come to Eusebius, and you will observe that I am taking these points which hav been raised by my opponent, one by one, before I grapple with the real difficulty. The work of Eusebius is put forward as thoroughly reliable. I would remind my opponent that Eusebius himself says that he chose the materials for his history for edification rather than for accuracy, and that is not a promising beginning for a historian, as you will all allow. But if Eusebius is to be relied on, the letter of Jesus to Agbarus is thoroughly authentic, for that is given with a particularity far greater than is his general wont.

We hav now come to Justin and the earlier Fathers; and here, with your permission, instead of following step by step the line which my opponent has taken, I will begin at the other end, and work up to these apostolic Fathers on whom my opponent seems so much to rely. I shall serve the cause, I believe, of Freethought better not by simply making isolated objections to the views of Mr. Hatchard, but by showing also the heretical views which we hold. I propose, therefore, to try to place before you my own views as to the Jesus of the gospels. I shall try to giv a coherent account of the heretical view, and I shall urge that it is more in accordance with the facts of history, human experience, scientific thought, and common sense to take the heretical view which we take than to accept the view that the Jesus of the gospels is a historical character.

We are agreed apparently that the Jesus of the gospels is a supernatural character. His birth of a virgin, the marvels surrounding his infancy, his wonderful baptism, his temptation by the devil, his miracles of healing, of destruction, and of self-defense, his foreknowledge of his own death, his transfiguration, the mysterious darkness surrounding his cross, his resurrection from the dead, his ascension into heaven—if you take all these, it is impossible to deny that his life is a supernatural and miraculous one from beginning to end. I do not say that you cannot remove all these miraculous and wonderful surroundings and still leave, untouched, the simple Jew who went about as a teacher of the people; but if you remove the miraculous, you hav no longer the Jesus of the gospels. Clearly the supernatural is the appropriate framework for the incarnation of Deity; the miraculous is the proper paraphernalia of divine royalty. There may hav been a Jesus, then, who led a simple human life; but I hav to deal simply with the Jesus of the gospels, and I shall endeavor to show how I conceive that various myths floating about became crystallized around the figure of Jesus of Nazareth.

I cannot admit the supernatural; I cannot admit the miraculous; and therefore the very assertion that the Jesus of the gospels is a miraculous and supernatural character is a great stumbling-block at the outset. There are so many incarnate gods in human history, and they all present the same birth-marks. They are always born at such a remote period, or at some such out-of-the-way place, that it is practically impossible to subject their claims to any kind of scientific investigation. Their births are always surrounded with prodigies; they always work miracles when they grow up; there is always something mysterious in their deaths; they always ascend triumphant at the last—these are the great outline marks of all the incarnate deities which our world has known; and I allege that Jesus is one of these mythic characters, that the principal features of his life are possessed by him in common with thousands of rivals, and that he cannot in any fashion be distinguished from them. The essence of the spirit in which science meets the record of miracles is the spirit of Hume, that it is much more likely that men should hav been deceived than that our whole experience of nature should hav been contradicted:

"A miracle is a violation of the laws of nature, and as a firm and unalterable experience has established these laws, the proof against a miracle, from the nature of the fact, is as entire as any argument from experience can possibly be imagined. . There must, therefore, be an uniform experience against every miraculous event, otherwise the event would not merit that appellation. And as an uniform experience amounts to a proof, there is here a direct and full proof, from the nature of the fact, against the existence of any miracle; nor can such a proof be destroyed, or the miracle rendered credible, but by an opposit proof which is superior. . . Upon the whole, then, it appears that no testimony for any kind of miracle has ever amounted to a probability, much less to a proof; and that, even supposing it amounted to a proof, it would be opposed by another proof, derived from the very nature of the fact which it would endeavor to establish. It is experience only which givs authority to human testimony, and it is the same experience which assures us of the laws of nature. When, therefore, these two kinds of experience are contrary, we hav nothing to do but subtract the one from the other, and embrace an opinion, either on one side or the other, with that assurance which arises from the remainder. But according to the principle here explained, this subtraction, with regard to all popular religions amounts, to an entire annihilation, and therefore we may establish it as a maxim, that no human testimony can hav such force as to prove a miracle, and make it a just foundation for any such system of religion" (Essay on Miracles," ed. 1770, pp. 160, 161, 178).

I may say that I at once accept that position of Hume. You all act upon that belief in your daily life, although you don't all act so in regard to the gospels. We do not trouble ourselvs to investigate modern miracles. Even those who accept and believe in the miracles of the gospels pooh-pooh modern ones, and pass them by with contempt. We hav so often in our experience found people to be mistaken! We hav so often found that testimony breaks down owing to enthusiasm, love, fear, ignorance, inaccuracy of perception or of memory! But we do not find the same changeability in the course of nature. We hav not had experience of constant failures in the relation of natural causes to natural effects; and we reject the miraculous because it is contrary to the facts of the world as we know them. We believe that witnesses, however honest, are more likely to hav been deceived than that the order of nature should hav been violated. We hav to deal clearly with this point. If we are to accept miracles, the evidence must be overwhelming in its strength. But when we turn to examin it we find it is lamentably weak—marvelously meager.

Two principal sources of information present themselvs. First, we hav what is sometimes denominated profane history, but which I will call secular history; and, secondly, we hav sacred history, divine history, and to that I will add the testimony of those Fathers of the church on whom my antagonist so much relies. With regard to the outside history—from pagan writers—I will not giv you my own opinion, but I will giv you the opinion of Gibbon, and simply allow you to judge whether the life of Christ as it is recorded in the gospels could hav taken place with so little notice; and with respect to the passage from Josephus and others which my opponent has quoted to you, I allege and shall prove that they will not bear the slightest investigation.

The evidence of the Christian Fathers which has been adduced would not be accepted, I will not say in one of our high courts of justice, but even in a county court.

Gibbon asks: "But how shall we excuse the supine inattention of the pagan and philosophic world to those evidences which were presented by the hand of Omnipotence, not to their reason, but to their senses? During the age of Christ, of his apostles, and of their first disciples, the doctrin which they preached was confirmed by innumerable prodigies. The lame walked, the blind saw, the sick were healed, the dead were raised, demons were expelled, and the laws of nature were frequently suspended for the benefit of the church. But the sages of Greece and Rome turned aside from the awful spectacle, and, pursuing the ordinary occupations of life and study, appeared unconscious of any alterations in the moral or physical government of the world. Under the reign of Tiberius, the whole earth, or at least a celebrated province of the Roman empire, was involved in a preternatural darkness for three hours. Even this miraculous event, which ought to hav excited the wonder, the curiosity, and the devotion of mankind, passed without notice in an age of science and history. It happened during the lifetime of Seneca and the elder Pliny, who must hav experienced the immediate effects, or received the earliest intelligence of the prodigy. Each of these philosophers, in a laborious work, has recorded all the great phenomena of nature, earthquakes, meteors, comets, and eclipses, which his indefatigable curiosity could collect. Both the one and the other hav omitted to mention the greatest phenomenon to which the mortal eye has been witness since the creation of the globe" (Decline and Fall, ed. 1808, pp. 178, 179).

Tacitus is a pagan writer relied upon by my opponent. Tacitus tells us nothing of the miracles. He tells us only that Christ was put to death as a criminal under Pontius Pilate, but the fact that he was so put to death does not prove the miracles. Allow that this phrase of Tacitus is authentic—even then the passage is worthless from the point of view of my opponent. It simply proves that one Christ was put to death in Judea; it proves nothing as to the supernatural and miraculous Jesus of the gospels. But I may at once say to you that so far from this testimony of Tacitus being unchallenged, it is very seriously challenged. All the manuscripts we possess come down from one copy which belonged to Johannes de Spire in A.D. 1468, and taking the view that this passage may hav been inserted, as it is evident that it easily could hav been, we find as a strong confirmatory fact that Eusebius is the first to quote it; none of the earlier Fathers quoted it at all, so that you cannot find a trace of it before the fourth century.

We now come to Suetonius. What was it that Suetonius said? He tells us that forty years after Christ's death—no, about A.D. 40—the Jews rioted in Rome and one Chrestus was their leader. If, therefore, this passage from Suetonius be applied to the Christ of the gospels, then, some years after he had been put to death in Judea, had risen from the dead and ascended into heaven, he is found leading the Jews to insurrection in Rome, and this does not appear to me to be any sort of evidence for his life in Judea. But there is a very curious remark of the Emperor Adrian which is not generally quoted by Christian writers, so I will giv it now: The emperor wrote from Egypt that the "worshipers of Serapis are Christians, and those are consecrated to the God Serapis who, I find, call themsevs the bishops of Christ." This interesting fact is not dwelt upon by Christian apologists. But the silence of pagan writers is well summed up for me by a Christian writer. The Rev. Dr. Giles, beneficed clergyman of the church of England, givs us, in this work ("Christian Records,") exactly the points which I hav been putting before you. He says: "Though the remains of Grecian and Latin profane literature which belong to the first and second centuries of our era are enough to form a library of themselvs, they contain no allusion to the New Testament. . . . The Latin writers who lived between the time of Christ's crucifixion and the year 200 are Seneca, Lucan, Suetonius, Tacitus, Persius, Juvenal, Martial, Pliny the Elder, Silius, Italicus, Statius, Quintilian, and Pliny the Younger, besides numerous others of inferior note. The greater number of these make mention of the Jews, but not of the Christians. In fact, Suetonius, Tacitus, and the younger Pliny are the only Roman writers who mention the Christian religion or its founder" (Christian Records, by Rev. Dr. Giles, p. 36).

So much for the arguments regarding Christ which are found in pagan and Roman writers. I shall hav to deal now with the others. Let me say at once that I do not challenge the existence of persons called Christians; on the contrary, I admit that they existed—a long time before Christ was born. I think they existed long before the birth of Christ into the world, and I may here again remark that no argument brought forward to prove the existence of Christians can hav the slightest weight in deciding the question at issue. The point between us is not the existence of Christians, but the historical character of the Jesus of the New Testament. I now come to the passage in Josephus. Mr. Hatchard says that he alleges that this passage was really written by the person whose name it bears; I answer that it is impossible to bring forward the name of one man of note of the present day who accepts it as genuin. It is now almost universally given up, and the evidence of its interpolation is very clear. Take the passage: "Now, there was about this time Jesus, a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works—a teacher of such men as receive the truth with pleasure. He drew over to him both many of the Jews and many of the Gentiles. He was [the] Christ; and when Pilate, at the suggestion of the principal men amongst us, had condemned him to the cross, those that loved him at the first did not forsake him, for he appeared to them alive again the third day, as the divine prophets had foretold these and ten thousand other wonderful things concerning him; and the tribe of Christians, so named from him, are not extinct at this day" (Antiquities of the Jews, book xviii., ch. iii., sect. 3). I will now tell you why I do not believe the passage to be true. The Jesus of the gospels in the first place did not draw many of the Jews unto him; on the contrary, he drew extremely few, and was remarkably unsuccessful as a teacher. Then he did not draw many of the Gentiles; on the contrary, he alleged, according to the gospels, that he was not sent to save the lost sheep of the house of Israel; so that you find Josephus distinctly in contradiction with the book he is called to prove. Then, again, it is stated he was the Christ, but how was it possible for Josephus here, a Jew, in his own book to affirm that which his own opinion and religion taught him most strongly to deny? For a man who was not a Christian, but a Jew—who did not accept Jesus as the Messiah—to make this statement in his own book, was practically to call himself "hypocrit," and to stand before the world a self-convicted hypocrit out of his own mouth.

Wealthy Liberals.

The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will remember that, a few weeks ago, I called for the names and addresses of wealthy Liberals. A very fair response has been made to that call. I hav received many names and suggestions which I am very glad to get. But I am confident there are others yet to hear from, and I ask the readers to put on their thinking-caps once more immediately after reading this, and, without waiting till they forget it, take a postal card and send me some names. Lecturers and secretaries of Leagues ought especially to be able to do this. Very important results may grow out of it.

I hav prepared a circular appeal for effort, for nnion, for organization, and for material aid to the National Liberal League, which I wish to hav reach every prominent Liberal iu the country. I will send it on application to any one who will send his name and address, with as many others as he can think of.

Address T. C. LELAND, Sec. N. L. L.
201 East 71st street, New York.

W. F. JAMIESON is expecting to return West after February 1st, at the close of his debate with Moses Hull. Address him care of THE TRUTH SEEKER, New York.

THERE is probably no period of history in the world more interesting or more important than the French Revolution in the last century, and, in his "Outlines," Mr. Bell has traced it ably and in an interesting manner.

Free Sunday Debates.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The above named meeting holds debates in a large and comfortable hall in this city, on Broad street near Vine, Sunday afternoons and evenings. It is attended by Liberals and church members who discuss theology very freely.

The Liberals mostly are of the solid Materialistic class, and such blows as they hurl against the church are wonderful. Last evening I attended and enlisted their sympathies in a good work by talking to them in the following strain:

FRIENDS: I hav a few earnest questions of which I ask you to take particular note, and you will understand that I hav good and sufficient reasons for asking them:

1. Do you appreciate the blessings of mental liberty which you enjoy at these meetings?

2. Do you know if such meetings had been attempted fifty years ago, yea, if you had dared to deal such blows against churchianity as you do here, that your portion would hav been mobs, rabbles, rotten eggs, and jails?

3. Are you glad you are not in so much danger now, but do you know you would be had not great souls accomplished hard work for you?

4. Are you aware that the way has been paved for you by heroic martyrs who hav endured these persecutions?

"Yes," you answer. Then this evening we all hav the privilege of helping to pay this debt.

Jeremiah Hacker, of Berlin, New Jersey, has done much for the cause of mental liberty. For more than a quarter of a century he edited the Pleasure Boat, of Portland, Maine, and from every number hurled as bold and mighty shafts against priestcraft, superstition, and bigotry as were ever hurled by mortal man. He labored thus when it cost him nearly everything—almost his life. Besides this he is one of the most faithful humanitarians, one of the truest lovers of the human race, one of the most beautiful and pure souls on earth. He is now between 80 and 90 years of age, and still does all the good he can. We are now enjoying the fruit of his labors, while he is sick and suffering. Shall we neglect one to whom we owe so great a debt, or shall we do something for one who has done so much for us?

I was impressed to come here among you Materialists to-night instead of going to a Spiritualists' meeting. Spiritualists' are very benevolent, but some of them seem to think that no matter how much Jeremiah suffers here, he will soon be soaring far away in the summer home, where he will hav sufficient reward; but you, Materialists, who believe our heaven is here, will certainly contribute largely toward making a little heaven for this good man and his faithful companion before they die. And I hope the Spiritualists, too, will do their duty, as they are humanitarians. The Christians, too, will remember that Jesus said, "Inasmuch as ye hav done it unto the least of these my brethren ye hav done it unto me;" and as they would consider Jeremiah Hacker, with his Infidelity, one of the least among the brethren, then in aiding him they would be doing something for Jesus.

To-day we send him $5, which is but a small payment on the great debt we owe Jeremiah Hacker.

That A-dam Fruit Story and its Effects.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: An enthusiastic Episcopal lady was very desirous to hav me stop writing about Biblical superstitions, and join her church. I said it would please their devil too well.

"How so?" she excitedly asked.

I replied, "Because you orthodox people are the only ones who believe in the devil as an existing genius, and therefore entertain and hav to placate him; and then I would, anomalously, hav to acknowledge his existence and pulpit sway also.

"Furthermore, as your Bible God could neither control nor destroy the devil, so, about four thousand years after man's fabulous fall, your God sent a very tardy atonement for the devil's misdeed, it is supposed, to let every one know that their entertainment of the devil was forgiven (St. Paul said God winked at ignorance); and so an orthodox host think they can still practice deviltry with more impunity with such atoning belief. Surely bad people are their own devils, and should not make one poor, mythical devil bear all the blame for the sins of mankind, as the equally mythical first man was said to in eating A-dam fruit set to ensnare him by his God, as a fiendish tempter, according to your Holy Bible teachings of the fall of man.

"Now," I said, "I would like to ask you, as an orthodox, in accordance with your superstitious belief in the existence of a devil and a hell, suppose that your mother should be so unfortunate as to go to hell and you to heaven, do you think that you could be perfectly happy while you knew that your mother was in torture which was to last forever?"

"I suppose so," was the inhuman reply.

Shocked by such a desecrating creed and vile confession, I said, "Such inhuman selfishness on your part would fully entitle you to hell tortures, if there is any such; but really I must do you the credit of not believing you to be so void of common humanity and parental affection, and so, charitably, think you do not speak the unbiased truth."

Such necessitous conclusions from the orthodox blasphemous hell doctrin make fiends of God and man, and so that doctrin is a disgrace to humanity in any age, and even to barbarians. Better deny the existence of any God than believe in one who is the maker of devil and hell. How any sensible mind, having a due adoration for a beneficent creator, can accept such a dogmatic, infamous characterization of God as his true presentment, so revolting to man's sense of goodness, is beyond the conception of a Rationalist, though it may shamefully serve the purposes of designing priests and ministers to giv such a fiendish character to God, to hold their thoughtless and affrighted dupes, besides their thus teaching inhumanity to their fellow-men.

Far, far better to accept the Rationalist's doctrin of the good God of nature, whose beneficent and admirable adaptable works, designed for the greatest good for the greatest number, alone proclaim his exclusiv goodness everywhere. As those laws, controling all nature, must be impartially cosmic in their inexorable actions, so they may work harm, occasionally, to a few, while beneficently designed for the general good of all. "A Lonesome and Sad Set."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In the October number of Scribner's Monthly its editor uses this language: "They must be a lonesome and sad set who deny Christ as the revealer of the fatherhood of God, Christ as the exemplar and inspirer of a divine life, Christ as the mediator between God and man, Christ as the author of the highest code of morals ever promulgated upon the earth, and Christ as the hope of immortality."

If it was true in ancient times that God was the God of the Jews, and all other nations of the earth were without hope and without God in the world, and if it is true that the fatherhood of God, as taught by Christ, is limited to his few faithful followers, and that all unbelievers go wandering about, lost goats without a shepherd, then they, no doubt, would be a sad multitude too numerous to be called a "set," and too great a company to admit of lonesomeness. The idea that unbelievers in old theological myths must be a lonesome set is not original with the editor of Scribner's Monthly. It rises in the mind of every bigoted religionist, and everywhere the question is asked, "If you destroy our present religious faith what do you propose in its place?" I remember being accosted by a self-styled Christian in this wise: "Mr. Brown, don't you sometimes wish when you lie down on your bed at night, Oh that my peace was made with God?" I replied: "No, sir. I hav no quarrel with God. He holds me in the hollow of his hand and I move only as he givs me liberty and strength. When a child I used to pray on going to sleep,

"'If I should die before I wake,
I pray the Lord my soul to take,'

"But now I hav no fears of being overlooked in the great economy of nature." My questioner went his way to church with his Bible and hymn-book under his arm, thinking that he had done God some service. Those who deny Christ are the majority of mankind, but supposing only two or three unbelievers in existence, the appellation, "a lonesome and sad set," would be very inappropriate, at least it seems so to me.

I hav no faith in the mediatorship of Christ, yet I walk in the temple of God believing in his everlasting love and kindness, his fatherhood extending to everything and my brotherhood extending everywhere. All nature and all nature's works are my companions. Whatever of society these may be to those of superstitious faith,

"In reason's ear they all rejoice,
And utter forth a glorious voice."

Notice.

The engagement of Mrs. A. H. Colby and O. K. Smith in Rochester has been extended to the 1st of March. The Liberal League has added several new members since Mr. Leland's stirring articles hav appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Parties wishing the services of Mrs. Colby and Mrs. Smith can address them at 36 Sophia street, care Amy Post.

THE stormy petrel is named from the Apostle Peter, because it is often seen apparently walking on the waves. Sailors call them Mother Carey's chickens, and dread their presence, as a harbinger of stormy weather, as they revel in storms.

MR. BELL'S "French Revolution" is, like all the productions of his pen which I hav seen, a very thorough discussion of the subject.—A. B. Bradford.

WITH COMMENTARIES BY VOLTAIRE.

SAUL.

"There was a man of the tribe of Benjamin whose name was Kish, a man of power. He had a son whose name was Saul, of a goodly presence, and taller by a head than any of his people.

"Kish, the father of Saul, had lost his asses. And Kish, the father of Saul, said to his son, Take now one of the servants with thee, and go seek the asses. After having sought for them, the servant said, Behold now, there is in yonder city a man of God, an honorable man; and all that he saith cometh surely to pass: let us go thither; peradventure he can show us our way that we should go. Saul saith to the servant, But if we go, what shall we bring the man? For the bread is spent in our vessels, and there is not a present to bring to the man of God: what hav we?"

Unbelievers pretend that this passage of itself sufficiently proves that the Jewish priests and prophets were nothing more than roving beggarmen or mendicants, similar in all points to our village soothsayers, who told fortunes and indicated the hiding-places of things that had been mislaid or lost. Lord Bolingbroke, Mr. Mallet, his publisher, and Mr. Huet, liken them to Smithfield mountebanks. Dom Calmet, much more well-advised, says that if presents of money or food were given them, it was only out of respect for their persons.

"And the servant answered Saul again, and said, Behold, I hav found here in my hand the fourth part of a shekel of silver: let us giv it to the man of God that he may show us our way.

"Before time in Israel, when a man went to inquire of God, thus he spake, Come, let us go to the seer: for he that is now called a prophet was before time a seer."

These same unbelievers take advantage of this quarter of a shekel—of this shilling given by a little goat-herd to the prophet Samuel—to cover the whole Jewish nation with contempt. Saul and his servant make inquiries in a small town for the address of the seer, of the wise man who should enable them by his science to recover two or three asses that had gone astray, just as one would inquire for the address of the village shoemaker. This name of seer, which was given to those who hav since been called prophets, these eight or nine pennies offered as a present to him who is represented to hav been a judge and a prince among the people, are, according to these adverse critics, the most palpable proofs of the crass stupidity of the unknown Jewish writer. God-fearing commentators think quite the contrary. The simplicity of the little goat-herd in no degree lessens the dignity of Samuel. If he took eight pennies from a small boy, on the other hand he anointed two kings, and cut up a third piecemeal. These three three performances denote a very great Lord indeed.

"And Saul said to his servant, Well said; come, let us go: and they went into the city where the man of God was; and as they went up the hill to the city they found young maidens going out to draw water, and said unto them, Is the seer here? And they answered him and said, Behold, he is before you: make haste, now, for he came to-day to the city. Now, the Lord had told Samuel in his ear a day before Saul came, saying, To-morrow, about this time, I will send thee a man out of the land of Benjamin, and thou shalt anoint him to be captain over my people Israel, that he may save my people out of the hands of the Philistines: for I hav looked upon my people, because their cry is come unto me. And when Samuel saw Saul, the Lord said unto him, Behold the man whom I spake to thee of. This same shall reign over my people.

"Then Saul drew near to Samuel in the gate, and said, Tell me, I pray thee, where the seer's house is? And Samuel answered Saul, and said, I am the seer; go up before me unto the high place; for ye shall eat with me to-day, and to-morrow I will let thee go, and will tell thee all that is in thy heart. . . . Then Samuel took a phial of oil and poured it upon his head, and kissed him and said, Is it not because the Lord hath anointed thee to be captain over his inheritance?"

The learned Dom Calmet examins first whether the vessel containing the oil that Samuel had in his pocket was an earthen pitcher, a drinking-cup, or a glass phial, although glass was then unknown to the Jews; and he cannot decide this question. Not only had Samuel a revelation that Saul's asses had been recovered, but he poured oil on his head as a mark of his royalty; and hence it is that since that event every Jewish king has called him Self-Anointed Christ, in the Greek translations, and that the Jews hav called the mighty kings of Babylon and of Persia the Anointed, the Anointed of the Lord, Christ of the Lord.

It is said in Leviticus that Aaron, prevaricator and apostate though he was, was anointed by Moses in his quality of high-priest. In effect, it may hav happened in the wilderness, in the midst of a fearful destitution, that a vessel of oil being found, Moses poured it over the head, beard, and clothes of Aaron. This ceremony proved agreeable to a starving, destitute people, and as the Lord of heaven and earth presided at it, it was holy. The Jewish high-priests were afterward instated in their functions with the same anointing of oil. All rites and ceremonies should be public. Samuel, however, did not at first oil the head of Saul in the presence of the assembled people. Apparently he considered that he could not giv a more august character to Saul than by anointing him with the same oil with which he himself had been anointed, though it is not at all sure that Samuel had been anointed. However this may be, the Jewish kings were the only potentates that received this mark of royalty. No prince of antiquity has ever been known to hav been anointed by his subjects. This custom was taken from Italy, and it is presumed that the Lombardian usurpers, converted to Christianism, thought to sanctify their usurpation by having oil poured on their head by the hands of a prelate. Clovis was not anointed, but the usurper Pepin was. A few Spanish kings hav been anointed likewise, but the custom was long since abolished in Spain. It is said that an angel was sent down from heaven with a celestial bottle, filled with oil, to be used in the ceremony of the coronation of the kings of France; but some of our learned doctors hav regarded with doubt the history of this bottle, called the holy ampula, and the divine nature of its origin henceforth must remain an open question.

"When thou art departed from me to-day, then thou shalt find two men by Rachel's sepulcher in the border of Benjamin at Zelzah; and they will say unto thee, The asses which thou wentest to seek are found. . . . After that thou shalt come to the hill of God, where is the garrison of the Philistines: and it shall come to pass, when thou art come thither to the city, that thou shalt meet a company of prophets coming down from the high place with a psaltery and a tabret and a pipe and a harp before them, . . . and the spirit of the Lord will come upon thee, and thou shalt prophesy with them, and shalt be turned into another man. . . . And when Saul came thither to the hill, behold, a company of prophets met him, and the spirit of God came upon him, and he prophesied among them. And it came to pass when all that knew him beforetime saw that, behold, he prophesied among the prophets, then the people said one to another, What is this that is come unto the son of Kish? Is Saul also among the prophets?"

The oil with which Saul had been anointed must hav possessed some divine property, since it all at once made him a prophet, a dignity far above that of a king.

"And Samuel called the people together unto the Lord to Mizpeh, and said unto the children of Israel, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, I brought up Israel out of Egypt. . . . And ye hav this day rejected your God, who himself saved you out of all your adversities and your tribulations; and ye hav said unto him, Nay, but set a king over us. Now, therefore, present yourselvs before the Lord by your tribes and by your thousands. . . . And when Samuel had caused all the tribes of Israel to come near, the tribe of Benjamin was taken. When he had caused the tribe of Benjamin to come near by their families, the family of Matri was taken, and Saul, the son of Kish, was taken."

Critics hav found fault with Samuel for having anointed Saul king and made him Christ without having first assembled the people and obtained their suffrage. If a bottle of oil sufficed to make a king, any one so minded might get himself anointed by the curate of his village. This objection might indeed obtain in certain countries, but Samuel, who was the seer, knew beforehand that even had the people drawn a king by lot, the lot would hav fallen on Saul, and that then the people would recognize their legitimate and already anointed sovereign.

"Then Samuel told the people the manner of the kingdom, and wrote it in a book, and laid it up before the Lord. . . ."

They maintain, likewise, that to choose a king through the chances of the dice-box (as Boulenger says) is a very absurd thing; that in such case the lot might fall to a fool or a knave; that with the Greeks and the Romans it was indeed the custom to choose their king of the revels in this wise; but that in graver matters we should act with gravity and seriousness. The answer already made to this critic is that God directed the proceeding, and not only inspired the dice according to his own good pleasure, but likewise the will of the people.

With regard to the law of the kingdom, pronounced by Samuel, it is not known for certain if it be Leviticus or Deuteronomy. Some commentators are of opinion that it was a law made by Samuel himself.

About a month after, "Nahash, the Ammonite, came up and encamped against Jabesh-gilead: and all the men of Jabesh said unto Nahash, Make a covenant with us and we will serve thee.

"And Nahash, the Ammonite, answered them, On this condition will I make a covenant with you, that I may thrust out all your right eyes. And the elders of Jabesh said unto him, Giv us seven days' respite, that we may send messengers unto all the coasts of Israel: and then, if there be no man to save us, we will come out to thee."

Now, Saul (coming after the herd out of the field), having passed a review at Bezek, found that the children of Israel were in number three hundred thousand, and the men of Judah thirty thousand. And on the morrow Saul put the people in three companies; and they came into the midst of the host in the morning-watch, and slew the Ammonites until the heat of the day.

Unbelievers are not surprised at seeing Saul returning from the plough, but they strenuously refuse to contemplate him at the head of three hundred thousand combatants at the very time when the author declares the Jewish nation was held in servitude; that they had not a lance nor a sword; that the Philistines, their masters, would not even allow them an iron instrument with which to sharpen their ploughs, mattocks, or pruning-knives. Our Gulliver, says Lord Bolingbroke, has such fables, but not such contradictions.

We concede that the text is embarrassing; that distinction must be made between different periods; that peradventure the copyists hav made transpositions; that what was true in one year may not be true in another. It is possible, even, that those three hundred thousand men may be reduced to three thousand; it is so easy to make a mistake in figures. The reverend father Dom Calmet expresses himself as follows: "It is very possible that there is a little exaggeration in what is told of Saul and Jonathan."

"And Samuel said unto all Israel, Behold, I hav hearkened unto your voice in all that ye said to me, and hav made a king over you, . . . and I am old and gray-headed, . . . and he withdrew."

Mr. Huet, of London, says here again that this retreat of Samuel upon seeing Saul with such a number of followers clearly proves his spite and vexation at being no longer in power. But even were it so, even had Samuel given way to such weakness, where is the prelate who would not be chagrined at the loss of his power and prestige? We shall see, however, that the power of Samuel in no wise decreased.

"Saul reigned one year; and when he had reigned two years over Israel . . ."

This same Mr. Huet here cries out against the contradiction and the anachronism. In other places, says he, the scripture tells us that Saul reigned forty years. It is certain that there is here an apparent contradiction, and Dom Calmet himself has been unable to reconcile the texts. Possibly there may be an error on the part of the copyist.

"And the Philistines gathered themselvs together to fight with Israel, thirty thousand chariots, and six thousand horsemen, and people as the sand which is on the sea-shore in multitude: and they came up and pitched in Michmash, eastward from Beth-aven."

Messrs. Leclerc, Freret, Boulenger, Mallet, Bolingbroke, Middleton, protest against these thirty thousand chariots of war. Doctor Stakhouse, in his history of the Bible, rejects this passage entirely. Talmet says that such a number of chariots of war seems incredible, and that so many hav never been seen at once. Pharaoh, he continues, had but six hundred; Jabin, king of Azur, nine hundred; Sesac, king of Egypt, twelve hundred; Zazar, king of Ethiopia, three hundred, etc.

And again, the critics are at variance with the learned Dom Calmet with regard to the nine hundred chariots of King Azor. It is generally conceded that the use of cavalry was unknown in all the land of Canaan until comparativly a very late period. We hav already remarked that in this hilly locality, broken by caves and ravines, the ass alone was used for equestrian purposes. Supposing, even, that we reduce these thirty thousand chariots to three thousand, we shall not then satisfy the unbeliever. We know not how to explain this passage. Should we assume that the text has been corrupted, the answer would be that God, who dictated the text, should hav prevented the altering of it. Then we should answer back again that he has indeed prevented the faults of the copyists touching all essential things, but it may not be so with regard to war details, which are not necessary to our salvation.

"When the men of Israel saw that they were in a strait, for the people were distressed, then the people did hide themselvs in caves, and in thickets, and in rocks, and in high places, and in pits."

The critics say that if Saul had three hundred thousand soldiers and a prophet, being a prophet himself, he had nothing to fear; and he need not hav fled into caves, even though the country be full of them. It may be that at this period there were no paid armies who remained constantly under the flag.

"And some of the Hebrews went over Jordan to the land of Gad and Gilead. As for Saul, he was yet in Gilgal, and all the people followed him trembling.

"And he tarried seven days, according to the set time that Samuel had appointed; but Samuel came not to Gilgal; and the people were scattered from him.

"And Saul said, Bring hither a burnt-offering to me, and peace-offerings. And he offered the burnt-offering. And as soon as he had offered the burnt-offering, behold, Samuel came; and Saul went out to meet him, that he might salute him. And Samuel said, What hast thou done? And Saul said, . . . Because thou camest not within the days appointed, and that the Philistines gathered themselvs together at Michmash, therefore, said I, the Philistines will come down now upon me to Gilgal, and I hav not made supplication unto the Lord: I forced myself, therefore, and offered a burnt-offering. And Samuel said to Saul, Thou hast done foolishly: thou hast not kept the commandment of the Lord thy God; for now would the Lord hav established thy kingdom upon Israel for ever. But now thy kingdom shall not continue; the Lord hath sought him a man after his own heart, and the Lord hath commanded him to be captain over his people, because thou hast not kept that which the Lord commanded thee."

Mr. Huet, of London, says that in this passage Samuel only givs proof of his spite and jealous feelings toward Saul. He assumes, with Estius and Calmet, that Samuel was not high-priest; that he was only priest and prophet; that Saul was one and the other likewise; that he had prophesied as soon as he had been anointed, and that he had the right to offer peace-offerings. Samuel, says he, seems to hav failed to keep his word to no other end than that of finding an opportunity to blame Saul, and to render him hateful to the people. For ourselvs, we cannot concede that Samuel deserves such an accusation. Huet may attribute to him harshness, but assuredly not rascality. That would be all very well had Samuel been a priest anywhere else but among the Jews.

"And Samuel arose, and gat him up from Gilgal unto Gibeah of Bejamin. And Saul numbered the people that were present with him, about six hundred men."

The reader is doubtless very much surprised to find Saul now with but six hundred men when an instant ago he had three hundred and thirty thousand. We hav already accounted for this: armies were not paid in those days, and could be disbanded at a very short notice, as in the time of our feudal anarchy.

Communications.

Elmina Replies to Her Critics.

"Let Elmina proceed with her hobby . . . hav endured many a bore and expect many more," says Bodge. "Our gifted friend has evidently failed to meet or be joined in companionship with one in absolute or nearly magnetic affinity, or she would not write as she does," says another friend.

The first evidently fails to perceive the importance of the subject that is agitating the greatest philanthropists and humanitarians of the age, that of right generation and hygienic morality, and the last seems to ignore the great and grand idea of self-control and present self-abnegation when used as a means to greater and better good to the temperance reformer, and to all others who need reforming. Elmina blames no one for not feeling the same interest in her hobbies that she does herself. If they did she would hav no call to speak, for others, better qualified, would then do better work. But as the field was lying comparativly fallow, she has been sowing a small portion with such seed as she possessed in the hope that some little good would be done.

Were our friends as sure as we who labor for sexual reform are that intemperance in this line is far more injurious, physically and morally, than another sort of intemperance can possibly be, they would probably feel more interest in the subject and think some other motiv than a mere want of "magnetic affinity" was the governing one. Now I cannot imagin a more delightful drink than a rich and luscious glass of wine or a well-made cup of milk-punch, but I never taste them, though the "affinity" is strongly developed between my appetite and the fiery fluids, and the same as regards sausage-meat and mince-pies, two other indigestible evils. Of these last I do partake occasionally and sparingly, for they belong to the category of lesser harms, but the former I never touch, not only because they are poison to me, but because those who aim to teach should themselvs lead in the right way as far as is practicable.

Friend St. John, in a recent TRUTH SEEKER, is more nearly right; but I think he will in time see farther than he now does, and learn to look higher for the greatest happiness than sex intercourse and thus come to see that this nature-given taste or desire is given "only for procreativ purposes," and that all other indulgences are unnatural and debasing. Those who truly love and are physically fitted for producing offspring will always desire them, and there is no danger of "the race running out." It would be well if it could run out in many lines. It would be well if the low, degraded, and criminal class would cease to populate the world with murderers, thieves, and all manner of animals. And it would also be well if the feeble and weak mentally and physically would do the same.

I am reading a story in the Cincinnati Commercial, of a people in Mizora—in the heart of the earth—who are all women, all blondes (the highest type of humanity). It is a serial, and seems to be only well begun as yet, but it is a beautiful picture of what we might develop into did we think less of sex-pleasure and more of true knowledge, pure science, and real happiness. As yet in Mizora, the writer has never seen even a picture of a man, or heard the name mentioned, but all is peace, love, harmony, and happiness there, and domestic misery, sickness, and intemperance are things unheard of. Now, we don't wish to eliminate man from our world, but we do wish to lift him above the sexual, and into the intellectual, plane.

We would cultivate the body and carefully study its needs and requirments, but more as a casket for the mental and moral than for its own evanescent pleasure-feelings.

We would hav men and women educated together, and hav them work together, and pull together, each as the equal half of the other; each giving, yielding, and accepting on the same great plane of perfect unity and equality. The man must be just as kind, moral, polite, and refined in word, look, and act as the woman. In the home let each be one-half of the whole head; in the legislativ halls of the nation there also shall the two be made equally eligible to office, and possess equal power to make and enforce the law, all depending simply upon qualifications alone. The wise and the good only should lead and govern, and is not woman wisest and best of all?

She rules by love and moral suasion, and will in time do away with all physical pains and penalties instead of being as now their frequent and helpless victim. Every now and then some tale of woman-whipping by a brutal husband is made public by the press. But, alas! to one thus exposed do not we all know right close by, if not in our own homes, just such dreadful occurrences, not alone among the ignorant and lowly, but preachers and professional gentlemen are often found applying the lash to the wife and daughter, or the little, helpless maid-of-all-work, and it is only when woman shall become sexually free, when she owns herself, and man is compelled to ask instead of commanding, that this cruelty to our sex will pass away, and love, respect, and justice will reign supreme.

"May the grace of Mother Nature
And the light of reason's ray
With our honest, firm endeavor
Guide our feet in wisdom's way.
From it never
May we heedless turn away."

P.S.—As very many are inquiring of me the address and terms of The Alpha, the leading paper in the field of sexual and moral reform, I here giv a notice of it, and hope all who can will subscribe for it, thus aiding and helping one of the grandest movements for the elevation of our kind the world has ever yet known. The Alpha is published on the first of each month by the Moral Education Society, of No. 1 Grant place, Washington, D. Religious Liberty.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Our American Constitution grants full religious liberty and unconditional liberty of conscience to every inhabitant of this "land of the free and home of the brave." In this respect also that sturdy German ought to be satisfied, who, in order to wave an answer to an insolent question concerning his creed, is reported to hav said, "I believe that fourteen pounds of beef will giv a good soup."

For the cultivation of religion there exist churches in this country, which constitutionally are strictly private affairs, and not being subject to any special state control can act as freely as they choose, provided they do not violate the laws of the land. The polygamy of the Mormons in this country is a gross violation of the laws of the land—of those laws which stamp bigamy as a crime. The polygamy of the Mormons is nothing but an aggravated kind of bigamy, committed by them in a systematic way. It is a product of modern priestcraft, and, being a crime, does not promote their moral and religious welfare. By giving it up, voluntarily or forcibly, the Mormons will only cease to commit a crime, and not surrender one iota of their religious liberty.

How do the other churches in this country avail themselvs of the religious liberty granted them by our American fundamental law? Let us see. Family is and always has been the moral basis of human society. But the Catholic priests of this country submit to compulsory celibacy on account of a canon of their church. Their church, according to our American Constitution, has no legal right to prevent them from marrying and founding homes and families. Matrimony, being the holiest of human relations, is recognized as a legal institution by the laws of this country. That compulsory celibacy is an invention of medieval priestcraft, and has nothing to do with religious liberty. Its very name of compulsory celibacy implies that it is opposed to religious liberty. Its end is to keep the Catholic priests subject to the pope in Rome. But as American citizens, the Catholic clergy of this country hav in truth nothing to do with that foreign spiritual potentate and cannot be legally compelled to heed his dictates. According to our American religious liberty no man, the pope at Rome included, has a legal right to dictate anything to another man in this country for the purpose of promoting the moral and religious welfare of the latter. The Catholic priests of the United States, by throwing off the shackles of compulsory celibacy, would only avail themselvs of the religious liberty guaranteed them by our American fundamental law. Compulsory celibacy must be considered as a fiendish, immoral, and unnatural thing.

The Methodist church of this country, by compeling its clergymen to change their homes every three years, thus preventing them from founding permanent homes, does not come up to the requirements of our American religious liberty, which denies the right of compulsion, for religious reasons, in any shape whatsoever.

Finally, the circumcision of the Jews of this country, practiced by them on male children when they are eight days old, is also not in harmony with the religious liberty guaranteed by our American Constitution. That this rite has nothing to do with and is not indispensably necessary for the promotion of the moral and religious welfare of the individual upon whom it is practiced is easily to be seen from the fact that only male children are subject to it, and no corresponding rite exists among the Jews with regard to female children. The circumcision of the Jews plainly has no other object than to compel the little boy upon whom it is practiced, by this ineffaceable bodily mutilation, to become at all events a Jew when he grows up to manhood. Circumcision is nothing but a product of very ancient priestcraft. It is a wrong, fiendish, and unnatural custom and strictly opposed to religious liberty. The Jews of this country can, of course, abolish that rite without abandoning one tittle of the moral doctrins of their religion.

From the above, it is to be seen that the churches of this country hav not yet made a right or full use of the religious liberty guaranteed them by our noble American Constitution.

Very respectfully yours, JOHN G. HARTWIG.

Our Temperance Critic Again.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Your arguments in favor of a moderate use of intoxicating liquors may be satisfactory to the majority of your readers, but unfortunately, or otherwise, they lack the merit of originality.

Who ever saw a blear-eyed, red-nosed toper who did not profess an admiration for "true temperance" in all things, especially in the eating of bread and beef, or one who did not, in his own family, prohibit the deadly sin of gluttony? Or who ever saw a man with a chronic thirst for something stronger than coffee who was not sure of having "sufficient control" over his appetite to keep himself form inebriety, and who did not look with pity not unmingled with contempt upon his weaker brother.

You say that you saw very little drunkenness in wine and beer-drinking Germany, but I think, without doubt, if you made good use of your eyes you saw a great amount of poverty, misery, and brutality, caused by the use of the above-mentioned liquors. In no country in the so-called civilized world is woman so shamefully maltreated and abused by her brutal, beer-drinking owner and master.

Luther complained that in his day there was enough "barley destroyed in the breweries to feed all Germany." Where the children's bread is turned into poison, there may we look for squalor, crime, and wretchedness. Despite the narrowness, bigotry, and superstition of the churches, I would rather see my sons occupying a corner of some orthodox fold, from which the wolf of intemperance is excluded, in preference to joining with that band of reformers who mistake license for liberty, and who in breaking away from authority leave morality behind.

What Liberalism Has Done.

In my early religious experience, the lake of fire and brimstone was an important plank in the Christian platform. Heaven would hav been incomplete without it. We had pious souls in those days, to whom heaven would hav been as beefsteak without gravy unless they could look down from their blessed abode and see their ungodly neighbors in that seething caldron writhing in remediless tortures.

Such piety don't so abound now, and, of course, such lake, in so close proximity, is not so indispensable now as seventy-five years ago.

Somewhere about the year 1808 Universalism made its debut in what is now Yates county, New York. Like other new ideas, it had to contend with preconceived notions. The opposition was sometimes direct; sometimes slantindicular. One individual, being asked the then common question, "What's the news?" replied, "Havn't you heard?" "No." "Well, they've sent off for a whole ship-load of canvas." "A whole ship-load of canvas! For what?" "To enlarge Father Abraham's shirt. His bosom isn't half big enough to hold all creation."

The doctrin of salvation—universal or otherwise—is better understood now. Sensible people, in this sensible age, make the sublime discovery that heaven, or happiness, is in proportion to inherent and practical goodness—to purity of heart and purity of life.

In no condition, save as above, is happiness attainable. Who has such condition is prepared for all contingencies. Purity of heart and of life would turn hell out of doors and make heaven there. There the wicked—our own wicked—cease from troubling, and we are at rest.

From the wicked of other folks we hav nothing to fear. When we hav trodden down all the wicked in us, as ashes, under the soles of our feet, we find heaven everywhere. Thunderbolts of the wrath of man, in the name of God, may fall like hail-stones. With us all is calm, sunshine, and gentle breezes, perpetual verdure, and perpetual bloom. Amen. Glory hallelujah. PRENTISS.

THE orange is the longest-lived fruit tree known. It is reputed to hav attained the age of three hundred years, and has been known to flourish and bear fruit for more than a hundred years.

[A Lecture Delivered at Applebee Hall, Chicago.]

The Clergy.—Concluded.

BY GEORGE CHAINEY.

Then, the clergy are not the best of company to natural, common-sense people. If you want to unbosom yourself, to compare with another your boldest, freest thought and most secret ambitions, you do not seek for your confidant a minister. There is no class so lamentably ignorant of human nature. It is this that givs the average sermon such a far-away sound. It is the language of Canaan, and to you there is no meaning in it.

The faults of the clergy are not so much venal as petty. They are inclined to be jealous of each other's honor and success. Did you ever hear one minister say a real good hearty word of praise of another? Of course you hav in public, for there they pray for a brother as though they thought him a blessed man, but behind his back they will pick his sermon all to pieces or declare he must hav stolen it. For their sake and yours it will be a blessed day when we hav no priests. We don't need them, because instead of fostering fear and superstition we should do our best to destroy them. To do this we must substitute theology, the barbarian's interpretation of the universe, with science, the explanation of the civilized man. The sword of science is so sharp that it is killing the ghosts. Its light is so powerful that it drives away the very shadow of fear. It clears the brain of unhealthy dreams. It reveals the glorious fact and law of life and conduct, that happiness is the only good. It opens to us a wide field of intellectual certitude in which we can feed to our heart's content. It shows us the utter impossibility of grasping the infinit, and thus prepares us to enjoy the contentment of humility. It enlarges our interest in the earth on which we liv, and leads us to value the present time. We learn in the wisdom of Touchstone that to hav is to hav. We cease to neglect the body in the interest of an imaginary and merely hypothetical soul. We cease gazing into the skies by discovering that the real meanings of life are blossoming like the flowers at our feet. Science murders pain, and even defies the curse of God by lifting some of the burdens thereof from the world's motherhood. It depopulates graveyards and dark nights of spooks and ghosts for our children; destroys for them the awful thoughts about hell and devils that affrighted our young minds. Science is a white-winged messenger of love, while theology is a dark-robed demon of fear. Science is an eagle that flies upward toward the sun, but theology is an owl that haunts the night with doleful sounds. What we want is the schoolhouse, not the church; the teacher, not the priest. All sorts of foolish books hav been written about the reconciliation of science and theology. It would be just as wise to talk about a marriage with fire and gunpowder. The property of science is to destroy theology. The two can not liv together. They are mortal foes. It is a battle of life and death. I think the victory is foreseen by most. The church must wane and the schoolhouse increase. Miracles and providence must go out before invariable and immutable law. God must giv up the ghost before the indestructibility of force and the motion of all matter. Angels will be forgotten when men and women, aided by intelligence, do better service for humanity. We shall cease to pray when we learn to respect ourselvs. We shall leave off crying to God for salvation when we find that we control all the saving forces of the universe. Science is the true savior. Railroads, telegraphs, telephones, gas, electric light, public parks, baths, museums, and art galleries—these are the true apostles. Every creation of labor and each clever invention of the brain is a promis of hope and salvation. Our redeemer liveth in the thought and love and hope of man. Progress, development, education, wealth, manners, refinement, liberty, fraternity, and equality are the divine agencies of our redemption. Every creed is a clog on our wheels; every priest is a sworn foe to all these things. Oh, my friends, we need salvation. For centuries these men hav been pleading for some power in the skies to bring it, and lo! it comes not. Let us answer their prayers by showing them that it is deeds, not creeds, that are wanted. Let every city be lighted by electricity until night is turned into day; let all the houses be warmed by one grand system, and so winter be turned into summer, and much of all present crime would be banished. Let every child be educated, and let that education be useful rather than ornamental, developing the body and training the senses to quickness and skill, and the present evil of the world will be reduced still more. Let the end of all our legislatiou be the development and happiness of mankind, and our salvation is sure. In order to learn this we must unlearn all that the church teaches, and discover that the work of almost every priest is an obstruction to this development, a cloud of gloom and fear between us and this shining star of progress. However good and true the clergy may be, their work is wasted, because it provides for none of the real needs of humanity. We do not need them to visit in our homes. All visiting should be that natural social intercourse that is regulated by intelligence and friendship. More harm has come out of pastoral visitation than language can describe. No one has any right to come meddling between husband and wife. A wife ought to be ashamed to ask any other man to pray for her husband. Why should a minister pray, "Lead us not into temptatiau," and then straightway lead himself into it?

We do not need them to officiate at weddings. All this talk about God beiug a match-maker is stupid nonsense. If there is such a superintendent, we ought to legislate him out of the business for the great and awful blunders he makes. The church in its doctrin of marriage has degraded that pure and sacred love that is always the true marriage. In reference to this question, the education of our young people is simply infamous. Let every young man be taught to adore his lady. Let every young woman venerate herself more than the temple of God or Christ. The saddest sights that meet my eye any time I walk the streets are the young men who hav emasculated themselvs and the young women who hav murdered their sex and beauty on the altars of religion, lust, or fashion. O cruelty infamous! I hate with every drop of my blood the church that slays the actual body in order to save an imaginary soul. It is time that we preached with Walt Whitman a salvation for the body. Grandly and heroically he says:

"Divine am I, inside and out, and I make holy whatever I touch or am touched from. The scent of these arm-pits, aroma finer than prayer; this head more than churches, Bibles, and all the creeds." If anything is sacred, the human body is sacred.

And the glory and sweat of a man is the token of manhood untainted. And in man or woman, a clean, strong, firm-fibered body is beautiful as the most beautiful face. For without this there cannot be love, and without love there would be no art, or poem, or literature. Without this the world would be a prowling wilderness, and yet the church has overshadowed the meaning and importance of this with its ideas of total depravity and divine grace. The public part of the marriage is entirely for the preservation of social order, and no marriage should be legal unless performed by a civil officer; not a mere magistrate who is too often picked from the lowest demagogs and holds his court in the back room of a grocery or a saloon, but one appointed for this purpose and clothed by the state with at least as much honor as a judge. If people who believe in religious ceremonies want them, let them hav them; but the state has no business to take any cognizance of them. Neither do we need the clergy as comforters. When the heart is smitten with real grief, I fancy it says with Job, "Miserable comforters are ye all." If they would come to our sides as men with no profession of light beyond the boundaries of life, with no talk about resignation to the will of God, and out of a pure human sympathy and fellow love, keep us company, a tender word would be welcome. But the average funeral service makes a mockery of grief and an auction of consolation. It demands a resignation we cannot feel, and offers us sympathy that is ghostly and unreal. Who wants to be preached at when the heart is crushed and bleeding, and the heavens are hung with sable? Better eternal silence than any attempt at oratorical or rhetorical display at such a time. Real love is seen and felt best in the eyes that are soft and tremulous with its light, in the silent eloquence of flowers, the unselfish deed, and unpretentious anticipation of our slightest need.

I would not deny to any one who cherished it the immortal hope, but to argue about it or to preach it is to disperse it. While love and death endure, its star will shine above the grave, but to demand that this hope be changed into a belief is to awaken thoughts that are best asleep.

It is claimed by the clergy that without this belief there remains nothing but despair. This, however, is far from true. To us, who have not this belief, death is but the ceasing to liv, and we can never experience that. It is like going to sleep. We are awake, and in the morning we remember being awake and wondering how long it would be before we would go to sleep, but never do we remember when we fell asleep. So unconsciously, but for the horrid superstitions of theology, would life end in the dreamless sleep of eternal rest. No dreams are better than bad ones. "Hearts of dust do not break." No wave of sorrow rests upon the silent shore of the continent of death.

Neither do we need the clergy to amuse us. Still, the nearest they come to being useful is in this direction. In most city churches the minister is selected for his dramatic and elocutionary abilities more than the quality of his doctrin. The trustees consider his drawing power in the same way that a theatrical manager does that of a star. The choir is selected for its operatic ability. The architecture and decoration of the churches are taking on the warmth and brightness of the theater. The most popular churches are to-day but amateur places of amusement. In this they are doing a good work by building a bridge across which the world will travel from the ministry of tears to that of laughter. They will help people to see that it is equally appropriate and far more serviceable for the legitimate theater and opera to be open on Sunday; that it is no more a crime to pay at the door than in the collection-box. They hav already found this out in Chicago, and other cities will soon follow. The idea of theology has been that it is good for man to be sad; the idea of science is that it is good for him to be glad. There is no medicin like a good laugh.

The common course of every man's life brings enough tears without consecrating one day in seven to gloom and sadness. Of all days, Sunday should be the brightest and fairest. We can be served much better in this direction by the regular drama and opera than by the church. When we become intelligent we shall find that there is more inspiration in a great play like Hamlet or an opera like Faust than in all the sermons ever preached.

Some think the theater on the decline. The fact is, it has not yet taken its true place in the world. It requires intellectual development to enjoy the creations of art and genius. When this comes, the children of genius will take their proper place. No time or place will be too good for them to inspire us by unfolding, as in a picture, the lights. If the future has anything like a church, it will be the mingling together of all that is best in literature, art, music, and the drama into a flood of beauty and joy that shall refresh and inspire the hearts and minds of men. The clergy and the present church are not a success at this. The proprieties and conventionalities drown out any tendency to mirth, while the ideas of theology are apt to develop a sort of holy, or, more properly speaking, funeral tone. It takes a long time to get over this, as some of you may hav observed this morning.

We do not need the clergy to giv grace and reverence to life. As long as one class is considered more reverent than another, we draw false lines of distinction between men of equal worth and reverence, and so create an aristocracy that is worse than that of wealth or blood. Instead of encouraging the idea of leadership, we need to develop that of independence. Before the mind of man became large and strong enough to seize upon varied possibilities of life in truth, love, justice, liberty, and joy, and blending them into one perfect picture, to hold them as a standard toward which to strive, it naturally fastened upon some hero or superior man as a guide and example. This may still be well for some; but it is time we encouraged a nobler aim. To be true to ourself is better than to follow some one blindly as a guide, though their self be nobler than ours. It is this discovery of the worth of independence that makes it impossible for one man to be taken from all others and exalted as an object of worship. This can only be done in a credulous age, among a people who are ignorant of nature, and who lack the mental power to discern truth, virtue, and justice as principles, and so need to hav them in some object-lesson. The growth of knowledge in science and literature is so vast, the forms of beauty in painting, sculpture, and architecture so many, the opportunities to do good so multitudinous, that it is impossible for any one man to gather all these up into himself. In the days of hero-worship, or when the priesthood was a beneficent power, this was far different. Science was unborn, art was in its cradle, religion or theocracy was the only form of government, so that, though deep and forceful, the channel of possible human activity was still narrow, and one large nature could fill and overflow its banks. This can be so no more. However we may crave a personal leader, a moral and intellectual pastor or shepherd who can answer our every question and supply our every deficiency of hope and courage, he is not to be found again among all the sons of men.

As the world grows wiser and better, all forms of hero-worship decay. Monarchies go down before rising republics. Hierarchies tremble with the palsy of death before the growing reason and conscience of mankind. Titles become mere words that hav no meaning for an honest man but that of a vain conceit. Aristocracies become empty and shallow before the ever-increasing glory and genius of an enlightened people. Are not these the signs of the times? Do you not see that we will make no more kings, crown no more emperors, exalt no more orders like the clergy into a senseless reverence above others, and that those who are thus exalted must take their places in the rank and file of this great, earnest, and toiling humanity? I know that it will be objected to all this that the clergy and the church produce the morality and conscience of the world. We are told that when these things are gone there will be no law of righteousness controling the world; that life will be a chaos without law or order, in which the master motiv will be every man for himself and the devil take the hindmost. Nothing is farther from the truth than this. Morality or righteousness is the accumulated experiences of all the centuries. There is a natural morality and an artificial one. The first comes in the natural course of events; the other is entirely dependent on one's religious training. At the best this is only the morality of hire and barter. People who are good for religion's sake acknowledge the baseness of their motivs when they say that if they believed as we do they would hav nothing to restrain them from doing wrong. Natural morality is the fruit of all the centuries. Every dart of pain, every glow of love, every tear of sympathy, every thrill of joy, every star of hope, all the struggles of humanity to find what is just and true from the beginning until now, hav made us what we are. We cannot escape from this inheritance of tendency to right-doing if we would. The goodness that is in our hearts today has grown in the affection of countless mothers as they hav watched with sleepless patience above the cradles of their children, and in the hearts of fathers as they hav toiled on by flaming forge, on giddy scaffold, among roaring machinery, in deep, dark mines, through summer's heat and winter's cold, in order to keep the wolf of hunger from those they love. It is born out of danger of war and the joy of victory. It is like the atmosphere that surrounds us. It is part of every fiber of our being. It would be just as sensible to say that a loss of a belief or the work of the clergy would do away with the air we breathe, or the water we drink, as destroy the fact of morality.

It is also objected that the clergy are the embassadors of God, and that a belief in God is essential to the happiness of mankind. This, too, is absolutely false in the light of reason and fact. Thousands of the best and noblest men and women living to-day hav no more belief in a God than you hav in fairies and witches. We do not deny the existence of a God, because that is to be dogmatic by affirming something of the unknowable. But whoever believes in a god cannot be noble enough to belong to himself, nor extend that right to any one else. Those whose theology has dwindled down to this last point of belief in a God are very near to the kingdom. Still while they cling in any way to that small bit of theological wharf, they cannot know the large, rich life of him who has launched his bark out bravely on the shoreless sea, and who daily discovers some new island of beauty, wonder, and delight. I would not cast one word of reproach on those who claim that they know God by the universal shining of his light. Still, there is to me so much degradation, injustice, and bigotry springing out of this belief that I cannot refrain from antagonizing the purest and loftiest theism as the last stronghold of that superstition that leads man to seek for truth in the skies when it is at his feet on the earth; to offer his devotions to a phantom instead of to suffering flesh and blood, to waste his energies on another world when they are all needed in the present one. As long as men believe in a God there will be for them something beyond the truth that is more than the truth. While they listen for the voice of God they will be unable to hear the clearest voice of reason and of nature. God will stand between them and a true knowledge of themselvs. They will cringe and crawl in the dust when they ought to stand erect in the glad sunlight of truth, undimmed with a single cloud of fear. While they believe in a lawgiver, they must be blind to the beauty and meaning of a law. While there is to them a power that is more than the sum of nature, and a man that has called forth both the world and us from naught, they must continue to sing their doleful song.

"Oh! tell me no more of this world's vain show."

It is also said that the work of the clergy stands directly related to the sentiments and fine feelings of life. No; in reality we who hav renounced this faith hav but put ourselvs where these sentiments swell into far deeper and broader currents. We no longer explain them away with a creed, or quench our wonder in senseless omnipotence. Our hearts throb with constant pulsations of joy at the touch of these waves of feeling that break upon us from life's shoreless sea. Our heart-strings are strung into a more delicate harmony with every sympathetic touch of nature's hand. All the changing lights and shadows thereof find reflection in more peaceful depths. We humbly confess that we cannot grasp the infinit, and the reward is a sweet contentment enriched with perpetual wonder and delight. Above and beneath us floats the unknown, shoreless and vast. We see no beginning and no end. Deep calleth unto deep. We waste no more time in building a tower to try and touch the sky, for every creed is but a tower of Babel. Nature seems to be our mother. We fling ourselvs gladly into her arms, and contenting ourselvs with her we find that her skirts are fringed with beauty, and that the crown of eternity rests upon her majestic brow. To all questions of the infinit and another life, we say, "I do not know." I only know that the morning and evening's hush; the splendor and glow of night; the first faint, delicious odors of spring; the summer's effulgence; the autumnal glory, and the splendors, the keen delights of winter, the myriad wonders and beauties of its snow and ice; the flow of a river like a stream of silver across the landscape of a peaceful valley; the uplifted majesty of a mountain; the solemn, mystic music of the ocean's roar; and, more than all these, the grand music evoked by human genius, that

> "Comes o'er the ear like the sweet sound
> That breathes upon a bank of violets,
> Stealing and giving odor;"

the magic of those splendid children of genius like Shakspere and his noblest interpreters, who in the drama unfold to us the page of history, and permit us to feel beating against ours the throbbing heart of past generations; the splendid works of art in painting and in sculpture, that seem to envelop us with their beauty, with all the wonders of human thought and love; subdue me and uplift me, fill me with delicious gladness, making me sometimes tremble and weep with joy. Before all this vastness and grandeur, which make of all creeds, dogmas, and preachments, stupid impertinences and senseless profanations, I can no longer be a priest nor entertain any respect for the work of the clergy.

"Our Evils."

It is an exceedingly astonishing fact to a sensible-minded person who will reflect without superstition or without fear that he is committing a sin by the exercise of his natural mental faculties that nearly all the strifes, bickerings, contentions, and discords, both national and social, are caused by the Bible, or rather by the faith extracted therefrom, in many forms, by the multitude.

The public in general, however, do not appear to realize the enormity of their error in thus allowing a book—more properly, it seems to me, a novel—to plant barriers before them in the already difficult passage of life, causing the evils mentioned.

Can we believe the Bible to be reliable after carefully reading the first book, that of Genesis, and reflecting philosophically upon the words therein?

Let us remember that, relying upon that book, we believe that this so-called God placed us upon earth; let us remember that we also believe this being is all-powerful, viz., possessing the power of foresight, etc.; in short, perfect.

He therefore, in placing Adam upon his lands knew the consequences, could look from that time to the present, and from the present on and on forever. He sees the sorrow and suffering prevalent today. He knows they will result from his deed, yet he heeds not; he is hardened, calloused, brutal, tyrannical, and devises ways and means of torture for those he has power to create, and who could never hav done him harm.

The Bible teaches us the Golden Rule—do ye unto others as ye wish to be done by—and that by contributing toward the happiness of others we ourselvs are made happy.

This God had the power to create us and to place us in a beautiful garden, where we might hav been ever happy, and thereby gladdened his heart by the scenes of our joy. But no; he places within us a mind insufficiently strong to resist the temptation which he plants before us in the shape of a tree of fruit in the Garden of Eden to tantalize us; and because of that weakness of mind we are doomed to our present state, struggling amid sorrow and innumerable grievances, and with the Bible to tell us that there are ten chances to one that we will, after all, be doomed to be everlastingly consumed by hell-fire.

Is this a just God? Should we worship this spiritual tyrant? Should we allow such a threatening book composed of inconsistencies to remain in our midst or to be drilled into the minds of our young? Will we not realize the fallacy of such ridiculous faith? Shall we not awaken to a realization of the dangers which this book imposes upon us by the effect it seems to hav upon the minds of our citizens and our countrymen and women abroad, causing, as I hav said, bitter contentions against families and nations? Should we allow such ridiculous teaching to progress? Should we allow it to act as a preventiv to perfect harmony between the countries of our world? Should we allow it to creep into our politics, and there thrust its poisoned fangs, causing dire commotion, corruption, malice, and discontent?

Let us cling close to that Golden Rule—do unto others as we wish to be done by—and thereon hang our happiness, our peace, and filial affection for all nations, our protection from wars and harrowing scene and sounds—sounds that now daily float to us through our press, bringing details of constant strife throughout our lands.

I believe there is not one man or woman in a thousand that can truthfully say they are really happy and perfectly content. Look deep down into their hearts, and you will find there lies a regret that they had ever been made; that their entrance into the world had ever been effected; but they are helpless.

Let us look at our own city in the neighborhoods of poverty. See the wretchedness, the squalor; see the dirt-begrimed faces pinched with agonizing hunger! Ask them if they are content, and they will reply, "Oh, that I had never been born!"

It is remarkable that we fail to think of these words and reflect upon their significance. Whose fault that we were born? Why, our parents'. And why did our parents bring us into the world? Oh, well, the Bible tells us we must "increase and multiply;" and then, too, "we like children." These, then, are their reasons; the first, that ruinous belief in the Bible; the second, selfishness.

Oh, that the people's eyes could be opened; could be made to see clearly, not blinded by superstition, and be made to realize that we are daily causing human beings to endure a life of harrowing toil, and what other fates we know not, by our childbirths.

It should be enough to stop all propagation of the species should we see but one in sorrow. But we look upon thousands who are victims of their parents' indiscretion and inhuman shortsightedness.

Do we fear punishment because of a cessation on our parts of generating? Not the thoughtful. And if we do? Was not slavery an evil which we suppressed with our lives Did not our fathers and grandfathers sacrifice their home comforts, their life-blood, for the cause they considered just, for a mass of human beings; and would we not as readily do the same? They feared not death, aye, they expected it; but yet they pressed boldly forward to the rescue.

The evil of causing misery upon human beings by ushering them unasked into this comfortless world is a thousand, aye, ten thousand times more an evil than the slavery of the South. A shame upon us as slave producers, bringing those of our own image into a life of daily slavery, and binding them down by our own acts to a life of toil and discord. How can we do this, knowing that we ourselvs bitterly regret the event of our own birth?

This, then, is another prevalent error consequent upon the abominable belief centered in the Bible.

Did any one ever know a minister to expound every passage in the Bible? Not at all. There are portions of the book which they could not, with safety to their own reputation, touch upon, because those passages conflict one with another and show constant contradiction.

It says: "It is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven," therefore we must infer that to possess wealth is to forfeit our admission to that much-talked-of locality—heaven.

Again, it says, "A murderer cannot enter the kingdom of heaven," and in another chapter, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be washed as white as snow;" what can we infer from that?

Does Anthony Comstock read the Bible? If so, can he resist the duty, under his organization, of expelling it from circulation as coming under the head of obscene literature? Surely he deserves reprimand for his negligence, and is unworthy of his reputation or position.

Will a minister, in his sermons, explain those passages to which Comstock's attention should be directed? No; he is too discreet; he knows his inability, and too fondly treasures his position amongst his deluded congregation.

Is it not marvelous that such a state of affairs should exist amongst an enlightened nation?—that their eyes and ears should be closed to all reason? That they should daily expend thousands toward the support of such farcical church ceremonies and teachings, while our poor, who sadly need the money thus lavished on the heads of the ministerial impostors, are looked coldly upon and are barred even from the church doors where that money is expended?

Where is our manhood, our womanhood, our honor, our sense of justice? Where is the observance of the Golden Rule to be found? Why do we not exercise our mental faculties in a straightforward, philosophical manner? Why are we not cognizant of our duty?

We hav allowed a monstrous wrong to creep into our midst, a viper that will cling and rob us of our cherished hopes of freedom, of happiness, of peace; that will bring sorrow upon the heads of those we persist in bringing on earth. We hav committed a wrong; we must undo it ere it is too late. We must open the eyes of the multitude. We must drive superstition from their minds. They must be waked from their lethargic stupor, in which state they hav been dreaming fanciful, childish dreams, and be brought to a realization of their dangerous proximity to the yawning abyss before them. Let them awake, repair the misdeeds, grasp their brothers and sisters of all nations by the hand, and say unto them: "We are one; our friendship is unbiased by superstition, and we will liv our lives for each other, with a due appreciation of our several interests, and with our firm purpose in view to lend a helping hand and remove the barriers in the paths of our several life journeys, avoiding all abuses and practices which we know and feel to be, by reason of our natural instinct, detrimental to those interests, and contaminating in their touch." And when we pass from this earth it will be with a joyful remembrance of our just deeds and observance of the laws of nature, and a sense of filial affection toward those of our brothers left behind; a happiness supreme, and with no fear of an unhappy future. "Thought and Mind."—A Reply.

Friend Chapman is out at considerable length in his final article upon this subject, on page 26; but, unfortunately, in the exuberance of his ideas, he presents few or no proofs to sustain the theory he advocates. Theory it is, and nothing more. Theories upon a great variety of subjects hav been abundant in all times. Among these may be named the claim that there is a man in the moon, and that that orb is composed of "green cheese." It can be said for these theories that there is just about as much proof of their truth as there is of friend Chapman's "element," which furnishes all the mind in the world.

Not wishing to follow our friend in all his remarks, or to say all that can be said upon the subject, a portion only of his arguments will be considered.

If the brother is correct that the intelligence among men is wholly dependent upon this element of mind which he imagins fills the vault of starry space, if there is such an elementary substance in such profuse quantity, it certainly must possess fixed qualities, easily demonstrated to the comprehension of intelligent people. If this source of mind is a real element, like oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, or chlorine, it must be fixed in character, uniform in manifestation, and capable of being presented to the senses—of being weighed, measured, and tested.

No person can justly claim he has found an "element," an original, simple form of substance, unless he is able to produce some of it in its nativ, uncombined state. All the elements, recognized by chemists and scientists hav been so produced. Take, for instance, oxygen. It forms, probably, half the bulk of the earth and the atmosphere which surrounds it. It is never found in nature in an uncombined state, but it is very usual to find it combined with nearly all the other elements, from which it can be readily separated and reduced to a simple, uncombined condition. In this state it is weighed, measured, and tested in various ways, so that its identity is as well established as though it were an ingot of gold or a bar of pig-iron.

It is the same with all elements—some sixty-eight or seventy of them. They are seldom found isolated and uncombined in nature, but nearly always more or less combined with each other. Carbon, in the form of diamonds, and tears and grains of gold in quartz and sand, are exceptions to the general rule. They are usually united with other elements, but can be easily separated when the proper means are used. It is because they can be separated and exhibited that the learned men of the world admit them to be primary elements, and, but for this ability to exhibit them, they never could be recognized or acknowledged. The simple assertion or theory that they exist would not answer for the scientific men of the world. Each element has to be separated and exhibited, and the modus operandi of separation explained, so that any person can accomplish the same result, or the existence of the element will never be admitted. Mr. Chapman cannot thus separate and exhibit his supposed element, nor can he inform others how to separate it and weigh it, consequently his discovery cannot be admitted.

All the known elements are acted upon by some of the other elements. Oxygen is most sociable in its intercourse with the other elements; it combines with them in thousands of ways, affording an almost endless number of compounds. Oxygen is an important factor in nearly all the acids; it is called the acidifying element or principle, and in the form of an acid readily acts upon all of the metals, earths, and others of the elements forming sulphates, nitrates, etc. It is the element which makes combustion possible, and in the burning process, whether slow, as the rusting of metals, or by the more rapid process of combustion, it unites with the elements acted upon, forming a numerous class of oxides and oxalates.

Carbon, hydrogen, nitrogen, chlorine, etc., hav similar combining powers with the other elements, though less in extent, but they can always be easily separated and reduced to their primary condition when their peculiar character is clearly perceived. As Mr. Chapman cannot separate his element nor exhibit it to our comprehension, we cannot admit its existence, or that he has made a real discovery.

If Mr. Chapman's element is a reality, like oxygen, hydrogen, carbon, sulphur, lead, iron, etc., etc., he should show it in its compounds if he cannot produce the simple substance. He should be able to exhibit oxide of mind, sulphate of mind, chlorate of mind, and the scores of other combinations into which it should enter. If mind is really an element, as he asserts, it must hav combining power with other elements, and the chemical compounds thus produced could at least be shown.

If there is an element in the cosmos that makes the mind of man, or is the mind of man, if it is a form of substance that does the thinking, it must be insisted upon that it is homogeneous in its nature, and, when drawn upon from the great fountain or reservoir, it must always present the same peculiarities, the same characteristics. If this element has intelligence, or is intelligence, if it acts upon the brain of human beings, it must be uniform in the results produced, in the character exhibited.

But what are the facts? No two minds are alike. An endless diversity exists. Can this be if the fountain is homogeneous—all alike? We hav heard of jugglers pouring brandy, whisky, rum, gin, and wine from the same bottle; but it must certainly require a far greater juggler to draw millions of different minds from the same great bottle or fountain of the universe.

If Mr. Chapman's theory is correct, when the newborn babe enters the world, sets up a separate individual existence, and begins to draw from this great fountain of mind, it should be able to draw precisely the quality of intelligence which the fountain contains, and he must ever continue to draw the same quality of intelligence so long as he keeps up the drawing process. It should be the same when he is a day old as when forty years. It should not be feeble when he draws the first in infancy, nor in the decline of life, when age and infirmity come upon him. The intelligence from this great reservoir of mind should always be the same, whether drawn by a small spiggot or a large one.

So, too, animals—dogs, horses, elephants, birds, reptils, fishes, insects, like bees and ants—should all be able to draw the same grade of intelligence or mind, for Mr. Chapman will not deny they all hav intelligence, and many of them in a marked degree. They must all be drawers from his great mind fountain, and must draw precisely the same element. There should be no difference in it.

But the facts will not sustain his theory. A newborn babe is the most perfect know-nothing that can be conceived of. Though provided with drawing facilities from its mother's breast, and also from Mr. Chapman's great fountain of intelligence, it is entirely ignorant and helpless. A calf, a chicken, or a partridge ten minutes old is immensely smarter and more activ, more intelligent, than a human babe that has drawn from this marvelous fountain a year or more. How can this be possible if they all draw from the same great reservoir of mind? How is it if all draw from this unfailing fountain of mind-element that the idiot and the imbecil are so much inferior to the sage and philosopher? Why is it that the Bushmen of South Africa and the nativs of Borneo and Australia are so far inferior in intellect to many of the inhabitants of Great Britain, France, Germany, and America? The very fact that there is such an immense difference in the quantity and quality of intelligence received appears to be a positiv proof that it is not drawn from a vast homogeneous fountain of mind to which all hav equal access. If it is the battery or brain that makes the wide difference observed we might as well regard the brain as the source of intelligence, and not flounder around in an imaginary fountain of mind-element. If it is the brain that so modifies the intelligence which it draws from the mind reservoir to produce the interminable diversities which exist we may as well cease to look at a supposed fountain of any simple element as the source.

It is true that nature contains all the elements that exist, and is the fountain whence is drawn organization, life, sensation, and intelligence. This is easily traced from protoplasm evolved from cruder forms of matter, and which is the necessary condition whence cells and animal life could only hav been produced, and so on up from the monads and simplest types of life though worms, fishes, reptils, birds, quadrupeds, and mammals up to man—all hav life, all hav sensation, all hav intelligence, but in widely varying degrees. This great variety of intelligence depends solely upon the ever-differing organizations. The muscular strength of a fish-worm is very different from that of an ox; the sight of an owl is very different from that of an eagle; the intelligence of an oyster is very unlike that of man, and this difference arises wholly from the difference in the organizations producing these results. All of course draw from the great source and fountain of nature; but as muscular strength is not drawn from a simple element of strength, as good eye-sight does not exist in consequence of a fountain of the sight-element, so intelligence does not exist because of, and is not drawn from a fountain of the element of mind.

There is just as much reason for claiming that there is an element of muscular strength, another of audible perception, or hearing; another of sharp eyesight, another of nervous sensation, as that there is an element for mind. As large, well-developed muscles impart muscular strength, as a fine hearing apparatus insures acute hearing, as good eyes and healthy optic nerves are essential to seeing, so a well-organized brain and nervous system are indispensable to the production of a good mind or intellect. No matter how large the fountain of mind, no matter how near it is, or how direct the organization draws from it, it amounts to nothing unless the organs are such as will produce the important results. Despite all that Mr. Chapman can say upon the subject, the organs are what does the business. Unless they meet the necessities, the fountain and the element amounts to little.

Mr. Chapman seems to be of the opinion that electricity or magnetism is this mind element which he estimates so highly, and triumphantly inquires where they come from. We cannot tell him where electricity comes from any more than we can tell him where anything else comes from. All that is, is here, and that is as far as anybody knows. This much is known with regard to electricity—it is one of the forces existing in connection with matter. It is produced by the dissolution or decomposition of some of the metals (such as zinc), by friction, and various processes for gathering it where it exists. It is convertible into the other forms as light and heat, and they are convertible into it, and neither are known to hav any existence save in close connection with matter. The fact that electricity can be converted into light and heat is most conclusiv proof that it is not one of the simple elements. There is no known element that can by any possibility be converted into another element. The alchemists of a few hundred years ago held that the baser metals could be converted into gold, but though they kept up the trial for centuries not an ounce of lead or copper was ever converted into gold any more than oxygen can be converted into hydrogen, chlorine into carbon, or sulphur into calcium.

We agree with Mr. Chapman that electricity is of the highest necessity in the phenomena of vegetable and animal life, as well as in the motions of the heavenly bodies. It is indispensable in the various functions of the human organization, and in the production of sensation and intelligence, and the transmission of the same over the nerves of the body; but there is not the slightest proof that it is an element, that it is matter, or that it thinks or reasons or possesses intelligence in the slightest degree, any more than light or heat. Each is of the greatest importance in the animal economy, but neither is an element; neither can think; neither is mind.

We will repeat what we said on a previous occasion, that from all the facts to be gathered upon the subject, mind or intelligence is the of organization, and that there is not a particle of proof that any intelligence ever existed not the result of organization. It may be considered the highest effect that organization has produced, and it is perfect or imperfect just in proportion as the organism is perfect or imperfect. The reason why a bee or an ant has more intelligence than a snail or a lizard is because it is of a superior grade of life and has a much better apparatus for producing intelligence. The reason why a man has better intelligence than a baboon is because he has a more finely developed brain, more intricate and elaborate convolutions, a better kind of machinery for thinking and reasoning.

If in the economy of the universe it is the nature of man to hav a dual existence, another stage of life after this rudimentary state is passed, if we continue to hav intelligence, the same can only be produced by an organization capable of producing it, the same as the functions of sight, hearing, and muscular activity are produced. If we retain our individual identity after what is called death, we must retain an organization, if not as crude as our present bodies, at least equally as material and perfectly organized. Without this no reasonable conception can be formed of the continuance of mind, intelligence, and individual identity.

Mr. Chapman properly alludes to the method of the new process for converting the latent light and heat in coal into electricity for lighting buildings and streets. This is an instance of the correlation of forces, and illustrates how one force is convertible into another. What perhaps millions of years ago became the magazine or storehouse for the sun's light and heat in the coal deposits of the earth, to-day by simple machinery is converted into electricity, to be reconverted into light. It is believed that this force of converted electricity will ere many years become not only the source of the greater part of artificial light used among us, but become as well the motiv power for driving much of our machinery, propelling trains of cars, boats, etc. In a somewhat similar way, by the combustion of digestion and the assimilativ process, the human stomach, combined with the other parts of the organization, daily converts meat, bread, and potatoes into the finest thought, the most beautiful prose and poetry. The Chinese were not so far wrong when they held that the stomach is the seat of the mind. Without the stomach and appropriate food to impart nutrition to the brain and other organs of the body, no mind or intellect can exist. To repeat, without a stomach, and food to put into it, without the blood and circulating system, without the brain and nervous system, there can be no thought or mind, Mr. Chapman's great fountain of mind, element to the contrary notwithstanding.

Our friend also seems to think he has discovered a new god, which he names "Condition." We wish there were no worse gods than this lurking around in the darkened minds of men. Condition and circumstance are of course important considerations in every result and event that take place, but why either should be termed a god is difficult to understand.

We will go no further now. If Mr. Chapman is not answered, we will defer the contract till some other time.

Voltaire's Writings.

On page 20 of this issue is given a chapter from Voltaire's Commentary on the Bible, translated from the French by Miss Ellen Carroll, the first time it was ever translated into English. We hav desired to bring out a large volume of one thousand pages, octavo, of Voltaire's writings, to be one of the books composing the Truth Seeker Library This desire was intensified as we visited the room in his residence at Ferney, Switzerland, and also as we stood by the side of his tomb in the splendid Pantheon at Paris. We should proceed to carry out this plan at once did our finances admit of it. To get up such a volume costs a good sum of money, and, unfortunately, we hav it not to thus invest.

If, however, enough of our patrons will agree to take a copy of the work when produced, we will proceed to get it up and hav it ready to deliver in the spring. Such a volume of Voltaire's theological writings should be printed, and every Freethinker's library should contain a copy. His writings, in cutting sarcasm and telling satire, as well as in brilliant literary ability, hav never been equaled. It is thought that his Commentary on the Bible should form a part of the volume. It would probably make in all some four hundred pages, the additional six hundred pages being made up from his other religious writings.

We call the attention of our readers to this extract from his Commentary with a view of seeing how they are pleased with it. A quiet vein of unbelief will be found underlying all. If those who decide that they will take a copy of Voltaire's theological works will let us know, we will be enabled to know what to do in reference to bringing them out.

Our Thanks.

We wish to express our thanks to the kind patrons who hav promptly renewed for THE TRUTH SEEKER for the coming year, and to those who hav sent in the sums for which they were in arrears. It is a pleasure to work for such friends, and our gratitude goes out toward them. But all whose names are on our list do not belong to this class, but seem content to let month after month and almost year after year pass away without their discharging their indebtedness for this paper. We wish such could realize how much injustice they are doing us, and how much they are withholding the very material vitally necessary to the life and success of the paper.

We wish we were able to publish the sheet without calling upon friends for aid, and to send it to hundreds of thousands all over the land. But as this is not the case, as we are dependent upon the sums daily received from friends and patrons to meet the constant expenses, we can only request all to be as prompt as possible with us. The beginning of the year is a very proper time to square up THE TRUTH SEEKER arrearages and to pay for the year already entered upon. For the prompt we hav gratitude; for the slow we hav hope.

New Subscribers.

We are making quite an effort to add new names to our list. Those who make it their business to publish Liberal papers, which are necessarily unpopular with the masses who support the myths and fables of former ages, nearly always find that a hard, up-hill struggle is far from being as remunerativ as many enterprises are. This has been the almost uniform experience of those who hav published Freethought journals. They wish to see their papers hav a wide circulation, and the number of their patrons increase. We certainly belong to the class here indicated. We would be glad to hav THE TRUTH SEEKER reach thousands who now never see it. It would afford us great pleasure could one hundred thousand people weekly peruse its pages and become familiar with the truths which it aims to demonstrate, and learn that the old fables and superstitions which are palmed of as truth by a paid set of priests, who are directly interested in keeping up the delusion, are not what they are represented to be, and are unworthy of the confidence of sensible men and women

It should be to the interest of every liberal-minded person who has become convinced of the great fraud that has been practiced by priests upon the credulous masses that truth should take the place of error in our beautiful country, that the power of priestcraft and mental servitude should giv place to the more benign influence of reason and truth, that the mental shackles with which men and women are bound should be removed, and they be taught to be free to think and act for themselvs. This can be done in no way better than in the spread of Liberal papers and books.

We are willing to send specimen copies to honest, inquiring people in all parts of the land, with the hope that some of the seed will fall upon good ground, and spring up and bring forth fruit. But the number of TRUTH SEEKER readers and patrons can be best increased by Liberal friends throughout the land. If they will make the effort, the reading of THE TRUTH SEEKER can be much wider than it is. The paper can go into many more families, and do a great amount more of good. Let every reader undertake to make THE TRUTH SEEKER family much larger than it is.

"Is Spiritualism True?"

The New York Herald, Jan. 4th, contains the following notice of the Hull-Jamieson debate: "A discussion took place last evening in Republican Hall, 55 West 33d street, between Prof. W. F. Jamieson, of Chicago, and Moses Hull, of Boston, on the question 'Is Spiritualism True?' Prof. Jamieson took the negativ and Mr. Hull the affirmativ side, the moderators being Messrs. Charles Partridge and E. R. Goodrich. For the opening the argument was made on the proposition, 'Modern Scientific Materialism is Sustained by Nature and Reason.' Each speaker was allowed twenty minutes at a time and each made three addresses. Prof. Jamieson said that eighteen years ago, in the state of Michigan, he had a controversy with Mr. Hull, and the result was that at the close Mr. Hull announced his intention of renouncing Adventism, a form of belief which he had defended. In the debate last evening Prof. Jamieson contended that no proof could be given to show that the soul of man lived in a future world. Mr. Hull presented facts on eminent authority to show that there was a spirit world."

ORDERS for "An Infidel Abroad" are coming in freely, but we are quite willing they should come still more freely, and will endeavor to accommodate all. When a man writes a book, nothing suits him better than to hav it sell well. A journalist in one of the Eastern states, writing to a friend similarly engaged in this city, uses this language in reference to the volume:

"When Mr. Bennett's book of travels is completed I must hav a copy. I read most of his letters in the paper, and found them very interesting—never read a sketch of travels that was so easy to comprehend—followed it as closely as though it came right from his mouth. He is a very able man with his pen. I think if he advertises this book thoroughly and introduces it among the journalists there is a fortune in it. It is the best work of the kind ever introduced."

Let those who desire a copy send in their orders at once. It is a good time to strike while the iron is hot.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S ALMANAC FOR 1881.—Edited by Charles Bradlaugh and Annie Besant. MR. T. B. WAKEMAN'S manuscript for his Second Lesson was not received in time for this issue, but is in good season for our next. From the way in which the Introduction and First Lesson are received, the series will be highly appreciated. There is no question but what much systematic and scientific information will be imparted in these lessons.

WE thank the kind friends who hav sent us the names of Liberals in their respectiv localities. Doubtless many of them hav looked for the promised little presents in return. The reason they hav not been forwarded is because we hav been too much occupied to attend to it. As soon as we reach the time when we hav a little leisure this duty shall not be longer deferred.

To those who are over a year in arrears for THE TRUTH SEEKER we wish to say just a word. You cannot reasonably expect us to continue sending the paper unless it is paid for. As much as we dislike to remove names from our list who hav been there for years, we must do so if we hav nothing to encourage us to continue on. Those who refuse to pay must not think it strange if their paper ceases to make its weekly visits. We once more express the hope that such will be just enough to remit the sums they are indebted to us, that they may end off fair and square with the paper that has endeavored to serve them faithfully.

West India Correspondence.

PORT AU PRINCE, HAYTI, W. I., Dec. 18, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: Thinking a few lines from this almost unknown section of mother earth would interest you and the readers of your paper, I would ask a brief space for a few remarks.

I arrived here on the sixth day from New York. I left there on the 14th of November. You remember it was unusually cold at that date, everything having a wintry appearance. With a few days out from New York—to use a sailor phrase—running down the latitude, we find midsummer weather, where the lightest of clothing is right up to the fashion.

I hav just returned from a trip inland. The mail steamer leaves to-day for New York. The next mail is two weeks hence. So you see our means of communication with the outside world is rather limited. To a stranger dropping down here from a wintry region the situation is rather novel; in fact, the scene changes. I hav visited several towns and places during my travels. A description of one will suffice for nearly all.

This old town of Port au Prince, the capital of the free and independent republic of Hayti, has some very attractiv features about it—I mean to a stranger. In the first place, the Haytians are all colored folks with rare exceptions. The French language is nearly universally spoken here.

The manners of the people are decidedly French, that is to say, gentlemanly and courteous to each other as well as to strangers. Every man, on slight acquaintance, takes off his hat to you. I wish some genius would invent a self-tipping hat. I would invest in one immediately.

The streets are filthy, with surface drainage. The pig is the natural scavenger, consequently a privileged character. The donkey monopolizes the principal carrying trade. I hav seen one of those patient animals carrying two large, well-filled hampers, one on each side, and a large, lazy wench sitting on top, balancing a gourd or calabash, about the size of a large pumpkin, filled with tiaffa, a vile mixture made from the nativ sugarcane, upon her head, a couple of strings of chickens tied by the legs, head downward, apparently with little or no inconvenience. Not a light of glass to be seen anywhere except in the cathedral or churches. The windows are all doors, that is about as near as I can express it. They are invariably open except to keep out the sun. The houses are on the arcade principle, a portion of the house projecting over the sidewalks. Every house or store, as you pass, has a half dozen or more women sitting around the open door, varying in shades of color from the nearly white to the jet black. Then, with the ruins, together with earthquakes, revolutions, bombardments, and fires, Hayti is all broke up—a relic of former greatness or French luxury during slavery times. From the balcony of my hotel, back of the town proper, a panorama is spread out before you, the finest that ever came under my observation. A strange looking town with a beautiful bay before, verdure-clad mountains on either hand, a beautiful valley spreading away in the distance, teeming with a luxuriant tropical vegetation, with here and there a beautiful residence. I would say, and I think I can demonstrate it without the possibility of a doubt, that the island of St. Domingo, as far as climate and other natural features are concerned, stands far above any other country or clime as an abiding place for man, black or white. But I am forcibly reminded of the old missionary hymn:

"Though every prospect pleases,
Yet only man is vile."

Here you find the black man in his natural element, climate, and conditions suited to his natural wants, no one to interfere with his social, political, or religious opinions, be they what they may; yet as he stands to-day he is practically a failure. Politically, to maintain this republic, the streets are paraded with armed men. Religiously, he is the dupe of designing priests. The church of Rome is the dominant religion, which accounts for this characteristic opposition to modern improvements. There is not a plow or agricultural implement on the island to my knowledge, and I made diligent inquiry. Not a steam engin, but plenty of priests. No schools worthy the name.

I will write you again when my time is not so limited.

Thought and Mind.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Once more, and for the last time, I desire to call attention to this profound and deeply interesting subject.

Man is and always has been an unsolved mystery. The church has always persecuted those who discuss these questions from a philosophical standpoint, and it is not surprising that those who hav outgrown all the dogmas, creeds, and lies of superstition should seek the solution of the problems what is thought, mind, and life? what is man? whence did he come? and what is his destiny? by rules that harmonize with nature and reason. It is not only our right but our duty to fathom all mysteries and solve all problems. Away with the perverting, paralyzing principle of faith! Giv us reason, godlike reason, and God himself, if there is a God, must flee away to the regions of impenetrable darkness, or we should find him. If there is a God, let us hav some proof of it. As friend Babcock says, "even a leg" dangling from the clouds would be accepted as evidence. Let us find something in the universe that cannot be accounted for by natural law, and then we hav found a clue to God, and not before. If there is a spirit in man that thinks, reasons, remembers, imagins, and wills in conjunction with these physical organisms, we should find some proof of it. I hav sought for this proof, and believe I hav found it. I may not be able to make others see as I do, nevertheless to my mind the evidence is clear and convincing.

Heretofore I hav spoken of thought as being simply a manifestation of the mind, just as walking is a manifestation of the body, or as waves result from casting a pebble into water. When I say, "My thoughts," I do not mean my mind, for that is what thinks; nor do I mean elements when I say properties.

In your criticism you somehow fail to giv me credit for having made this distinction. You say, "He seems to regard thought, or mind, as a primary element." Again, "If thought, or mind, or life-force, or spirit matter, is an element," etc. Now, to my mind, it is absurd to say thought, or mind, for they are not synonymous terms. The mind is that which thinks, and thought, the result, cannot be identical with the producing cause. Thinking is the exercise of the mind, and by thinking the mind grows stronger, just as the physical organism does with strong manual labor.

It is not the brain that thinks, wills, imagins, or remembers—it is the mind; and mind is able to produce these results just in proportion to the facilities at its command.

Without the organ of time the mind cannot produce music. As well expect a man to chop wood without an ax. The mind itself may be able to appreciate the most beautiful music, but not having the machinery to produce it, it is impotent. I hav known many who appreciate to the fullest extent the most rapturous music, but by voice or by instrument could never produce aught but discord.

You say, "It is the organism that makes the mind." I think the above, with many other parallel and equally as startling facts which I might present, disprove absolutely this extraordinary assumption. You speak of the brain as doing the thinking, just as the eye does the seeing and the ear the hearing, etc. It is a well-known fact that the eye does not see, nor does the ear hear. The I within sees with the eyes, hears with the ears, and thinks with the brain. The eyes and ears, with attendant nerves, are simply aids or instruments to the mind. If the optic and audic nerves are simply aids or instruments, then the brain, the great central nerve, the matter of which is identical with that of all the lesser nerves, must also be an instrument of the mind. And I believe it is as absurd to say that the brain, which is nothing but nerve matter, creates the mind as to declare that the piano or the house creates the man. There is no escaping the conclusion that there is an element acting in conjunction with the brain which is superior in its attributes, which receives and digests messages received through sensation, which being made up of imponderable or spirit substance, must hav and use a physical organism if it would see, hear, handle, and learn of physical things. We say that "the brain is the organ of the mind." Is this utterly without meaning? If there is no such element as mind, why, then, do you speak of it as such? If you mean that your brain thinks, then would it not be far more consistent to say, "My brain thinks, not my mind?" Why do you, who so consistently advocate a reform in spelling, continue to use confessedly meaningless terms? You say if mind is anything at all it must be the result of organization and a product of the brain. How is it, then, that mind, the most complex and stable element of man, remains ever the same, or is constantly accumulativ, while the brain atoms or elements are the most unstable of the body? When we lie down to sleep, what is it that sleeps? Is it the mind or the body? If the body sleeps, ought not respiration, digestion, circulation, and assimilation to cease? Not a function of the physical organism is suspended. All but the mind organs are as activ as ever. If sleep is an attribute or condition of the physical organism, then the body should be in a cataleptic condition, for that, and that only, is the only sleep the body ever experiences. Thousands, then, pass through a long lifetime without the physical organism having one moment's sleep. When the body is in a cataleptic sleep the mind is always awake and activ, as the wonderful visions and experiences which are afterward related always and abundantly prove. The mind being the superior and more powerful element would very quickly consume and wear out these frail organisms did it not cease periodically to exercise its functions.

Catalepsy, or trance, then, is sleep of the body, while ordinary sleep is of the mind or spirit. Science must certainly stand by me in this assertion. Is the brain the ultimate, or is there something beyond or behind that receives, reads, and digests the messages that come in from the outer world? If it is the brain, then the mind is a myth. If there is a mind to which impressions must ultimately come, then the mind, if produced by the brain, is superior to, and possesses attributes and power totally unlike, in every respect, the producing cause. We are, then, absolutely compelled to conclude that the mind is really the entity or individual acting in harmony with, as far as possible, and using, the physical organism for the accomplishment of a certain purpose.

In former articles I hav shown how mind manifests itself by thought undulations, and that absolutely no substance is ever transmitted by undulations; therefore thought cannot be "essence matter" or substance in any sense. Without dwelling on this point, I will try now to show how mind originates, or where mind elements come from, and then shall leave the subject for the present.

In your criticism, Mr. Bennett, you demand, if there is a spirit or mind element, that we gather and exhibit it, as we do oxygen, hydrogen, etc. Now, at the risk of being ridiculed, I will say I believe this has already been done in two different ways—the one by a natural and the other by an artificial process. You and I, and every other human being, hav been gathering and exhibiting this mysterious and subtle element from our earliest infancy. Those who hav secured the choicest lot, and hav the best organism, through which only can it manifest its presence to a physical world, are indeed the favored ones of earth. Mind elements manifest themselvs or can be exhibited exactly as magnetism, heat, electricity, and all other imponderable elements do—by the phenomena which are the result of their activity or motion.

When the Leyden jar or magnet was invented, a means was furnished by which life or mind elements could be gathered and exhibited. I am fully satisfied that magnetism, or the magnetic fluid, is identical with the nerve fluid of the human organism. This will explain disease and healing by "laying on of hands." When a certain organ or part of the body has lost its power to attract the needed elements, or when some stronger part robs the weaker, the magnetic fluids become unequally distributed; it is then that the healing hands, as magnets, restore the equilibrium.

Again, when the system has become debilitated, and there is a lack of the vital fluids, the presence of a strong, healthy, and magnetic person is of the greatest possible benefit. An equilibrium is instantly established between the two persons, and the sick immediately become strong and well. The healer being a natural magnet at once draws from space the elements he has given away, and the equilibrium is again restored. In other words, I regard every human being on this earth as a magnet or Leyden jar. The magnet and Leyden jar I consider the artificial process above alluded to. In these, magnetism and electricity can be stored away and exhibited just as we exhibit mind, by their phenomena.

You ask me to weigh spirit or mind element when it has been found and gathered. I shall ask you to say truly if you know anything whatever of electricity, magnetism, or heat, except by its manifestations. Now that you hav discovered these fluids by their manifestations, I shall ask you to weigh them. Take the horse-shoe and Leyden jar and weigh them both before and after they become charged. Do you find any difference? There is absolutely no difference. Very well; then there are elements so "impalpable" that they hav no weight, and so mysterious as to defy all search and analysis except by their peculiar manifestations. It is to be hoped that those who ring so many changes on the term "spiritual manifestations" will bring their mighty intellects to bear upon electrical, etc., manifestations, and perhaps they may discover something else besides spiritual manifestations that is "exceedingly thin."

Where do electricity and magnetism come from? Answer this question, and I will tell you where mind elements come from.

Are electricity and magnetism latent, and concentrated in unlimited quantities in certain rubbish, or is all space filled with them, ready to obey the commands of certain conditions? Were I to giv a word that should embody all the significance and all the attributes of the gods, I should name condition.

This universe, and all that is in it, is ruled by the god Condition. Nay, the very destiny of the race, as well as of the universe, hangs on that one word condition. It is the mighty lever by which all things move. Without conditions there could be no progression.

Certainly you will not, dare not, assert that electricity, etc., originate in glass, rubber, zinc, or any other substance used as a generator of these elements. Friction and combustion are conditions which are necessary to generate or concentrate them. All the engin does that is used in connection with the electric light is to make the condition that gathers or concentrates the fluid from space. Condition is the god that compels obedience. If these elements were not found everywhere in greater or less quantities, then we might with some reason conclude that they exist in a latent condition in amber, rubber, glass, zinc, etc., etc., but every cloud that passes is more or less charged with them. Often the magnetic currents are visible in the northern heavens, streaming up to the zenith and beyond. Every leaf, blade of grass, and frost crystal is an electric point that gathers or dispenses the accumulating elements of electricity and magnetism. The frostwork on our window panes, which assumes so many fantastic shapes and forms, is arranged by the magnetic currents which play over the surface of the glass, set in motion by the conditions condensation and crystallization. By certain processes, or conditions, these wonderful elements can be gathered and stored away in the magnet and Leyden jar. I do not assert positivly, but I believe magnetism is identical with mind and the nerve fluids.

All known elements, or nearly so, can be crystallized. Who knows but magnetism, electricity, and other kindred elements, are gathered from space by combustion within the human organism, and there crystallized into mind or spirit organisms. Every thought the mind produces crystallizes more or less of the atoms of these subtle fluids, and the fact or experience becomes the law of crystallization. Thinking, then, is the crystallizing process by which the mind is built up and becomes stronger and stronger.

Again, I say, I believe it is a fact that the magnetic fluid is identical with the nerve fluids of the body, and that life and all its processes are dependent upon the presence of these subtle and imponderable fluids. All our lives, from earliest infancy, are we gathering and storing away this mysterious substance or magnetic element until death, when "in the twinkling of an eye" the body is discharged, and nothing but cold, lifeless, unmagnetic clay remains. This wonderful power to think, reason, will, imagin, and remember, with all the magnetism that filled the body, has left instantaneously. How like the Leyden jar! The human organism seems to be an exact parallel with the Leyden jar; perhaps I should say is identical. Both can be gradually loaded or charged with the same element, and both discharged instantaneously. The only difference is the capacity of the one is limited, the other unlimited. In the one there must be a crystallizing process, while in the other it is wanting. I am compelled, then, to conclude that mind elements exist as separate, independent, and primary elements in and throughout space, and that without the inflow of these elements the mind could never be organized or hav an existence in any sense.

I will further say, in conclusion, that if a place could be found where these mind or magnetic elements do not exist, then that place is exactly adapted to the accursed machinery of Christian superstition, for then men would of necessity be "like dumb, driven cattle," void of all reason or power to think. In those barren, blank, and desolate regions, faith, beautiful faith, would flourish as "a green bay tree," and priests, like human swine, could grow fat and lazy, with never an Infidel or Spiritualist to trouble or disturb. Such would indeed be a fit place for the Christian's heaven. There the saints would be so idiotic that no ray of intelligence or trace of memory would reveal to them the awful sufferings of loved ones in hell. Perhaps I am wicked, but I am so happy with my Infidel reason, which, with no eye of faith, tells me I shall never hav to spend a thousand million billion trillion quintillion, etc., etc., etc., ages in such an idiotic heaven that I now and then love to indulge in a few moments of thought and self-gratulation. I hav had a narrow escape. Once I was a close-communion Baptist. Once I had on that straight and narrow jacket, and if I hav not a right to be happy over my narrow escape from the Baptist's close-communion, idiotic heaven, then there is no magnetism, electricity, or fire in hell, or religion in the reason and honor of Thomas Paine, Benjamin Franklin, or Thomas Jefferson.

Friend Bennett, this seems to be a good place to close this discussion. I begin to realize that I am getting out into water so deep that I cannot touch bottom, and I will agree to keep still if you will. However, should you, with your more experienced pen, and far-seeing, analytical, and Materialistic mind, again with your criticisms upset my crazy Spiritualistic notions, and prove me a "deluded fellow" who thinks he "has a mind as is a mind," why, I may resurrect myself from my shell of oblivion into which I now crawl and try again.

Yours for more light, E. A. Chapman.

Extracts from Rev. Dr. J. A. Thayer's Thanksgiving Sermon.

CRITICISED BY A. ALLEN NOE.

It is not a very thankful task to criticise a popular minister of one's own town, but we proceed in defense of truth rather than let error go unrebuked. It is sad enough for a minister to either ignorantly or wilfully mislead his congregation, but when error receives applause it but proves the old adage, that "truth travels slowly, while error flies on rapid wings."

In speaking of the progress of our country, the reverend gentleman said: "In contemplating our future, I see but two clouds upon our horizon. The first is a tendency to drift away from the rigid piety of our fathers into a Godless Materialism, a Christless Rationalism, or a lifeless sentimentalism. It ought to be known to all that the basis of all morality and of all civilization is man's feeling of responsibility to God. The fair ship Zion is being scuttled by its godless enemies." It is passing strange that the omnipotent Jehovah of the Bible, with about seventy thousand vicegerents to help him, will permit the ship of Zion to become scuttled and thereby rendered unseaworthy, and they all on board, with God at the helm, his son Jesus, and his other part (the Holy Ghost) on board and watching and laboring for the ship's welfare, and there, too, is their elder brother, the devil, who is always at his post frightening weak-minded people, getting them about ready to jump on board, so that by a few tragic stories, some praying, psalm singing, and weeping by the army of vicegerents, they get aboard the ship. What a gallant crew! What a brave set of fellows! The boss at the helm, good fellows in the pilot house, his "satanic majesty" in the hold attending to the fire, keeping up steam, the ship well manned, and yet they allow a few Godless, Christless unbelievers to get on board and scuttle the ship of Zion. What, reverend sir, is the matter with your old ship? Jesus died to save your crew, did he not? Is not your ship sailing on the blood of Christ? Your vicegerents were called by God himself, and yet you who hav it in charge let it get scuttled. Your ship must be made of poor timber. Christ's blood is getting low, and the good ship of Zion has run foul a snag, while her officers were eating yellow-legged chickens. Again your ship of Zion floats no scientists, no philosophers, no first-class thinkers.

The reverend gentleman sees a cloud on our horizon, and he is frightened. We guess rather he sees the car of progress. He hears the thundering of the car of science. The ship of Zion started a long time ahead of the scientific car, yet the latter has overtaken the former, run into her, and scuttled her. She will make no progress till they run her into hell for repairs. Those clouds, sir, will increase. Your ship of Zion will receive a more severe scuttling in the future. The scientific car of progress will roll on and on, gathering up the passengers as they drift away from the rigid piety of our Puritan fathers. That car has on board the scientists, the philosophers, the thinkers, the humanitarians, the reformers, and this jolly crew will roll into the New Jerusalem while that old bigoted, superstitious, bloody, scuttled craft is below being washed and repaired. Good-bye, ship of Zion, you deserve your fate.

The reverend gentleman further said, "Every upward step in the advance of government has been made possible, and has been inspired by the pioneering of the church of Jesus Christ." What an absurd statement! He could not hav strayed farther from the truth. The Declaration of Independence was an advance step. Who deserves the honor? Let the facts answer. Our forefathers petitioned Parliament for a redress of their grievances, but the thought of independence never occurred to them until after Thomas Paine advanced the idea in his famous book called "Common Sense." He it was who fired the American mind for liberty. He may well be called the father of the Declaration of Independence. After the struggle began Paine was the first to pay money out of his own funds to carry on the war. During the darkest days of the Revolution he was in camp inspiring the soldiers with his presence and words of cheer. When the army was unpaid, but half fed and clothed, and about to arise in mutiny, Paine wrote the book called "The Crisis," in which he said, "These are the times that try men's souls." That book was circulated through the army, and it rekindled the flame of liberty, and, said Washington, did more to gain our independence than a dozen victories. He named our country the "United States of America." He rocked this country in its cradle. We are more indebted to Paine for what liberty we enjoy than to any other man. Will the reverend gentleman dare say he was inspired by the church of Jesus Christ? We say without fear of successful contradiction that those who took the lead in the American Revolution were Infidel to the Christian religion. Were they inspired by the church of Christ? Thomas Jefferson, who is called the father of Democracy, was an Infidel. He refused to issue Thanksgiving proclamations. Was he inspired by the church of Christ?

Let us drift on down to the next great advanced movement, the abolition of slavery. Was this advance step due to the church? Let the facts answer. The prominent leaders in the anti-slavery movement were Gerritt Smith, Wm. Lloyd Garrison, Abby Kelley, Abner Kneeland, Frances Wright, Wendell Phillips, Lucretia Mott, Benjamin F. Wade, Joshua R. Giddings, Parker Pillsbury, Milton Sutliff (of our own town), and Robert Dale Owen. Not one of these was a Christian. Every one of them was an Infidel, except Lucretia Mott, who was a Hixite Quakeress, hence a Liberal. Reverend sir, were they inspired by the church of Christ? The first article that appeared in opposition to slavery was from the pen of Thomas Paine. Jefferson said, "Nothing is more certainly written in the book of fate than that these people shall be free." Were they inspired by the church of Christ? While these noble souls were laboring to free the slave the ministers who were inspired by the church of Jesus were opposing them by quoting scripture to prove that slavery was a divine institution. Garrison applied for a church in Boston to plead for the slave but was denied one for that purpose. It was then that Kneeland, the Infidel editor of the Boston Investigator, opened his doors for the Infidel to plead for freedom. Not a church in Warren forty years ago could be had for an antislavery meeting. If the counsels of the church had been adhered to, the galling chains of slavery could yet be heard on every plantation of the sunny south. You, reverend sirs, who were inspired by the church of Christ were but pious stumbling-blocks in the way of freedom and reform. Not one ex-slave can point to a church and say, "To the teachings within thy walls do I owe my freedom." Abraham Lincoln was an Infidel. He gave liberty to four millions of bondmen, with one stroke of the pen, as it were. Was he inspired by the church of Christ? Not until after the anti-slavery movement became strong and popular did the church come to the rescue. It is to those anti-christian, Infidel reformers, lovers of liberty, justice, and equality, that the colored people owe their freedom, and you, reverend sirs, know it, yet you hav the brazen effrontery to stand in the pulpit and say every advance movement in government is due to the church. The reverse is true, and a minister who don't know it is not fit to teach a Hottentot. When, in the name of all that is high and holy, will these hypocritical priests become sufficiently just to render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's? When will they giv credit to whom credit is due, and quit maligning those noble, Christless unbelievers to whom we owe our civil and religious liberty, and to whom the slave owes his freedom? The reverend gentleman capped the climax in the following. Hear him: "The ship of state can only sail the seas of life in the wake of the ship of Zion."

Here he struck the key-note. He not only favors a union of church and state, but would put the church ahead and would hav the state follow in its wake. He would hav an established religion to prevent people from drifting away from the rigid faith of the Puritans into Godless Materialism and Christless unbelief. That Christless cloud on our horizon troubles the church, and it has been laboring both secretly and openly to unite church and state by trying to get an amendment to the Constitution to recognize the Christian God. This amendment came near passing the Senate a few years ago.

The church is determined to effect a union of church and state. The masses of the Liberals will say no danger. Fellow Liberals, our indifference is the danger. Remember, eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. Let us not be caught napping. That cloud worries the priesthood. They are determined to bring that Christless crew which has scuttled their ship of Zion back to the rigid faith of the Puritan fathers—that rigid faith which caused those who were inspired by the church of Christ to banish Roger Williams, hunt down Quakers and bore their tongues—that rigid faith which made it a crime to lodge a Quaker, which hung Mary Dyer on Boston Common. Such would be the fate of the Christless unbelievers if those who are inspired by the church of Christ get the power.

The reverend gentleman claims the basis of all morality and civilization is man's feeling of responsibility to God. Another statement the facts will not warrant. What do the red men of the forest know about responsibility to God, yet they are more moral than people of civilized Christian nations. Indians of the same tribe won't steal from each other nor slander and deceive each other as Christians will. They will steal from each other, slander, backbite, and sue each other. What a saintly crew sailing on the scuttled ship of Zion. Reverend sir, the Indians are more moral than we here in enlightened America. What immorality they do possess was taught them by those who were inspired by the church of Christ. They were found to be very clever and friendly by the humane Wm. Penn, who belonged to the Quaker sect, who were tortured by the rigid Puritans. There are tribes in Africa whose ideas and practices of morals and justice is far above any Christian nation.

Fearing, bowing, scraping to God, is the basis of all that is good and grand, is it, reverend sir? How is it in those Christian nations where those inspired by the church of Christ hav full sway? Take Spain, Portugal, Ireland, and Italy; wonderful! prodigious! What morality, intelligence, and civilization! Christianity has done heaps for them there. There we see the demonstrated effects of the ship Zion taking the lead and the state following in its wake. While France is the most Infidel nation on the globe, it is also the most prosperous. These are great big facts, yet this reverend gentleman fells his hearers Christianity is the basis of morality and civilization. Jefferson certainly did not feel a very great responsibility to God, else he would not hav refused to issue thanksgiving proclamations. We hav about done with the reverend gentleman, and will conclude by saying that the extracts of his sermon which we hav quoted are false throughout, and we challenge him to substantiate them by facts. We challenge him to a denial of our statements in reply. The reverend gentleman is guilty of either wilfully or ignorantly misleading his hearers. The old ship Zion sails down to the present day bearing with her a banner which has ever opposed human progress, liberty, reform, and civilization. She tried to stifle the Copernican idea that the earth is round, and burnt Bruno at the stake, one of the earliest advocates of that idea. She invented the guillotine, the block, the rack, the thumbscrew, and other methods of torture. She lit the fires of Smithfield. She flowed the blood of millions of innocent victims she has put to death for opinion's sake. She has hunted down and put to death innocent victims of Columbia's land. She has imprisoned some of the noblest heroes for liberty of our day. She has opposed most all inventions, saying the inventors were possessed of the devil. She stands to-day upon the blood of Christ and is crimsoned over with the blood of the world's noblest heroes. While the Infidel Paine was laboring to plant the tree of liberty on American soil, the founder of the Methodist church, John Wesley, was laboring in England to girdle it. While Infidels were trying to burst the galling chains which bound Ethiopia's sons and daughters, the ship Zion was trying to prove by the Bible that those chains were forged by Jehovah.

Now, while Liberals are trying to separate church and state, as the fathers intended it should be, the priesthood is trying to hav them clasp hands or to hav the ship Zion sail in front. We hav no objection to ministers teaching the beautiful truths spoken by Christ upon the Mount, but they hav no right to sow the seeds of error. They hav no right to claim, as this reverend gentleman did on Thanksgiving day, that all progress, morality, and advancement are due to the church, for it is untrue. They hav no right to sour the minds of the young against unbelievers by making it appear that they are barbarians and opposed to civilization and reform. They hav no right to claim for the church the merit that is due to Christless unbelievers, and to do it is dastardly mean and hypocritical. The reverend gentleman claims that the ship Zion is being scuttled by its godless enemies. It is to those Christless enemies that we mostly owe what we are. Deny it, reverend sir, if you dare! The ship Zion deserves to be scuttled and hung upon the beach with its blood-stained banner as a relic of barbarism and cruelty for millions yet unborn to gaze upon. The reverend gentleman whines about the ship Zion being scuttled, and would fain unite church and state so as to compel the Christless unbelievers to help repair and float it upon the sea of oppression. The union of church and state is antagonistic to the principles of the fathers, unwarranted by the Constitution, and dangerous to our liberties. Any person of intelligence who will utter the sentiment in public or private should be branded as a tyrant, a traitor to his country, an enemy to civil and religious liberty, and a foe to humanity.

Warren, O., Dec. 8, 1880.

ALL religions hav something in common; all hav something divine. The time has gone by when Christianity, in view of its confessors, could claim a monopoly of saving truth. Recent study of the ethnic religions has abated the contemptuous aversion with which Christian orthodoxy was wont to regard them, waving them aside as damnable impostures or execrable superstitions, and their receivers as without the pale of salvation. This was the view with which Christian missionaries in former times engaged in the noble enterprise of rescuing those lost peoples from their imminent doom by drawing them into the Christian fold. They knew nothing, or next to nothing, of the religions they wished to supplant; but simply assumed that not being Christian, they must be utterly and only bad, and that all that held them must perish everlastingly.—F. H. Hedge.

I THINK "John's Way" a good book. J. EVANS.

MRS. SLENKER'S "John's Way" is just the book we want. It is entertaining, interesting, and instructiv, and then the price is only fifteen cents. This comes within the reach of all. J. HAZELTINE.

Letters from Friends.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I wish to congratulate you on your safe return, upon the happy and proper discharge of the eventful duty, the courteous and kind reception, and the honor received as well as bestowed, hoping that it may in part return some equivalent for your sacrifices and sufferings in defending the rights of American citizens and universal mental freedom, and giv recuperation and strength. Would that God or nature would rejuvenate you some thirty years, to renew and continue the battle for the glorious cause—the full freedom and happiness of man.

I should be pleased to learn, through your paper, how much the contributions for your late journey fell short of the expenditures for the same. I feel confident or hope that every true and generous-hearted Liberal will respond in sums of less or more, as large amounts are made up of small ones. That will at once wipe out the deficit.

I will say in reference to the suggestion of a correspondent of contributing five dollars to pay your expenses around the world, it would giv me pleasure to respond to his suggestion, and will double the amount if he will join in giving five dollars to cancel a debt that was created for the Liberal cause, namely, the expenses to the Belgium Congress of the Liberals of the world, of D. M. Bennett, or balance unpaid.

Mr. Wakeman's great argument at Chicago never was touched by any one, or an attempt to answer, and stands as a tower of truth and logic, in answer to the wail of suffering which came up from the unjust imprisonment of a Bennett, Lant, Hayward, and scores of others, and their families made destitute, with the fresh arrest of Barter under these iniquitous and cursed laws. And the bolters dared not say repeal.

My kind regards to Mrs. Bennett and Eugene.

Truly and fraternally yours, D. R. BURT.

[In reply to our venerable friend's inquiry we hav to state that $220 was contributed by friends to defray the expenses to the Brussels Congress. This sum was divided equally with Mr. Rawson, but was not half enough. Our own expenses amounted to $400, but $150 of this amount was used in seeing parts of Europe not necessary to an attendance upon the Brussels Congress.—ED. T. S.]

FRIEND BENNETT: Put me down for five dollars to make a circumnavigator of you, as doubtless your enemies will, in the future world—if there is one—make a salamander of you. We want a man to tell us just what he saw as plainly as if we beheld the scenes with our own eyes. Your plain, matter-of-fact English is just what is needed to do that.

Your TRUTH SEEKER in its new dress is a delight to the eye.

In your "New Year's Greeting" you say, "According to the predictions of Mother Shipton and many other prophets, astrologers, soothsayers, divines, etc., 1881 is to be a year of dire calamities, including the baneful influence of planets, famin, pestilence, war, bloodshed," etc.

You discredit the whole of it. So do I, in the sense that this much-abused infant-year (not three days old yet) will be much different from other years. I think the lad is promising. In fact, it is always perfectly safe to prophesy squarely against all famous prophecies. So here goes against Mother Shipton and all her brood. 1881 is to be the brightest, best, beautifulest year that the sun ever shone upon. There is to be more joy, more peace, more health, than any one year ever brought the race. Postal savings banks will be established. Fractional currency will be adopted, so that editors can more readily obtain their dues. Delinquent subscribers will pay up better this year than any previous one, whereat every editor will wear a benignant look, like the full moon in the almanac. The planets will not get drunk. D. M. Bennett will go around the world; will write a book about the trip which will be a thing of beauty for ages.

I expect all these things to be fulfilled against the whole host of gabbling grumblers that are always feeling as sorrowful as the old maid who was weeping bitterly because supposing she should get married and hav a baby and the baby should fall down three flights of stairs and break its little wapsy totsy neck, boo! hoo! hoo!

If my prophecies are not fulfilled I will agree to take refuge in the Bible (which is worse than a year in Albany Penitentiary), Ezekiel xiv, 9: "If the prophets be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I, the Lord, hav deceived that prophet." Amen.

W. F. JAMIESON.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I hav read your letters from Europe with great interest, and, I confess, with advantage to my stock of knowledge of certain things and places. As I saw in a recent TRUTH SEEKER the suggestion by some friend that you should travel in China and other Asiatic countries, I hasten to show my approval of it, and pledge five dollars toward the traveling fund. Without aiming at flattery I will say what scores of Liberals and others hav said about your letters: They are interesting and instructiv, because they are written by one of the people for the people. Therefore, dear sir, agitate the Chinese trip, and those who will contribute toward the expenses will be amply repaid when perusing the letters which you will write upon various subjects from ancient countries.

Yours for progress, LOUIS LANGE.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Long may you and THE TRUTH SEEKER wave. Through its columns I eagerly followed you in your travels in Europe, losing not a step that you reported, and my pleasure was second only to yours, and my knowledge of the old countries better than ever before.

Respectfully, JAMES T. FARRIS.

FRIEND BENNETT: We hail thee once again, our standard-bearer! Welcome back to thy nativ shore. Knowing the many greetings with which you would be submerged, I delayed lest mine might prove the "fatal straw." Your letters from Europe are interesting, and your detestation of orthodoxy will crop out. Shall be glad when humanity and Christianity shall hav so evoluted that rasping retorts will no longer be a necessity. Every pioneer must "blaze" the way, travel rough ways. Our consolation is in the consciousness that the way once established the oncoming future may travel in luxurious carriages.

Yours truly, GRACE L. PARKHURST.

MR. EDITOR: If D. M. Bennett had not gone to Europe we should not fully know his wonderful ability to observe, remember, record, and describe what he sees and experiences. Thousands hav passed over the same ground that he did, but no one I ever read has recorded so much or described it as well. That he could see and tell so much in so short a time is more surprising than his writing so much in prison. Were he not so much needed at home he could benefit the world vastly by traveling all the time, for he travels with open eyes, a loose tongue, a receptiv disposition, and a retentiv and superior descriptiv mind. Do not fail, you who are able, to buy the book.

Liberals, I earnestly entreat you not to disparage each other's opinions, views, and labors, although they may differ from yours, and you may not personally entertain them.

Nature has a great variety of work to do, and a great variety of human organisms through which to do it. In nature's great workshop there is a division of labor, but to the eye of the true philosopher and philanthropist each is at work for all, and all for each. Especially is this true of truth seekers and reformers. Many who, like myself, hav battled for many years against old orthodoxy think that there is urgent need of reforms in the practical lives, relations, and habits of all classes of society without any reference to religious or political opinions. If any man or woman feels it to be his or her duty to write or talk about parentage, or the social or sexual relations, or dress reform, or any other unpopular but important subject, every true Liberal should hail them as co-workers for the common good, and not, as is often the case, treat them with neglect or contempt. This idea, that any truth, any organ, function, or relation of the human body, is not fit or decent to be talked about in public in a proper manner, comes only from those who care but little for humanity, and who "prefer a destroying ignorance to a saving knowledge." Not long since, when I was lecturing on temperance, a woman went out because I mentioned the effects of tight lacing upon the unborn. I could easily forgiv her, for she is an ignorant orthodox, but I know of some pretended Liberals who are about as illiberal and modest as she. It ill becomes truth seekers to be afraid of or shrink from the truth upon any subject, or to treat its advocates as unworthy of recognition. Thirty-five and forty years ago I was insulted, egged, stoned, and my person in danger, for speaking of truth that is now popular. I say, then, Welcome to all those brave, humanitarian souls who can "go it alone," when they are inspired by a love of truth and humanity. Ingersoll does not need the praise, sympathy, and support of Liberals, but Mary E. Tillotson and many other moral heroes do. As for me, I gladly accept all reformers and all reforms that shall tend to produce a better humanity, and therefore a better and happier life on earth. Oh, my fellow Liberals, let us try to appreciate each other's work on the great temple of humanity. J. H. COOK.

D. M. BENNETT: I was glad when I learned of your safe return from Europe, and read with pleasure the report you gave of the wonderments you saw when there. It is curious to see to what extent some people will go in luxury and idleness when the funds can be filched from the pockets of the producing classes. Superstition and ignorance work wonders when combined. Do you really suppose that these blanketed gentry really believed the stuff they were dealing out to their hearers? It looks curious to me, but the humans are queer creatures. We are not much above the monkeys, and in many respects below them. Just think of the millions of treasure expended every year in making engins of war for slaughtering each other in civilized and enlightened Christian countries, so called.

I like your paper. I admire your independent spirit. I say let every one do and say as he likes, so long as he does not infringe on the privileges of others. Does Comstock ever interfere with letters coming to you? I think he is low enough for that, though perhaps I am mistaken.

Yours for truth and freedom, JOSEPH BARNES.

MR. EDITOR: Your favor received. Yes, we are getting along finely in our colonial enterprise. Several new houses are going up now in Liberal, and everything seems to be on the boom. I will make you a present of a desirable lot if you will accept it. I send herewith my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. G. H. WALSER.

[Many thanks to Bro. Walser. We will accept with gratitude the kind offer he makes of the present of a lot in his new town, and possibly when we lay off the harness of journalism we may go out there and spend the remainder of our days.—ED. T. S.]

MISHTER BENNETT: I dinks now dot I wrides you leedle letters und sends der monish vor your baper. I reads him yet, und likes him, but sum dings I likes not very mootch.

I used reads der Index, dree, vore, vife yare, und der Mishter Abbot gits, och, mine Gott, how fery pig, dot py shimmeny he dinks he vos efrypodys. So he shwells und shwells dot he shplits him oben und shpills him all oud, und now he brints no more babers.

Now, Mishter Bennett, der beebles all say py der Gongress vere you vas dot you pig man too, und now I say you shust look you high oud dot you getch not dot shwell, und shplit zickness und der bucket gicks you ofer doo.

I wrides blenty now, und I shust sends mit der letters dree dollar monish vor your baber one yare more. Yours fery faidfully, J. GUIWITS.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I hav read your letters from Europe with much interest and pleasure, and liked the way you had of taking the sanctity out of saints and cathedrals, while you giv due credit to all who deserve to be called true saints. You are one who can write equally well in sunshine or shadow, scoring to the line all the same. It seems to me your pen must go by steam or some occult power, as it never tires; you drive one of more force than St. Peter's, if not so large, and you should be styled St. Bennett. LUNA HUTCHINSON.

Bro. BENNETT: Inclosed please find money order for three dollars, which will pay subscription up to September 1, 1881. I like it yet. I am glad you are home again and will publish all your letters from Europe. Though pretty well informed with regard to European matters, through reading, I find many things in your letters I did not know before and probably never would hav known had it not been for you. Your friend, W. H. GALE.

FRIEND BENNETT: In response to your appeal for aid I herewith inclose two dollars, which pays my subscription to April 1st. I hav been engaged in journalism and hav a large amount of money due me on subscriptions, and readily realize that if each one would promptly remit the amount due you would soon be relieved from embarrassment.

Friends of Freethought and free speech cannot afford to let THE TRUTH SEEKER beg for bread, and to neglect to sustain you who were made our representativ in the Albany Penitentiary would be as unjust as Christians hav always been to Thomas Paine. I am not in a financial condition to offer aid without imposing a hardship on myself and those dependent upon me, yet I will be one of the number to loan or donate five dollars to assist you if necessary, and if necessary let me know. Yours for mental liberty,

E. S. MCCOMAS.

D. M. BENNETT: Dear Sir: I was once a devotee of the church, but hav, I trust, broken the bonds forever. Through the advice of Mrs. Slenker I commenced a few months ago to take your paper. I hav sent you a few names as trial subscribers, and to-day send you fifty cents for another trial subscriber for three months.

I also feel that THE TRUTH SEEKER is really a necessity in my house, and I don't see how a Liberal family can do without it.

To-day I send you a draft for five dollars, which please apply as directed.

Wishing you a happy and prosperous New Year, I remain your true friend, well-wisher, and brother,

J. W. A.

D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed please find money order for three dollars to continue my subscription to your paper. I am a little behind time, but was obliged to wait until now for money that was due me.

I would like to buy some of your books, but cannot now. Times are hard and money scarce, and I fear they will be much harder, now that the Republican party has a new lease for running the government four years longer.

How long will the American people be content to be bought and sold like cattle by this party, and that instead of using their reason and standing up like men for principle and right? I believe in the Greenback-Labor party, and hav since it first started in 1876; and when before election I heard men say, "I believe in the Greenback principle, and I think the partr will sometime be in power, and that it is the only party that is working for the good of the people, but I can't vote for it now; it ain't strong enough to do anything yet, and I don't want to lose my vote," I used to think, "you poor little animal called a man I; would rather be a woman, with no rights at all, than, having the grand rights of citizenship, to sell my birthright for such a mess of pottage, fearing to do right because I might not be on the popular side."

I must congratulate you, dear Bro. Bennett, on your safe arrival home from Europe. I was glad you went, and am glad you hav returned. I am glad you are writing such grand, good letters descriptiv of your journey. The fact is, I hav been many times glad on your account the last few months, but the first and biggest glad was when you were released from the Albany Penitentiary. May the time be long ere you see the inside of a prison again. I would rather hear of you in those mental and spiritual prisons of the human race, the churches and cathedrals.

I hav not written you before since you were in Albany, so excuse the length of this, and believe me a truth-seeker in every direction and your True and sincere friend, MRS. L. T. R. AKIN.

D. M. BENNETT: I was glad to see your announcement, "Home Again," for it seemed sort of lonesome while you were so far away. I am glad you enjoyed the trip so much, for I think it was your due after being so long confined in that "beautiful Christian institution."

I was very much pleased on reading the account of the reception your European friends gave you. It was grand and well deserved, as was also the reception given you at Chickering Hall, which was gloriously grand, and due, in view of the sacrifice you had to endure.

I herein inclose three dollars for the renewal of my subscription to your paper. I would hav been glad to hav done it sooner; but, with old age and infirmities, I can't always bring things around as I would wish.

I hope a long life, peace, and prosperity are in store for you and your dear wife, who has suffered so keenly on your account.

Yours with much esteem, ROBERT SEAVER.

BRO. BENNETT: Please accept my earnest greeting on your safe return from Europe. I am so glad the friends of truth thought you worthy to represent them at Brussels, and that you succeeded in going despite the opposition of your enemies. I can never tell you how much I hav enjoyed your letters, for I do not believe any person could giv a greater amount of information in so small a compass, besides being spiced with fun, and I really think we hav had another "Innocent Abroad." Let me say here that my failure to send you greeting on your return to liberty and home was not an intentional neglect. I deferred at first, knowing that very many would write, and you would hav so many to meet and greet, and finally one thing and another hindered till procrastination, the sly old thief, filched all the time, and the next thing I knew you were off for Europe; so I consoled myself with the thought of what you said in your greeting to your friends, who had written that they were dear, and the many who had not, were dear to your finer feeling, that sentiment is spiritual and could not be expressed in words. I hav beea trying my best ever since I noticed that you are in need of funds to send subscriptions for 1881 and hav finally succeeded, and inclose herein with best wishes for health and happiness for you and yours, and success for the paper and all connected with it. Yours truly, H. E. CONKLIN.

D. M. BENNETT: Welcome home! Inclosed please find post-office order for my next year's subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER, $3.00. I want the paper kept going and shall hope to hav the pleasure of remitting three dollars a year for it, for many years yet.

With anxious desire for your continued success,

As ever, yours, JOHN A. JOST.

MR. EDITOR: I notice by your "ticket of leave" on my paper that I hav been swallowing it down somewhat beyond the legitimate term of my subscription, hence I cry peccavi (your recent wanderings among Roman churches will tell you what this Latin verb means), consequently I inclose you a post-office order to boost my appetite up again ahead of your favors, as far as the "tin" will stretch.

Having graduated as a journalist, under the discipline of old "Father Ritchie," of the Richmond, Va., Enquirer, I know how uncomfortable it is to editorial sanctity when subscriptions due do not come in timely to your crib, so as to make the printer's "mare go," and the editor's pot boil! We ought, in mundane courtesy, to imagin ourselvs, under trying ordeals, in the tried one's place, and we would know how it is ourselvs.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, as propagated by Bro. Bennett, ranks foremost among the scientific periodicals now adapting their views, their reasonings, and their arguments to lead as well as co-operate with an age of ripening and progressiv intellectuality, for the benefit of the masses who, while wielding the innate power of brawn and sinew, are yet not mentally developed in self-confidence to deprecate old-fogy priest-craft, with all its dogmatic impudence, its irrational so-called miracles, and its irreverend biblical whirligigs peculiar to the now-a-day demoralized church, technically termed Christianity.

The spirit of your paper, in rational economy, is so much ahead of the gross popular bigotry of instinct which humiliates the priest-ridden class of our country just now, on our little earth (a mere speck in the great space of nature's unlimited program), so that in a hundred years hence people will look back in wonderment at the pre-conceptiv reasonings in Bennett's paper, in contradistinction to the biased mentality of the classes victimized in ignorance under the attorney-tricks of dictatorial dead beats now working as "ministers of the gospel."

Moral.—Keep up the spirit of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and enthuse the vitality of Liberal Leagues all over the land. Respectfully, FRANK O'MAHONY.

D. M. BENNETT: I hav sent you no word of congratulation since your return from your European trip. But this was not because I did not think of you, for there is not a day passes but what your name is on my tongue. F. F. FOLLETT.

D. M. BENNETT: Your letters from Europe are good reading for the Protestants and other Infidels of the New World.

Pious soul! I do not wonder you sought the company of the saints! They are now in the waning of their millennium. We now see Christianity in its fruitage, its golden harvest, its sere and yellow leaf, and a person of your religious turn of mind wouldn't go to Europe, especially to Italy, to visit and take items in factories and machine shops. No, bless your old soul, Christianity has dealt you some pretty hard blows at her outposts, and I don't wonder you feel like exposing her rotten vitals. You need no excuse for visiting the cathedrals, and the wonder is that you could gather so many important items in so little time. I regret that you could not extend your trip to the Holy Land so as to see with other than Christian eyes the wonderful evidence of the plenary inspiration of the holy scriptures. Perhaps Lot's wife, with her fingers and toes all intact, would hav convinced your obdurate heart and bowed your stubborn will. Your route home by Mt. Sinai, Alexandria, and the pyramids would not hav been amiss. Perhaps you could tell us whether that rock in the wilderness has dried up yet, how long after the flood the pyramids were built, or inform us when and by whom the library at Alexandria was destroyed. All these are matters that interest us.

But I will not detain you to read my musings. I thank you for your vicarious suffering for freedom of speech and the press, and hope they will not be lost in behalf of the many who now divide them. I believe with Bob. Ingersoll that the family is the holiest place on earth, but free speech and a free press will protect and purify it.

Inclosed please find three dollars to renew my subscription. Yours, L. H. IDE.

MR. BENNETT: Happy to hear you are home again, but I feel bad to see how the Liberals are treating you in not paying for their paper. I think it is well worth the money. I hav been taking it twelve months this month, and I feel that I cannot do without it. I look for it every Saturday, and sometimes I do not get it until Monday, and I tell you I miss it.

Inclosed find a post-office order for four dollars; three dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1881, and one dollar for H. B. Brown for the defense of Mr. Barter. Poor fellow, I would like to see him get ahead of those bigots. Oh, for the time when such men as Comstock will be in Hong Kong or some other place.

I often wish I had the money to help you along, for I love the cause you advocate, but you know a workingman has not much to spare. I was glad to see how the English Liberals treated you. Being an Englishman myself I felt proud that there were some good men and women who could sympathize with you, Mr. Bennett. I do not wish anything with the paper, for I think your paper is cheap enough without giving other things with it. I am trying all I can to get subscribers and I giv all my papers away.

Mr. Bennett, I hope the coming year will be a better year, and that your subscribers will pay up is the earnest wish of your friend, WM. FRAY.

DEAR BENNETT: In taking my last TRUTH SEEKER from its wrapper I noticed that I was nearing the time when I should renew my subscription or quietly withdraw from the band that I hav associated with in thought and purpose during the brief years that your paper has lived and breathed among us. As usual, I opened first to the page of friendly correspondence, and there I found the name of J. Hacker signed to a letter written by him to the Hon. John Cosgrove, of Washington. D. C. In sorrowful meditation I read and re-read both of their letters, and concluded I would ask your permission to say a few words to both of these men, for they are my brothers, and I want them to reckon me in whenever they take account of stock. Accept my thanks, brother Cosgrove, for your kind gift to our aged brother Mr. Hacker, and may you ever be surrounded with friends and a comfortable, pleasant home. I thank you for every word and line you hav written to brother Hacker, and for the money you hav sent him. I accept the kind act as a favor done direct to myself. May your life be long, happy, and useful. Mr. Hacker is a most worthy man, and truly deserves our aid and sympathy: and I now ask every Liberal that is in moderate circumstances to send him some money accompanied with a few kind words.

Brothers and sisters of THE TRUTH SEEKER family, I appeal to your best feelings in behalf of our aged friends Mr. and Mrs. Hacker. Just think of the burden of seventy or eighty years, and feeble health, and, what is worse, unfortunate circumstances constantly reminding them that they hav lived a little too long.

I know what it is to be poor. I know, too, that friends are sometimes scarce on such occasions; but don't let that be said of us. I hav asked Mr. Hacker to go to the poorhouse rather than suffer for want of food and clothing. I now ask the Liberals to reach out a helping hand to our needy brother and sister, and if possible help them to the privilege of laying their heads upon their own pillow to breathe their last farewell to earth and friends under the sacred shelter of their own roof. I know that Mr. Hacker helped the poor when he had health and ambition to carry the burden, and I am very much ashamed that those whom he sheltered and fed and clothed should turn the cold shoulder to him now, when he so much needs their kindness or a portion of the gratitude that is justly due to him. Again, dear brothers and sisters, I humbly ask that we all join hands and help these friends through the bitter New Jersey winter that lies before them. Their address is Berlin, New Jersey. MARGARET FLINT.

MR. EDITOR: Again it becomes my pleasure to say to the readers of your valuable paper that we—I mean a large and intelligent audience, composed of men with LL.D., M.D., D.D., and Prof. attached to their names, and I might also say members of the Elgin Liberal League, and, bless you, ladies, yes, a good number of the fair sex, all of whom seemed to expand somewhat through the influence of the able speaker—listened the other night to Mrs. H. S. Lake in her very able lecture "Individualism." I tell you, Liberals, don't let this little woman, who is so willing to work, be idle, for it more than pays to keep her at work. There was a "reverend" gentleman, yes, a man with D.D. to his name, called on me today to say that he heard last night a good logical discourse, something to set people thinking. Not wishing to enter into details of the lecture, suffice it to say it was sound good sense, and ought to lead those who heard it onward and upward from the groveling superstitious ideas of the church to a more noble manhood. Think for yourself.

J. W. ARCHIBALD,
Sec. Elgin, Ill., Liberal League.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed post-office order for nine dollars, list of names, etc. Let me assure you it givs me great pleasure to thus much aid the cause of universal mental and physical liberty.

I notice that you are "getting it hot and heavy" for falling in with the customs of the country by "taking something," because in your judgment it was a benefit to do so. I will not attempt a vindication of the drinker or the abstainer, but for myself, I am a drinker—an occasional drinker; some years, perhaps, three times; other years, thirty. But I am not a scientific drinker, neither am I a scientific eater, walker, or breather; but at least I am on the learner's bench, and I trust I shall improve. That which we eat and drink, and how much, must depend largely upon our avocation. Had I been with you by the side of the glacier vault, I should certainly hav tipped glasses with you, and with the wits of the day exclaim, "I'm looking at you." It's all very well for any one to talk of running two heads, but one is enough for me to attend to; perhaps a little too much sometimes. It is the misfortune of society which is founded on Christian theology that individuals can bestialize themselvs not only with alcoholic drinks but with even roast beef and plum pudding, and impose themselvs upon some other individual or individuals, the latter having practically no escape. It is the church morals, then, that are at fault, and if we would hav peace on earth and good will to men, we must perfectly despise the baby god atonement fraud and all its accompanying untruthfulness.

I cannot believe in the doctrin of irresponsibility, nor yet the other extreme, which to about the same extent teaches irresponsibility. If I am anything, I am an Infidel Spiritualist, and this is why I like THE TRUTH SEEKER; it does not fossilize and become a Pharisee.

I started out to write a letter, but I am "up a tree," for I would rather walk twenty miles; my back would stand it better. How you, in your ten weeks in Europe—pleasure trip, as some one calls it—got off so many lines puzzles me. You must hav substituted for your vertebra something which is conspicuous "from behind the bars," yes, one of the heaviest of those bars. DR. GEO. HARDCASTLE.

MR. EDITOR: After reading your appeal in THE TRUTH SEEKER I concluded to send on my subscription in advance to help you out.

I hav been very much interested with your letters from Europe. You certainly giv a grand description of that old country. Those letters alone are worth the price of the paper. Long life to you, and a Happy New Year.

Yours respectfully, WM. MCLEAN.

The Truth Seeker's Prayer; or, the Echo of the Times.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

O God, thou cause of civilization,
Of the bright minds that blest each nation,
Which shines the brightest through the gloom
Of ages past? God show us whom!
ECHO: Hume.

Whose writings, Lord, tend most to build
A temple with true wisdom filled;
That shows most plainly error's snares;
And garners wheat—burns up all tares?
ECHO: Voltaire's.

O God, I fear those names I hear
Are Satan's whispers in mine ear;
Tell me, O God, whose book displays
Pure common sense and truth always?
ECHO: Volney's.

Great God, the devil's in the air,
For doubts attack me everywhere.
Giv me true books to store my brains
And exorcise my soul from pains!
ECHO: Tom Paine's.

Lord, bid those fiends to fly away,
Or stop mine ears to what they say.
Giv true men's names or giv me none
While waft the gentle zephyrs on.
ECHO: Jefferson.

Oh, cease, thou evil spirit, cease,
And let my doubting soul hav peace.
Lord guide me by thy gentle hand
To some bright star in this free land.
ECHO: Kneeland.

O God, look down and pity me;
Some angel send to set me free.
Whose voice resounds from pole to pole,
Whose teachings ne'er will injure soul?
ECHO: Ingersoll.

Since prayer is all an empty vapor,
I wish I knew of some good paper
Which is for right an earnest speaker.
And a sure guide to a truth seeker.
ECHO: TRUTH SEEKER.

A Midsummer Night.

BY CHARLES BRADLEY.

"The Nightingale whose song doth hush the night."—Shakspere.

All hid in shade the nightingale,
With such sweet breath told his tale,
That unslumbering silent night
Listened with a deep delight;
And the tranced strain to hear,
Every one with ravished ear.
All the thronging stars drew near;
And the brook with tiny sigh,
Rippled to the melody.
And the fire-flies in the grass
Sparkle to it as they pass,
And the far, low-breathed waterfall
Which from music deep doth call.
Deeply diapasioned all;
'Til Aurora's herald ray,
Call the lark to hail the day,
And the soul of starlight born
Sleeps at the portal of the dawn.

Sixteen Saviors or None.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Being a reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examins all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other, and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and themselvs, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. Price, 75 cents, pamphlet; $1, bound.

By neglect, but one package of Graduated Catarrh Cure will give instant relief, and in most cases effect a permanent cure. This is the only remedy that may be graduated to properly affect any stage of this loathsome disease, from a slight local irritation to a nauseous scrofulous discharge. Catarrh is much easier removed when treated in time than when allowed to become firmly rooted in the system. Be wise and prompt. Send one dollar to H. J. CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

Purchasers of PLAIN HOME TALK are at liberty to CONSULT ITS AUTHOR, in person or by mail, FREE. Price of the new Popular Edition, by mail, postage prepaid, only $1.50. Contents table free. AGENTS WANTED. MURRAY HILL PUBLISHING COMPANY, 129 East 28th st., New York.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

"The Gods and Other Lectures."

Special Notice from Bliss' Chief's Band.

Me, Red Cloud, speak for Blackfoot, the great Medicin Chief from happy hunting grounds. He say he love white chiefs and squaws. He travel like the wind. He go to circles. Him big chief. Blackfoot want much work to do. Him want to show him healing power. Make sick people well. Where paper go, Blackfoot go. Go quick. Send right away. No wampum for three moon.

This spirit message was first published in "Mind and Matter," January 10, M. S. 32, with the announcement that magnetized paper would be sent to all who were sick in body or mind that desired to be healed, also to those that desired to be developed as spirit mediums, for three months for three three-cent stamps. The three months closed with the following result: 3,405 persons hav sent for the paper by mail, one thousand persons hav received it at the office; and the hundreds of testimonials that hav been received of its wonderful work in healing the sick and developing mediums prove that Red Cloud and Blackfoot hav faithfully kept promises. From January 10th, M. S. 32, to January 10th, M. S. 33, over 15,000 persons hav sent for this paper, and thousands hav been benefited by its use. That all may hav an opportunity to test the merits of the paper, the price for the future will be as follows: one sheet, postage paid, ten cents; twelve sheets, one dollar. Send a silver ten cent piece if you can. Address James A. Bliss, 713 Sansom street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Gems of Thought.

THERE is no real obedience without power to disobey.—Parker.

BEAUTY in a woman is like the flowers in spring; but virtue is like the star in heaven.

THE empire of a woman is the empire of softness, of address, of complacency. Her commands are caresses, her menaces tears.

BRETHREN, be not children in understanding; howbeit, in malice [i. e., vice, wickedness], be ye children, but in understanding be men.—1 Cor. xiv, 20.

THEY who imagin truth in untruth, and see untruth in truth, never arrive at truth, but follow vain desires. They who know truth in truth, and untruth in untruth, arrive at truth, and follow true desires.—Buddha's "Dhammapada."

THE religious sense is as yet too feebly developed in most of us; but certainly, in no preceding age hav men taken up the work of life with more earnestness or with more real faith in the unseen than at the present day, when so much of what was once deemed all-important knowledge has been consigned to the limbo of mythology.—Fiske's "Unseen World."

HE who still needs the expectation of a future recompense as a spring of action stands in the outer court of morality, and let him take heed lest he fall. For supposing that in the course of his life this belief is overthrown by doubt, what then becomes of his morality? How will it fare with the latter, even in the case of the former remaining unshaken? He who does good in view of future beatitude acts, after all, only from selfish motivs. —Strauss.

THERE is a long line of fanatics extending from the time of Jesus, reaching from century to century, marching on from age to age, with the banner of the cross over their heads and the gospel on their tongues and fire and sword in their hands. The last of that apocalyptic rabble hav not yet passed by. The clouds of darkness hide them. What need to tell of our own fathers; what they suffered; what they inflicted? Their crime is fresh and unatoned.—Theodore Parker.

ALL the laws of the universe hav had existence from the beginning, yet how recently is it that electricity has been discovered! And do we yet know what this power implies? Did the earth ever do other than go round the sun? Yet how long is it since man found this out? And are the spiritual [psychological] truths of man's nature more easily discovered than the physical phenomena which surround him? Why should there not be development in these as well as in those? —Lessing.

THE celebrated Pilgrim Fathers, who fled from the tyranny of Laud and his abettors to America, and are described as having "sought only freedom to worship God," had no notion of allowing the same freedom to others, but enacted and enforced the most severe penalties against all who differed from them, and compelled the ever-venerated Roger Williams, the great champion of toleration, to fly from them to Rhode Island, where he founded a colony on his own truly Christian system.—Archbishop Whately.

MANY persons are of such a disposition as to be nearly incapable of remaining in doubt on any point that is not wholly uninteresting to them. They speedily make up their minds on each question and come to some conclusion, whether there are any good grounds for it or not. And judging, as men are apt to do, in all matters, of others from themselvs, they usually discredit the most solemn assurances of any one who professes to be in a state of doubt on some question, taking for granted that if you do not adopt their opinion you must be of the opposit.—Archbishop Whately.

APPEARANCES all testify to the reality and permanence of death; a fearful onus of proof lies upon those who contend that these appearances are deceptiv. When we interrogate the vast universe of organization, we see not simply life and death, but gradually growing life and gradually approaching death. After death all that we hav ever known of man is gone; all we hav ever seen of him is dissolved into its component elements; it does not disappear so as to leave us at liberty to imagin that it may hav gone to exist elsewhere, but is actually used up as materials for other purposes.—Greg's "Creed of Christendom."

THE love of acquisition should, like every other impulse, be kept within reasonable bounds and subordinated to higher aims; but in the teaching of Jesus it is ignored from the very first, and its effectivness in promoting culture and humanitarian tendencies is misunderstood, Christianity, in this respect, manifesting itself as a principle directly antagonistic to culture. It only prolongs its existence among the enlightened and commercial nations of our times by the emendations which a cultivated, but profane, reason has made in it, this being, at the same time, so magnanimous, or, perhaps, so weak and hypocritical, as to impute these emendations not to itself but to Christianity—to the spirit of which they are, on the contrary, entirely opposed.—Strauss.

WE are perpetually reminded of the evils produced by wealth and the sinful love of money, and yet assuredly no other passion—except the love of knowledge—has been productiv of equal benefit to mankind. To it we owe all commerce and industry. Industrial undertakings and trade hav made us acquainted with the productions of many countries, hav aroused our curiosity, enlarged the field of our vision by bringing us in contact with nations of various ideas, customs, and languages, accustomed us to vast undertakings, to foresight and prudence; taught us, besides, many useful technical crafts; and, lastly, endowed with valuable means for the preservation of life and the alleviation of suffering. All this we owe to the love of money. Could theology succeed in extirpating it, these influences would cease, and we should, in a measure, relapse into barbarism.—Buckle.

Odds and Ends.

THE man who drinks 'alf and 'alf gets of'n off.

A SQUAW just died in Washington territory who was 114 years old. Her death is attributed to tobacco and whisky, which she had used immoderately since 1776.

MR. SMITHERS believes in unlucky numbers. For instance, he says, it's unlucky to hav thirteen persons at a table when there is only dinner enough for ten.

A LITTLE girl who had been very observant of her parents' mode of exhibiting their charity, being asked what generosity was, she answered, "It is giving to the poor all the old stuff you don't want yourself."

A CINCINNATI youth, in a two column account of a wedding, says that the bride wore a gown with a "surplus neck;" that the bridesmaids had gowns that were "surplus in the neck," and that the bride's mother wore a lavender satin "cut surplus in the neck." In fact, he seems to hav thought that too many clothes were worn.

THE ADVANTAGES OF POLYGAMY.

We halted at a railway station in Utah for dinner. A white-haired but not very sanctimonious saint occupied the chair next to me.

"A resident of the country?" I asked.

"Oh, yes; for twenty years."

"Married?"

"Some."

"More than one wife?"

"I think so. I've got a few scattered about here and there."

"Believe in polygamy, I presume?"

"Certainly; I'd never hav made a living if I hadn't."

"How's that?"

"Well, you see, stranger, I used to think a good deal as you do. I had 160 acres of land and one wife, but didn't make much headway. There was too much work for one man to attend to. Finally I froze to a second wife. She took her share of the burdens like a perfect brick, and affairs moved on in better shape. Then I got to thinking that if two wives were better than one, three would be better than two, consequently I took a third, and my affairs improved still more. I mapped out the business of the ranch and gave No. 1 her part, and gave a part to No. 2 and a part to No. 3, and took a part myself. Everything went on like clockwork. Our little community was thoroughly organized. Finally I concluded that a fourth wife would be quite an advantage, and I looked around and secured her. I found that the more wives I had the more land I could work. I now operate 240 acres of one kind and another, and hav six wives to assist me, and I've got things so systematized down that everything goes on quite lovely, and I don't hav much to do myself. Polygamy is a great institution, my friend, and you'll never succeed in the world until you marry a few times. Sometimes one of my wives gets a little offish-like, but instead of making a great row about it and getting a divorce, as you do in California, I simply stay away from her for a day or two, and then when I do happen around she smiles all over her face and she loves me in a desperate fashion. Oh, yes, I may marry several times yet before I die, and the more women I marry the richer I expect to get."

CHILDREN'S QUAINT SAYINGS.

The London Truth advertised recently to giv a prize of two pounds two shillings for the quaintest sayings of a child. Several hundred contributions were sent in, of which the following are the most pointed:

As we were talking one day about churches and their curious ceremonies, a little boy remarked that he had seen a christening, a funeral, and a wedding, but he had never seen a divorce.

Jack (aged four, taking a walk): What becomes of people when they die? Mamma: They turn into dust, dear. Jack: What a lot of people there must be on this road, then!

Tottie: I wonder why dolls are always girls, Tom? Tom: Because boys hate to be made babies of.

A child seeing a bill on a telegraph post: Oh, mamma, look; a message has fallen down!

A precocious boy of six years, listening wearily to a long-winded tale related by a prosy relativ, took advantage of a short pause to say, slyly, I wish that story had been brought out in numbers.

Little baby is very ill, Charlie; I am afraid he will die. Well, if he does die, mamma, he won't go to the bad place. Why, Charlie, how can you know that? Oh, I know he can't, mamma; he's got no teeth to gnash.

Little boy, learning his catechism from his mother: Q. What is a man's chief end? A. His head.

Girl (yawning over lessons): I'm so tired; I should like to go to sleep. Boy: I'll tell you what to do, then; get up early to-morrow and hav a good sleep before breakfast.

Mamma: And David was able to kill that great big man Goliath because God helped him. Harry (aged six): Well, I don't call that fair, mamma; that's two on one.

A little girl had a penny given her to put in the collection-box at church. When she dropped in the coin, she exclaimed, That's the way the money goes, pop goes the weasel.

Small boy, watching his sister iron a piece of work with bird's nest of eggs done in crewel on it: I say, sister, if you keep the iron so long on those eggs you'll hatch 'em.

A little girl, seeing two love birds billing and cooing, was told that they were making love. Why don't they marry? she asked; then they would not make love any more.

A fond mother said to her son: Tommy, my dear, I am going to giv you a little companion soon. Which would you prefer, a little boy or a little girl? Well, mother, replied Tommy, if it is all the same to you, I would rather hav a little donkey.

A little girl, aged five, going to bed one night, and kneeling down to say her prayers, said, Oh, mamma, may I only say amen to-night? I am so tired,

OF

STANDARD WORKS.

Published by D. M. BENNETT,

141 Eighth St., New York.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. By D. M. BENNETT, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Octavo; second edition; enlarged and revised. Being the biographies and important doctrines of the most distinguished teachers, philosophers, reformers, innovators, founders of new schools of thought and religion, disbelievers in current theology, and the deepest thinkers and most active humanitarians of the world, from Menu down through the succeeding three thousand years to our own time. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions. By D. M. BENNETT. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians, from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present. A companion book to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Containing a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of the church. A full account is given of the bloody wars which Christianity has inhumanly waged to spread its rule. It also gives a history of Jesuitism for three centuries. The whole is based upon Christian authorities. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Analysis of Religious Belief. By VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, son of Lord John Russell, who was twice Premier of England. Complete, from the London edition. This remarkable work has attracted unusual attention in England. It is the work of a brilliant young lord of Christian parents, who was brought up in the Christian faith, but who, upon investigation and reflection, became a decided unbeliever; the result of which is the elaborate work here named, the preparation of which occupied him several years. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Great Works of Thomas Paine, Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Contains Life of Paine; his theological writings—the Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams, Letter to Camille Jordan, Of the Religion of Deism; his political Writings—Common Sense, The Crisis Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), and The Rights of Man. All in one octavo volume, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50.

Supernatural Religion: An Enquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Decidedly the ablest work on this line ever published. Probably no work printed in England excited greater interest than this. It was issued anonymously, and the great inquiry was, "Who is the author?" It is most damaging to the claims of Christianity, and its positions and statements have never been refuted by the clergy. It is very scholarly, and enters into the examination of the original Greek in detail and with great exactness. Three 8vo volumes in one, revised and corrected, and accurately reproduced from the latest London edition, which sells at $15.00. The London Times, in speaking of this great work, uses this language: "No book published in the world, at any time or in any age, has had the influence and effect on the thinking part of the community as this work. It has done more to open the eyes of the ignorant and credulous, and sweep away the cobwebs of dogma and superstition, than any other book." Published complete in a volume of 1,000 pages, with a full index, at the following low prices: Cloth, $4; leather, $5; morocco, gilt edges, $5.50.

Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated. Being the moral and volitive dispositions of mankind as manifested in the human form and countenance. By JOSEPH SIMMS, M.D. This work is the fruit of twenty years' diligent observation of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. In one volume of 650 8vo pp.; illustrated by 260 cuts. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Paine's Theological Works. In one volume, comprising Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Eskine, Essay on Dreams, Of the Religion of Deism, etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

Paine's Political Works. In one volume, comprising Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), The Rights of Man, and Life of Paine, with a fine steel portrait. Cloth, $1.50.

The Age of Reason. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

The Age of Reason and the Examination of Prophecies. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Common Sense. By THOMAS PAINE. His first and most important political work. Paper, 15 cents.

The Rights of Man. By THOMAS PAINE. Written in defense of his fellowman. A work almost without a peer in the world. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

Life of Thomas Paine. By CALVIN BLANCHARD. 12mo. Large type, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Heathens of the Heath. By WM. MCDONNELL, author of Exeter Hall. A radical romance. Paper, $1.00; cloth, $1.50.

Career of Religious Ideas: Their Ultimate the Religion of Science. By HUDSON TUTTLE. An able examination of the sources of the past religions of the world. 140 pp. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures. By D. M. BENNETT. Embracing a variety of subjects, the whole making nearly seven hundred pages. The subjects treated can hardly prove uninteresting to the reader. Paper, 75 cents; cloth, $1.00.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate between Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presbyterian clergyman, and D. M. BENNETT, Editor of "The Truth Seeker." Three propositions were discussed, viz: 1. Did unbelievers in the Bible do as much for American independence as believers in it? 2. Has Infidelity done as much as Christianity to promote learning and science? 3. Is there a stronger probability that Infidelity is true than that the Bible is divine? Bennett affirming; Humphrey denying. Cloth (550 pp.), $1.00.

The Burgess-Underwood Debate. Between Prof. O. A. BURGESS, President of the Northwestern Christian University at Indianapolis, Ind., and B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, Mass. Held during four days at Aylmer, Ont., commencing June 29, 1875. Reported by John T. Hawke. FIRST PROPOSITION: "The Christian Religion, as set forth in the New Testament, is true in fact, and of divine origin." Burgess in the affirmative; Underwood in the negative. SECOND PROPOSITION: "The Bible is erroneous in many of its teachings regarding science and morals, and is of human origin." Underwood in the affirmative; Burgess in the negative. 12mo. 188 pp. Price, paper. 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

The Creed of Christendom: Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure. By W. R. GREG, author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," etc. F. W. Newman, in speaking of this work in the "Fortnightly Review," says: "Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science asked, 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable."

One volume, crown octavo, with complete index. The London edition sold for $5. Price of American edition, cloth, $1.50.

The Underwood-Marples Debate. Between B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, and the Rev. JOHN MARPLES, of Toronto, Ont. Held at Napanee, Ont., in July, 1875. Two propositions discussed: FIRST: "That Atheism, Naturalism, and Modern Skepticism are Illogical and contrary to Reason." SECOND: "The Bible, consisting of the Old and New Testaments, evidences beyond all other books its divine origin." Marples affirms; Underwood denies. Reported in full, and revised by the debaters. 111 pp. Paper, 35 cents; cloth, 60 cents.

Interrogatories to Jehovah. By D. M. BENNETT. A series of close questions upon a great variety of subjects, from the origin of Deity and the universe, the creation of the earth, man, and woman, the flood, the Bible, the old patriarchs and prophets, down to the doctrinal points embraced by the Church. With a full-length portrait of Jehovah according to the Bible. A bold and radical work. 12mo, 250 pp. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or, An Answer to the Question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Infallibly-Inspired, and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman; together with a sketch of the author. In four parts. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

Truth Seeker Leaflets, of two pages each. Thirty-two in number; 4 cents per dozen; 8 cents for the set; 25 cents per hundred; $2.00 per thousand.

Adventures of Elder Triptolemus Tub. Comprises important and startling disclosures concerning hell, its magnitude, morals, employments, climate, etc. By Rev. GEORGE ROGERS. A rich, interesting little work. Paper, 15 cents.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 8. No. 3. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. | New York, Saturday, January 15, 1881. | SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. | $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

TWENTY American cities to-day contain over 100,000 people each; twenty American states contain over 1,000,000 people each.

THE nineteenth centenary of Virgil is to be commemorated by erecting a monument to him in Mantua, his birthplace.

HE was neither an actor nor a journalist, for he was a clergyman by trade; but he spent Sunday in the Tombs for intoxication all the same.

POOR'S Railroad Manual for 1880 shows 64,397 miles of railway in operation in the United States, the earnings of which were for the year 1879 no less than $529,012,999.

A JURY recently decided that John Dick, of Warsaw, N. Y., had a right to sit in his pew in the German Lutheran church with his feet elevated upon the back of the seat in front of him.

MOODY and Sankey hav found the regeneration of San Francisco a longer job than they anticipated, and they hav been compelled to forego a visit to New Orleans. Next summer they will go to Europe for pleasure. This is good for the cities they do not visit.

THE Railway Age presents a summary showing the mileage of track actually laid down in the United States during the year 1880. The footings show that 7,027 miles of new track were laid during the past twelve months on at least 234 different lines. These figures are greater than for any year since 1871, and the mileage is greater by 54 per cent than that of 1879.

A MAN with the enormous wealth now possessed by Mr. Vanderbilt could add to it very rapidly; in fact, it will double itself in twenty years if put into four per cent bonds and let alone, save to add the annual interest. With the present "start" which Mr. Vanderbilt has in bonds and dividend-paying stocks, it will be an easy matter for him to be worth at least $250,000,000 should he liv twenty years hence. It is said that he is worth more than half that sum now.

SOME time ago the fourteen-year-old daughter of a printer named Byrd of Atlanta, Ga., died, in the opinion of the attending physician, but has not yet been buried, owing to the fact that portions of the body still remain warm and life-like in appearance. This fact became known while the mourners were preparing for the funeral ceremonies. The body is in a coffin at the cemetery in the dead-house. The physicians are puzzled and unable to say whether life is extinct or not.

A YOUNG lady in Primghar, Iowa, who was made a convert to the Baptist faith was led to the chilly water to be baptized just after our first cold snap set in. The water had scarcely moistened her stockings before she nervously snatched her hand from that of the elder who was leading her, and exclaimed, "It's too cold. I'll wait till spring." That is a pretty sensible young lady. If she could only see a few copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER she would probably defer the cold bath in public altogether.

THE London Telegraph attributes much of the misery of the Irish peasantry to their incorrigible "mania for early marriages." The existence of this "mania," answers the Pall Mall Gazette, is an assumption which is not justified by facts. The Irish neither marry earlier nor multiply more rapidly than the English or Scotch. The statistics as to early marriages are conclusiv. They show that only nine per cent of Irishmen marry before they complete their twenty-fifth year, while the percentage among Scotchmen is sixteen, and among Englishmen twenty-three.

BY George Eliot's death, sums up the London Academy, we are left with only one living novelist who is absolutely of the first class. Thackeray died soon after George Eliot became famous, and Dickens when she had yet much of her best work to do. During all the years in which she labored, it is perhaps true that only one novelist of extraordinery genius had arisen. It is perhaps true that the position filled at one and the same time by Dickens, Thackeray, and George Eliot can be claimed at the present moment, if claimed at all, only by a single novelist—by Thomas Hardy.

VENUS, Jupiter, and Saturn are now so close in the evening sky that they can all be taken in at a glance, and they make a brilliant picture. Venus, which in the telescope appears nearly in the shape of a half moon, is nearest the horizon and the most conspicuous. Jupiter comes next, not so dazzling as Venus, but yet exceeding every fixed star in brightness. Saturn is a few degrees to the left of Jupiter, looking quite pale by contrast, although equal to most of the first magnitude stars. While these three giv beauty to the western sky, Orion and Taurus, with the Dog Star at their heels, lord it in the eastern heavens, and Capella glitters overhead.

THE teacher of a large Bible class in a neighboring town is ill pleased with his pastor and some of the church people, and therefore secedes from the church in which he has labored for over a dozen years, and takes his class to a church of another persuasion. In departing, he issues a manifesto, the earnest spirit of which there is no mistaking. He calls his late pastor "the dwarf," and is proud that he has a hundred million or more of dollars to back him. Considering the limited cost of Sunday-school appliances and theological furnishings, this backing ought to be ample for all the wants of the class for a long time to come, whatever ecclesiastical struggles are in store for it.

REV. DR. FOWLER, of the Methodist Missionary Society, has provoked criticism by affirming that six hundred million of heathen are doomed to suffer the inconceivable and never-ending torments of hell unless the Christian people of this and other countries hurry missionaries and Bibles to the rescue. Rev. Dr. Newman rebukes Rev. Dr. Fowler for such utterances, and cites eminent Methodist authority in support of the theory that not only the little heathen babes but millions of grown-up heathen will be saved, although they may never see a Bible or hear a missionary. Now which of the two, Fowler or Newman, is the exponent of the orthodox Methodist doctrin on this interesting point?

PEOPLE who wonder at the reports of our vanishing forests may find that event less remarkable when they learn that 300,000 cubic feet of pine were turned into matches alone last year. Shoe pegs consumed 100,000 cords of timber, lasts and boot-trees 500,000 cords of birch, beech, and maple, and the handles of tools as much more. There is a forest of nearly a million telegraph poles in the United States, and about 300,000 new ones are used for additions and repairs every year, each pole representing a tree, while 2,000,000 cords of wood were burned up in brick making. It takes 75,000 acres growth thirty years old wood to supply the annual demand in railroad ties. Altogether it is rather remarkable that our forests hav lasted as long as they hav.

AMONG other bad omens in India may be mentioned a snake or jackal crossing one's path; hearing a person cry when you are going anywhere; the cawing of a crow and the crying of a kite; a cat crossing one's path, and the seeing an empty pitcher. As compared with the bad, there are but few good omens. Among these may be mentioned the following: The meeting of a dead body being carried away, and no one crying with it; seeing a pitcher with a rope attached to it, or a Brahman carrying a jug of holy water from the Ganges; a lizard creeping up one's body; hearing a bride cry when she is leaving her parents and going to liv with her husband; hearing the bell of a temple strike, or a trumpet sound, when one is setting out on a journey; a crow perched on a dead body floating down the river, and a fox crossing one's path.

THE Portland Argus says the name of O. M. Cousins, the Methodist minister, has been a familiar one in religious and temperance circles for some time. He was foremost in denouncing the use of liquors, and held himself up as an exemplar of all that was good and pure. But in the Supreme Court at Saco a few days ago his wife Nancy was decreed a divorce from him, and the custody of the children given to the mother. The charges that Mrs. Cousins brought against the Rev. O. M. were extreme cruelty and refusal to provide even the necessaries of life. Evidence in this case clearly showed that defendant was very cruel toward his wife, at times beating, choking, and otherwise brutally ill-treating her. He made the most fearful threats to her, thus making her life a burden to her, until she could stand it no longer, and sought relief from his abuse in divorce.

TIME rights most evils more effectually than man can. "The dissolution of the Oneida Community as a community seems imminent," says the Utica Herald. The recent incorporation of a stock company in its place, with a a capital of $600,000, divided into twenty-five-dollar shares, tells the whole story. There are now about three hundred members of this famous family, about evenly divided as to sex, and all but sixty-five or seventy over sixteen. There are forty families. The stock, none of which is to be sold to outsiders within three years, is to be divided according to this scheme: Those who contributed property at the time of joining receive of this new stock one-half the amount put in. The remainder of the stock is to be divided according to the terms of service among all persons sixteen years of age and upward. Children under sixteen are to be provided for by the company until they attain that age. The company will carry on its old work of farming, fruit canning, silk works, and trap factory, and giv employment to about a hundred outside hands during the season.

THE discussion in regard to hell now takes a new shape, owing to the wide difference of opinion just expressed by two representativ Methodist theologians. The question was for some time as to whether there is a hell or not, and, if there is, whether the punishment inflicted on those who go there will continue forever or will abate after a certain time. In its new shape the discussion is to be not so much as to the nature and duration of future punishment, but as to who will go to hell. Theologian Newman and theologian Fowler are agreed as to the belief that there is a hell. Theologian Fowler runs the missionary society which carries the gospel to the distant heathen. He says that these heathen by hundreds of millions must go to hell unless they are converted, and that they can be converted only through the channels of customary missionary effort. Theologian Newman believes that there is a chance for a great many of these heathen. It is easy to see that there is room for endless diversity of opinion as to the dividing lines between the classes of the heathen who, according to theologian Newman's view of the case, are not marked for the evil place. Newman believes that heathen infants who die before they are old enough to know the difference between good and bad are not sent to hell. He would also exempt a great many of the adult heathen. Just where a little heathen ceases to be an infant and becomes enough of a heathen to deserve eternal punishment for his sins is one of those nice questions on which Methodist and other doctors of divinity might frutlessly argue until doomsday. There are many theologians who claim that the heathen who hav never heard the gospel will not be judged according to gospel law, and will consequently not be punished as if they had lived under gospel privileges. The whole subject is full of inextricable niceties of possible argument.

News of the Week.

IT is rumored that Lima has been captured by the Chilians.

DURING the past year there were twenty-five murders committed in San Francisco.

THE tunnel under the Hudson river is progressing at the rate of four feet a day.

FOUR men were burned to death in a beer tank in a brewery in this city on the 6th.

A BOSTON boy, aged nine, has been indicted for the murder of a companion aged eight.

A WEALTHY Irishman who died recently in Philadelphia left $300,000 to different religious institutions.

LOCKPORT, N. Y., had a $600,000 fire on the 5th. Several hundred persons are thrown out of employment.

FOUR men lost their lives by the explosion of a steam-boiler in a smelting establishment at Newark, N. J.

IT is now proposed in the Senate to place General Grant on the retired list with the rank and pay of General.

FOUR persons were killed in a collision between the police and a mob at Claremorris, Ireland, a few days ago.

THERE were more miles of railroad track laid in this country during the last year than during any previous year.

G. Q. CANNON, the recently-elected Mormon delegate to Congress, has been declared ineligible, as he is an alien and a bigamist.

THE ship Indian Chief, of Liverpool, was wrecked a few days ago at the mouth of the Thames. Eighteen persons were drowned.

PROF. VENNOR, the Canadian weather prophet, has been offered an important position in the Weather Bureau at Washington.

ON the 13th of last month a Japanese steamer, with eighty-two persons on board, was lost in the Japanese Inland sea. Sixty-four lives were lost.

A COLLISION between a Spanish and an English steamer recently in the Mediterranean, resulted in the sinking of the latter vessel and the drowning of forty-five persons.

AFTER months of slow travel from the wharf to Central Park, the Egyptian Obelisk has at length reached its destination, and will be placed in position during the coming week.

THE police of this city hav made a move in the right direction. A few days ago they entered a church fair and put a stop to several lottery games in progress there, much to the indignation of the pious gamblers.

A BILL is before Congress directing the President to purchase land in Mexico or Central America whereon to colonize all negroes in the United States. Another bill provides for the election of postmasters by the people in future.

FRANK LAMMENS and Mrs. Meierhoffer were hanged at Newark, N. J., on the 6th, for the murder of Mrs. Meierhoffer's husband. Each charged the other with being the only guilty one. On the same day two men were hanged in Philadelphia, one for wife-murder and the other for killing his mistress.

OUR first week of this year was a week of disaster in all parts of the world. Storms and shipwrecks at sea, and floods and fires on land, together with an unusual number of murders, suicides, and fatal accidents, seem to indicate that we are being gradually prepared for the fulfilment of Mother Shipton's prophecy.

PARIS village, Clark county, Virginia, was snowed in on December 20th, and the inhabitants came near being starved and frozen to death. When a relief party from a neighboring village reached Paris they found the people on short allowance of food and fuel, and many of them suffering dreadfully from frost bites. Their wants were soon supplied.

Report of a Debate

BETWEEN THE REV. A. HATCHARD AND MRS. ANNIE BESANT, AT THE HALL OF SCIENCE, LONDON.

FIRST NIGHT.—CONTINUED.

MR. HATCHARD.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies, and Gentlemen: Mrs. Besant, in her opening remarks, referred to Dr. Angus, and to the fact that he was one of the present company of revisers of the New Testament, and also to the fact that there are a large number of various readings of the New Testament in existence. I am pleased beyond measure, because I lived with Dr. Angus for four years. I know him well, and I know him for a thoroughly trustworthy scholar. Now, Dr. Angus has repeated over and over again in public that all these various readings, in what are called the manuscripts of the New Testament, do not alter a single doctrin of Christianity, and do not alter a single important fact in the history of Jesus of Nazareth. I hav here Dr. Angus' "Bible Handbook," and if Mrs. Besant has not got this book I will present her with a copy at the end of this debate. Here is the book, and Dr. Angus goes very elaborately into the question of those various manuscripts and these various readings. Now, Mrs. Besant told you that we had no manuscripts in existence older than the fourth century. I suppose that is the fact. But then I say this: Will Mrs. Besant produce to me the original manuscript or manuscripts of anything—say of any classical work? No! There is no such thing in the world, and it is perfectly well known that there is not a single case where we possess the original manuscript or manuscripts of any work of antiquity. We hav only a few manuscripts—certainly three—which are said to be the oldest manuscripts of the New Testament in existence. These old manuscripts which we hav tell us precisely and substantially the same story and the same tale of Jesus of Nazareth. Reference has been made to the difference which exists between the Douay Bible of the Roman Catholics and the authorized version of the Protestant, but I fail to discover any new or any different facts related in the Douay Bible which do not also find their place in the Bible which the Protestant uses. Why, at one time I acted as a military chaplain, and I hav by me now a small Testament which was published by authority, and bearing the imprimatur of the late Cardinal of Westminster (not the present one), and in that book I read the very same facts as I read in the Protestant Bible. The Romish church published this Testament by authority, and they were not simply content with putting at the top of each gospel the name of the author which appears at its head in the Protestant Bible, but also the date and circumstances under which it was supposed to be written. We hav, therefore, as I hav already stated, only a few old manuscripts, but we hav a vast number of a later date. A word about the different readings and the supposed difference which they make. I hold in my hand what I consider an important little book. It is the New Testament of Tauchnitz, of Germany. If you want to know about what the various readings are, and if you cannot read the Greek Testament, this book (published by the firm of Baron Tauchnitz) will giv you the various readings at the bottom of each page in English. I suppose you know that these books in Germany are published by a firm which has gained a good amount of celebrity, whose name I hav mentioned. This is the thousandth volume. They thought they would publish the New Testament, and actually here, in this little book, they publish the New Testament, the authorized version, with all the various readings here in English underneath. Was the firm of Tauchnitz, or was Tischendorf himself, afraid to let the public know about these various readings? Certainly not. As you hav heard, there is a body of revisers who are sitting at Westminster. They are engaged in revising the Bible, but I challenge Mrs. Besant to prove that they will alter it in any important particular or any Christian doctrin. Here is Scrivener's Greek Testament, in which are condensed all the various readings which are known. This book is one which is considered a very good authority, and it is one which theological students are made to read. Here, then, is Scrivener's Greek Testament; here is Tischendorf's English edition of it; prove to me, from these books, that there is any difference between this and the ordinary authorized version. Mrs. Besant has spoken to you at some length upon the subject of miracles, and alleges the impossibility of a single miracle ever having taken place. Now, I beg of all of you here to-night, if you hav never read the volume of Bampton Lectures, by Dr. Mozley ["Lectures on Miracles"], to do so at once. This volume I was ordered to read by the Bishop of Manchester, and I thank his Lordship for having ordered me to read it. I will tell you why. I am not ignorant of Christian science. I will meet any Freethinker on this platform on philosophy or science, if he dares to come. (Laughter, and a voice, "Modesty.") I say I learn from the examples of Freethinkers, whom I hav yet to learn are very modest themselvs. You cannot charge me with knowing nothing about physical science. I say that science has no contradictions whatever of the miracles which are recorded in the New Testament. (Laughter.) I tell you that if you like to take the pains, which I do not believe you Freethinkers will do. . . . ("Question.") If you interrupt me I sit down that minute. I am no paid lecturer of the Christian Evidence Society. I come here entirely upon an independent basis. I tell you that this volume of Bampton Lectures goes elaborately into the question about law. I cannot, in my limited time here to-night, read a passage from this book. I bring it under your notice; but I will read a passage from John Stuart Mill. I suppose all of you know something about him. Now, in his book on "Logic," which I take it that you all know, second volume, and 159th page, he says: "But in order that any alleged fact should be contradictory to a law of causation, the allegation must be, not simply that the cause existed without being followed by the effect, for that would be no uncommon occurrence; but that this happened in the absence of any adequate counteracting cause. Now in the case of an alleged miracle, the assertion is the exact opposit of this. It is, that the effect was defeated, not in the absence, but in consequence of a counteracting cause, namely, a direct interposition of an act of the will of some being, who has power over nature; and in particular of a being whose will being assumed to hav endowed all the causes with the powers by which they produce their effects, may well be supposed able to counteract them. A miracle (as was justly remarked by Brown) is no contradiction to the law of cause and effect; it is a new effect, supposed to be produced by the introduction of a new cause. Of the adequacy of that cause, if present, there can be no doubt; and the only antecedent improbability which can be ascribed to the miracle is the improbability that any such cause existed" (Exeter Hall Lectures). (Applause.) Don't cheer too soon. The thing simply means this, that you must deny the existence of a God to deny logically the possibility of a miracle. If I am not mistaken, Paley says the same words; and I think that Mill must hav seen it in Paley. I giv you John Stuart Mill, not that John Stuart Mill is any great prophet with me, although I hav a certain admiration of the man.

MRS. BESANT.

There are one or two points which hav been alluded to by my opponent in reply to my previous speech which I will deal with before resuming my criticism on Josephus. The first of these is that of the 100,000 readings which I mentioned—the existence of which is not even challenged—none of them affect any important doctrin in the Bible. I will leave you to judge of the accuracy of that, after I hav adduced one or two facts. In the First Epistle of John, chap. v, verse 7, we read: "For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one." Now, that is one of the passages which you do not find in the older manuscripts; it is the solitary assertion of the Trinity to be found in the Bible. Surely the Trinity is important. Take next the doctrin of eternal punishment. That is a doctrin about which the new reading of the Bible will probably giv us very different views to those now held. Some of you may hav read a pitiful letter which appeared in the Athenæum a short time back, in which the writer asked whether the rumor which had reached him was true, viz., that the revisers of the New Testament were going to translate a well-known passage in the Lord's Prayer no longer "Deliver us from evil," but "Deliver us from the evil one." It is admitted that there are no manuscripts which can be traced back beyond the beginning of the fourth century, but Mr. Hatchard says I may say the same about any classical work. Not one of the originals of the Greek or Latin works which hav come down to us is now extant, and it is urged by my opponent that I ought to treat them in the same fashion as I hav treated the Bible. My reply to that is that it is precisely because I do treat the Bible in the same way as any other ancient book that I require some proof as to the authorship and authenticity of what is therein contained. If I find a classical work in which are related a number of miraculous events, I do not believe them as matters of fact or of history any more than I believe in the miraculous events which the Bible narrates. We now come to what has been said about Er. Tischendorf, and I may tell you that I do not lay much stress upon Tischendorf's authority, and I will tell you why. According to his own confession, he discovered one of these manuscripts of which you hav heard in a monastery on Mount Sinai, and while believing that he was in possession of the most priceless of treasures, the most ancient copy of the word of God in existence, he kept it to himself for fifteen years before he announced his unparalleled discovery to the world. The man who would thus keep for fifteen years the most valuable of the manuscripts in the world is not a man, I say, who ought to be thoroughly relied on.

I will now take up Josephus where I laid him down. I will giv you the last point, and that is that the second and fourth sections run straight on, while the third section, which consists of this passage which is said to be a forgery, is not connected in sense with those two sections I hav mentioned. The end of the second section reads thus: "Since the people were unarmed, and were caught by men prepared for what they were about, there were a great number of them slain by this means, and others of them ran away wounded; and thus an end was put to this sedition. . . . About the same time also another sad calamity put the Jews into disorder."

I allege to you that these two paragraphs which I hav read ought to be read consecutivly without the intervention of the other paragraph, and that they make sense so read, while the first words of the fourth section hav no meaning after the third.

I hav now disposed of the Latin writers. I hav disposed of Josephus. I hav said the best I can say briefly about them, and I shall best consult the time and the work before me if, instead of going over any ground twice, I leave you to judge yourselvs between myself and my opponent. I hav now got four witnesses absolutely uncorroborated—four witnesses for whom we must try to find some sort of evidence, and I must remind you that we want overwhelming evidence, for no less a question than the supernatural character of Jesus is now at stake. I must say I regret that Jesus only came into the world to a very ignorant and barbarous nation, in an obscure corner, and in such a way that it was quite impossible for any large number of people to become aware of his existence in their midst. We hav at least a right to expect that when four of his immediate followers and witnesses of his alleged miracles sit down to giv us an account of what they had seen, the veracity of our witnesses shall be unimpeached; that they shall giv us a coherent account of their hero's life.

I will take the point as to their competent knowledge first. You do not find it stated in the gospels who the writers are, and, therefore, it is very difficult to judge of their competency as historians. Further, there is no lack of records in the early church claiming to be, equally with the four gospels now under consideration, authentic narrativs of the events which we hav here recorded. We hav, in fact, no less than thirty-four different gospels in addition to the four which are now received, and seven of these at least hav come down to us at the present day. We only know the others by extracts. Then, in Luke, I find that the author of Luke does not pretend that his gospel stands by itself. Luke distinctly tells us: "Forasmuch as many hav taken in hand to set forth in order a declaration of those things which are most surely believed among us, even as they delivered them unto us, which from the beginning were eyewitnesses and ministers of the word; it seemed good to me also" (Luke i, 1–3). He does not even pretend that he is himself an eye-witness, and I say to my opponent that there is no proof of his accuracy or of the truth of his story. We hav no less than ninety-eight other writings, which are said to be written by Peter, James, Matthias, Andrew, and others, fifty-six of which are still extant; so it is not only Matthew and John, among the apostles, who are singled out for the honor of writing Christ's story; the difficulty is to tell which are genuin and which spurious, for, according to Moshcim, it was a habit of the early Christians to take great names in order to cover the want of merit or truth in their compositions. He says: "For not long after Christ's ascension into heaven several histories of his life and doctrins, full of pious frauds and fabulous wonders, were composed by persons whose intentions, perhaps, were not bad, but whose writings discovered the greatest superstition and ignorance. Nor was this all. Productions appeared which were imposed upon the world by fraudulent men as the writings of the holy apostles" (Ecclesiastical History, ed. 1847, page 31).

I quite agree with that view of Mosheim, and I leave it to you as a view of a Christian historian.

I am told by my opponent that, passing for a moment the four gospels themselvs, I shall find them proved by the Fathers of the Christian church, and I am referred to Polycarp as one of the Christian Fathers on whom my opponent relies. I find my opponent says that he relies upon him, but I am bound to inform you that hardly any quotations can be got from Polycarp which are continuous with texts of the gospels. My contention with regard to the gospels is that of Dean Alford. There were a large number of early traditions floating about from mouth to mouth, which, after thus floating about, and being added to and changed in the course of many years, at last became crystallized in the form in which they are known to us. For instance, Polycarp says, "Beseeching the all-seeing God not to lead us into temptation, as the Lord hath said, the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak." But such a conjunction of words is nowhere found in our gospels.

Coming now to Irenæus. Irenæus is a man for whom I hav always had a considerable amount of sympathy, because he is the first man who really puts forward the idea of four gospels at all. But I must allow that my faith in him is shaken when I find him giving this as a quotation from John: "John related the words of the Lord concerning the times of the kingdom of God: the days would come when vines would grow, each with ten thousand shoots, and to each shoot ten thousand branches, and to each branch ten thousand twigs, and to each twig ten thousand clusters, and to each cluster ten thousand grapes, and each grape which is crushed will yield twenty-five measures of wine. And when one of the saints will reach after one of these clusters, another will cry, I am a better cluster than it; take me and praise the Lord because of me" (Iren. Hær., v. 33).

I cannot find that in the gospel of John as we hav it to-day. Then when I find that the reasons which are given by this same Irenæus for accepting the four gospels are that there are four corners to the earth, and four spirits, and that Christ sits in the midst of four-faced cherubims, I begin to be still more doubtful about him. I allege, then, that I cannot accept such evidence as this—evidence which is absolutely unsatisfactory, and which we can only regard as the nonsensical ravings of a religious enthusiast.

What Objections to Christianity?

MR. MAIR'S FIFTH LETTER.—CONTINUED.

You call my particular attention to the alleged fact that unfortunately Matthew and Luke "completely destroy all they wished to gain by the story of a miraculous conception of the Virgin Mary and the deific paternity of Jesus, for in giving his genealogy they explicitly make him to be the son of Joseph. If they told the truth in this, their dream and vision stories are not worth a straw. One or the other was certainly untrue. Jesus could not have been the son of both Joseph and the Holy Ghost, and if Matthew and Luke are guilty of falsehood in either case, their testimony is valueless all around." Undoubtedly a single falsehood in the accounts of Matthew and Luke make their testimony dubious and forbid the idea of their inspiration, but before I accept your dictum in the case let me refer to the genealogies they give of Christ. The former says, "Jacob begat Joseph, the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ" (Matt. i, 16). There is nothing here to "explicitly make him to be the son of Joseph," and there is no other chapter in Matthew giving a genealogy. An examination of Luke is equally damaging to your argument. He traces the genealogy from Joseph back to Adam, opening with the words, "Jesus himself began to be about thirty years of age, being, as was supposed, the son of Joseph, which was the son of Heli" (Luke iii, 23). Thus neither of them teach that Christ was the son of Joseph. Matthew records that Joseph was the husband of Mary, but explicitly states that he "knew her not till she had brought forth her first-born son: and he called his name Jesus" who was conceived in her by the power of the Holy Ghost, and Luke preserves the current supposition of the day, having previously recorded the truth as to the miraculous conception of Christ. I presume that you had in your mind an old Infidel quibble founded on an ignorant misconception of the purpose of these genealogies, but forgot its exact purport. If so, it will be a proper objection to discuss hereafter, but is entirely irrelevant to the thesis under discussion.

Considerable space is taken up with an elaboration of the list of alleged crucified saviors. But there is no proof. The greater part of the assertions is made on the authority of the writer of the "Anacalypsis," a privately printed book of absolutely no authority whatever. No acknowledged scholar that I know of would think it any aid to an argument to refer to him. As to Ctesias, I have not his work before me, but he is regarded by scholars as of very little authority, being an exceedingly credulous and careless writer. For my own part I frankly confess that I am not at all convinced that he preserved the verse quoted, for you have adduced no proof. I judge it a mere parody on some Christian hymn. So with the hymn to Prometheus—it is merely an alteration in a word or so of two of Watts' stanzas, as your readers will recognize. Those who implicitly receive Mr. Higgins' statements as final would accept his pronunciamento that "the modern Christian rendition of Prometheus being bound for thirty years to a rock, where vultures preyed daily upon his vitals," is "an impious Christian fraud." I can easily afford to pay no attention to this or the unsupported assertions and conclusions—so far as they have been quoted—of Robert Taylor. To any reader who is curious to pursue the investigation further as to the alleged plagiarism of the gospels from the mythical or partly mythical tradition of Prometheus, I would recommend a perusal of Æschylus' poem. I doubt not that if he accepts your conclusion he can accept the immensely more credible idea that Shelley copied his beautiful "Prometheus Unbound" from the scriptures.

I will, however, linger a moment to note a characteristic perversion of Gibbon, not so much from the intrinsic weight of the sarcasm as from the fame and learning in other matters of the historian. And first I will give him and you the benefit of the quotation, enlarging a little on yours: "How shall we excuse the supine inattention of the pagan and philosophic world to those evidences which were presented by the hand of Omnipotence, not to their reason, but to their senses? This miraculous event, which ought to hav excited the wonder, the curiosity, and the devotion of mankind, passed without notice in an age of history. It happened during the lifetime of Seneca and the elder Pliny, who must have experienced the immediate effects, or received the earliest intelligence of the prodigy. Each of these philosophers, in a laborious work, has recorded all the great phenomena of nature, earthquakes, meteors, comets, and eclipses, which his indefatigable cariosity could collect. Both the one and the other have omitted to mention the greatest phenomenon to which the mortal eye has been witness since the creation of the globe. A distinct chapter of Pliny is devoted to eclipses of an extraordinary nature and unusual duration, but he contents himself with describing the singular defect of light which followed the murder of Cæsar, when, during the greatest part of the year, the orb of the sun appeared pale and without splendor" (Decline and Fall, vol. ii, p. 379).

The fame of authorship and the plaudits of Infidels are but poor and unsatisfying compensation for the falsehood of the man, and the obscure and illiterate Christian may well prize his superior lot when the only charges which an historian of such acumen and elegance as Gibbon can bring against his faith are those founded on palpable untruth and perversions. Instead, however, of criticising myself, I offer as ample refutation of the above quotation the following remarks from Thomas Hartwell Horne, whose introduction is as unanswerable to-day, with all the boasted progress in every department of Infidel science, as it was on the day of its first edition:

"The sentences printed in italics are those in which the skeptical historian has had recourse to those misrepresentations which unhappily pervade too many of his splendid pages. On the passage we remark first, that the eclipse being confined to Judea, its immediate effects could not necessarily have been experienced by Seneca or Pliny, neither of whom could have been on the spot in the reign of Tiberius, when the eclipse took place, nor can it be proved that they had immediate information from all parts of the globe as soon as any extraordinary phenomenon had taken place. Secondly, neither Pliny nor Seneca have left any works that correspond to the historian's pompous description. Seneca does not treat on eclipses at all; in the passage referred to he speaks indeed of earthquakes, but only in a very cursory manner, and does not instance more than four or five, because his object was evidently not to write a history of them, but to investigate their symptoms, causes, and prognostics. The same remark applies to Pliny with respect to earthquakes. They are mentioned only to introduce philosophical observations. The historian, therefore, has but very feeble props to support his assertion. We may reasonably imagine that if Seneca and Pliny have recorded all the great phenomena of nature, they must of course have explored the Grecian and Roman histories, which were immediately open to their inquiries. Now let us try an experiment as to what they have derived from those sources with respect to eclipses. Do they mention the total eclipse of the sun, when the celebrated plague happened at Athens in the first year of the Peloponnesian war? Do they mention the solar eclipses on the day when the foundations of Rome were laid? Do they mention the eclipse foretold by Thales, by which a peace was effected between the Medes and the Lydians? It would be too tedious and useless to ask for many others, which might be mentioned without any fear of our questions being answered in the affirmative. Thirdly, the distinct chapter of Pliny, in which according to the historian's lofty representation, we should expect to find the subject of eclipses exhausted by his full and elaborate detail, consists of only eighteen words, the purport of which is that eclipses of the sun are sometimes of extraordinary duration, such as that which took place on the death of Cæsar, and during the war with Anthony, when the sun appeared pale for nearly a year. Lastly, this miraculous preternatural darkness did not pass without notice. Omitting the supposed attestation of it by Phlegon (a pagan chronologist who wrote during the reign of the emperor Hadrian, and whose testimony is cited by Julius Africanus, a writer of great eminence and probity, who lived at the beginning of the third century, we may remark that there are two other testimonies, not founded on the statements of Phlegon and Thallus, which unequivocally confirm the evangelical history of the darkness at the crucifixion, viz., those of Tertullian and Celsus. In his apology for the Christians, which was addressed to their heathen adversaries, Tertullian expressly says, "At the moment of Christ's death the light departed from the sun, and the land was darkened at noon-day, which wonder is related in your own annals, and is preserved in your archives to this day." If the account of this extraordinary darkness had not been registered, Tertullian would have exposed both himself to the charge of asserting a falsehood (which charge was never brought against him), and also his religion, to the ridicule of his enemies. It is further particularly worthy of remark that the darkness and earthquake at the crucifixion are both explicitly recognized and mentioned as facts by that acute adversary of Christianity, Celsus; who would not have made such an admission if he could have possibly denied them" (Introduction, vol. i, p. 229).

There are other satisfactory reasons for the silence of many profane writers, which I need not adduce here, my purpose being, at present, merely to expose the perversions of Gibbon. It is certainly an unenviable character in a writer who would seek to delude those who implicitly trust in him for information which is beyond their own reach to attain or prove.

[From the New York Sun.]

Edison's Electric Light.

Bright sparks flew out of the smokestack of Edison's machine shop at Menlo Park, N. J., the other evening. The 5½ train brought down from New York a score of capitalists and stock-holders to view the electric light. Messrs. Morgan and Wright of Drexel, Morgan & Co., and the Messrs. Fabbri, were among them. The party climed the stairs leading to the old laboratory, and found the inventor shinning around the apartment, and wearing an old fur cap. His neck was swathed in several yards of old black silk. After a visit to the machine shop, where scores of workmen were bending over their lathes in gaslight, steam power was turned on a nest of electric generators, and they began to churn out streams of electricity.

Mr. Edison returned to the old laboratory, and approached a table fringed with magnetic batteries. An instrument resembling a German wheel of fortune occupied the center of the table. The inventor turned the dial to the right. In an instant eight hundred electric light were aglow within the radius of a mile. Each light cast a pale orange tint upon the snow. The laboratory, the machine shops, and many private dwellings were also illuminated. The glossy beavers, gray mustaches, gold-rimmed spectacles, and ivory-handled umbrellas of the capitalists were brought into bold relief.

Mr. Edison suddenly turned the dial to the left. The eight hundred lights went out, and the orange glow faded from the fields of snow. A few sickly gaslights made the capitalists appear like shadows. The dial was again turned to the right, and the eight hundred lights again flooded the snowy fields with light. It was not a brilliant light. It distressed the eye no more than gas. The subdivision seemed perfect. Each light in the apartment was turned on or off by a thumbscrew, the same as gas. A strap was adjusted to an electric engin so small that it would go into a shoe box, and the same power that made the electric light set in motion two sewing-machines, a pump, and a blower. The exquisit little engin ran as noiselessly as an escapement watch. With its aid the power required to run one light runs a sewing-machine.

Nine generators were in use. The inventor is making a huge generator which he says will furnish electricity for 1,000 or 1,200 lights, under the work of a Powers engin. With this engin an assistant says that he gets forty per cent more speed with the same amount of fuel. The faster the generators revolve, the more electricity, and consequently the more light.

"The light is now perfected," said the inventor, "and I am now awaiting the action of the company."

The capitalists departed on the 6:30 train in the light of the eight hundred lights. On the way to New York one of the stock-holders said: "We are entirely satisfied with the light. It is no stock-jobbing speculation. I don't believe you could buy a share of stock for love or money. We hav already taken measures to introduce the light in New York city. All that is necessary to make a plant in the city is to get an engin and transfer the generators from Menlo Park to some station down town. The trouble is that we are already beset by hungry politicians. Under Mayor Cooper's administration they wanted to tax us twenty cents per lineal foot to lay our mains. In addition to this, they wanted three per cent of our gross receipts after five years, and a pledge to light the city ever afterward at ten per cent above the cost of the light. Considering that the gas companies pay the city literaliy nothing for their privileges, we think these demands refreshingly cool. We don't want to be forced to go to Newark, or Brooklyn, or Philadelphia to introduce the light. We want to make our start on Manhattan Island, and, under Mayor Grace's administration, we are in hopes of receiving a fair consideration. Giv us a decent show, and you will see the light in practical use in New York within a year."

Is Mind Material?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I will commence the discussion of this question by laying down as my first proposition that mind is an immaterial spiritual entity, that it is in fact the "I am that I am," the thinking, reasoning myself; that thought is a volition of the mind, as is walking or speaking a volition of the physical organs; that the will is the executiv, I will say, function of the mind to carry into effect that which the mind has determined to do. I am conscious—if I can know anything of my own existence, my own identity, separate and distinct from every other being in the universe—that I hav the control of my own will, my own thoughts, my own actions, and that alone is what constitutes me a responsible being.

Now, for instance, I am here thinking of this writing, and can in an instant turn my thoughts to any other subject or place by the exercise of my will to do so, from here to New York, San Francisco, London, China, South America, from the north to the south pole, to Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, the Milky Way, or any other point or place that I know of or hav heard of.

I can remember the place of my childhood, and can in my mind place myself there in that very spot, can see the same objects that I saw then and there just as distinctly as I can see this paper upon which I am now writing. All this proves that I hav the control of my own will and thoughts.

My next proposition is that this mind is not the result of the material organization of the brain, but that the brain is an organization through which the mind acts, in connection with the rest of the physical organs, to manifest itself to other intelligences like itself in other similar organizations, which can receive through the organs of sense the signs of thought, and understand thoughts thus communicated to them.

And my third proposition is that force is not an inherent property of matter, and no more susceptible of proof than that force and life are entirely independent of matter and material organization, only as a medium through which mind, the author of or cause of force, the same as thought, can act as stated in the preceding or second proposition.

I know that if I strike a blow with a hammer in my hand, force operates in that act, but I know as well that it is the result of the exercise of my will.

There might be many other propositions stated, but they would all be necessarily involved in the first after all, as the second and third already stated are, and the three now on hand will do to begin with. Others can be brought forward, if necessary, hereafter as well as now.

So I will proceed to giv some of my reasons for the first proposition. And I will say on the start that I must approach the subject from my own standpoint. I know of no way to arrive at correct conclusions but to reason from cause to effect and the analogy of things in nature.

And on this principle, as I find myself here as I am in the world, conscious of my own existence and the surroundings of nature, the question naturally arises, How came this to be? As no effect can be produced without a cause, so far as I can see, there then must hav been a sufficient cause for all I can see of life and force in the universe.

I will begin with myself. I can think, can reason, can understand many things—the causes and effects in the nature of things—but I cannot see my own mind, nor feel it, taste it, or smell it; but I know that I am a mind. But a mystery to myself I cannot comprehend or understand is the why or wherefore or cause of my existence any more than I can of the universe. But am I to deny it because I cannot understand it? So far as I can know anything, I know that my mind is the power that governs every act of my life, and the same is recognized in our fellow-beings. That mind governs matter—and everything we behold around us carries this conviction to our minds in all the business operations, in the mechanical, commercial, political, social, and every relation of life—we understand and therefore conclude that when there is a failure, lack of intellect, of business capacity, was the cause. If we see a train of cars running with almost lightning speed over the rails, we consider it the result of mind-work, thinking in the construction of the engine, the cars, the road, the engineering, and all of the arrangements in connection with the operation—as a demonstration of mind over matter.

Now, then, mind is the result of the organizations and forces that it controls. That is contrary to the rule of cause and effect and the analogy of things. We all know what an effect a sudden surprise, the excitement produced by the fear of some imminent danger, will hav upon the physical organization, producing a fearful rush of blood to the brain, a trembling of the whole system, a complete paralyzation of the power of action, unconsciousness, and sometimes death—all simply the result of the power of the mind over the body, the physical organization of mind over matter.

Now in case of death as the result, has that mind destroyed itself, unintentionally terminated its own existence, committed suicide? If the mind is the result of the material organization of the brain, that is just exactly what it has accomplished. In other words, the cause of the mind's existence, upon which the mind was dependent, and which must of course be superior, has been overpowered by its dependent, and both the mind and the body destroyed together, or the rule of cause and effect hav been reversed, and the effect has turned around and killed the cause and itself too.

JAMES HALE.

Reply to J. King.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: To attain truth is my only purpose. In your issue of December 18th, Mr. King objects to my theory of the materiality of mind in my paper on the "Subtil-Materiality of Mind and Its Individualized Development," in your issue of November 20th, and more particularly because I therein assume the existence of an infinit mind, God, which is also material, and who thus mechanically givs controling laws for the actions of all unthinking, unintelligent matter, as the creativ factor for all phenomena of cosmos.

My paper, I think, fully proves the materiality of all minds, to unbiased reasoners, as mechanical forces, i. e., will-force power acting controlingly upon unintelligent matter; as we know our finite intelligence controls our unthinking bodies and much other matter, which none other than a material mind could effect. That unintelligent matter cannot, of itself, act as if it was intelligent, unless primarily guided in its laws of action by an intelligent will-force; thus to account for nature's coherent works, always acting for an adaptable purpose — matter always pursuing useful and esthetic ways. In other words, unthinking matter, in the absence of a controling intelligence, cannot be conceived as having a discriminating power to act co-operativly (as co-operation is an exclusiv intelligent process) in definit proportions, for a purpose which the varied elements always pursue, to effect all phenomena in cosmos. That, therefore, an infinit intelligence is the only imaginable factor, in the disposition of universal, unthinking matter, as Mr. King sarcastically adds, "must hav a God, else there could be no action in the universe of matter; all would be cold and dead, like our moon."

Mr. King ought to know that because this side of the moon, like the poles of our earth, is snow and ice covered, is no sufficient cause to assume a similar condition for the other side of the moon, as their characteristics hav always been dinimically very different. This side of the moon has always faced our earth in all its rounds, and so the constant attraction of our earth upon this side of the moon, in the process of hardening its crust from a molten mass, elongated it toward the earth, by dinimical calculation about thirty miles, and such elongation is shown in photographs of the moon; and therefore is raised above its encircling atmosphere, as a true sphere, and so is cold and drear. This does not apply to the other side of the moon; and so that side may be teeming with animal and vegetable life for aught that Mr. King or science knows.

With such knowledge only of the condition of this side of the moon, Mr. King draws the baseless conclusion that all sides of the moon are equally situate and equally dead, hence with gloomy forebodings he as unwarrantably and gratuitously suggests "that thousands, yea, millions of worlds throughout the boundless universe may be in the same dead and desolate condition;" to favor his unfortunate hallucinations and so not well-considered pet theory, or prepossessions, that the unfeeling chance potency of matter is adequate for all acts of nature, and "so there is no use for an intelligent God" asking the idle question, "Has God forgotten these unfortunate worlds?" Is not this a gloomy, cheerless, and ungrateful view of nature, simple permission without the slightest foundation in known facts, is merely borrowing trouble and trying to make other minds equally chaotic?

Mr. King says "that all attempts to prove that intelligence governs universal matter must prove a failure," though, I suppose, he admits that all of man's works, though limited, are exclusivly controled by his intelligence, and that such works unintelligent matter could not assume by its own potency. The same rule must apply to universal unintelligent matter, "must hav a God." Mr. King further says, "If matter has the inherent property and potency of producing all phenomena, then a God is superfluous, would hav nothing to do." This if begs the whole question of the origin of the laws and potency of matter; opens the whole question of inherent potency in matter, or its bequeathment by intelligent will force. Can Mr. King imagin that all matter is intelligent, that it should thus coherently, intelligently co-operate for varied purposes, in varied phenomena? for all co-operations are exclusivly intelligent actions, which force matter into all its coherent ways, as finite minds are so known to act limitedly upon matter; or, to be more rational, may we not suppose that some subtil matter only is intelligent, and so controls all unthinking matter into its coherent actions. One or the other is necessay to account for the co-operativ action of the varied elements in the production of all phenomena. The highest intelligent co-operation in nature is in giving laws to matter to combine in definit proportions in perfecting animal organizations suited to attract and develop that subtil entity, cosmic mind-matter, as individual forces, as the only imaginary origin of such wondrous potency in matter, which mind only can bequeath.

We see the potency in matter, but not its origin, except by analogy with the operations of man's mind in constructing far less wondrous machines, in which we know that his mind has given all the potential laws for the actions of his body upon other matter employed in their construction, knowing, too, that such machines could not come into form without his co-operativ mind, as matter, of itself, has no such potencies. Then, as co-operating mind is necessary for man's handiwork with unthinking matter, how much more is a material, co-operating, infinit mind (as a mechanically-operating functional part of material nature) necessary for the grander works of nature in giving all its laws of potentiality? We all know that matter has its potential laws of action, adequate for all that exists; but as such matter is unintelligent, and so is unthinking, its coherent acts cannot be self-acquired, but, as with man's limited control of matter, is necessarily by his co-operating will-force, so must universal, unintelligent matter hav its controling, co-operativ, infinit, will-force power to giv its coherent laws of potentiality.

Now the antagonists to such intelligent origin of all the potential laws of matter, to giv any rational force to their views, must be able to explain how, upon their crude hypothesis of inherent, self-acquired potency, unintelligent and unthinking materials can possibly assume, of themselvs, to co-operate and so act as if they were intelligent; to adjust their varied elements, in needed proportions, and always unvarying for every compound and necessary adaptable condition, in the varying requirements of different periods in each world's growth, suited to each stage of successiv organic needs. Until such adequate explanations are forthcoming from the supporters of inherent self-potentiality of matter, they had better yield to the necessary conviction that a universal, co-operating mind-factor in will-force is the only rational explanation of coherent phenomena throughout the universe, as man, limitedly, is known to perform with matter by his will-force acts. Mind, by invention, and then by will-force acts, being the only primal potential first cause of the direct actions of any and all unintelligent matter everywhere. Such is, self-evidently, the God of nature, as the most subtil-material intelligent part of matter, acting mechanically (matter upon matter) by will-force upon all unintelligent matter, as his unconscious metaphorical body for all impressions and expressions, as our bodies and much other matter, which our senses take cognizance of, are to our minds, and our minds, reciprocally, thus act by will-force upon such unthinking materials as the only assignable cause and effectiv use of unthinking matter.

Mr. King says "matter acts chemically and not mechanically," as I assume. Is not chemical action mechanical action? "One material acting upon another material by physical force or power; by the laws of motion without intelligence or design," in the things thus interacting (vide Webster).

Mr. King says, in effect, "that two infinits cannot occupy one infinit space." If, as I rationally claim (because satisfying all the demands of science) the universe is and always has been occupied by intelligent and non-intelligent materials as coeval and independent forces, I see no way of escaping or refuting such philosophy by any such sophistrv any more than in denying that man's body and mind co-exist in the same organism, mind, in both cases, controling the associate unthinking materials. If, as Mr. King supposes, unthinking matter always and entirely filled space, and so there was no room left for an infinit mind, how, on that hypothesis, could the present solids and liquids of this globe ever hav been immensely expanded in space, and, also, without their contraction leaving a void? The fact is that matter is elastic (not atomic) and capable of expansion and contraction; so that when one section expands another contracts, and vice versa; and, by the latter process, thus expands and etherealizes matter (the same applying in making of all other globes) until space is now mainly occupied by what we call tenuous ether.

In middle of next to last paragraph in Mr. King's paper, he, in defiance of all rules of courtesy, in the lack of argument against my reasoning, or even of appreciation of the subject, rudely indulges in much personal abuse, which only injures himself and his lightly-considered cause, and so will leave any further reply on that point to his reproving conscience.

Liberal Notes from Illinois.

Through the courtesy of the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER I am permitted to address you once more on a subject which claims your most earnest consideration. While my appeal is more directly to the Freethinkers of Illinois, it is a subject of equal importance to every Liberal in this country. From my experience during my travels in the interest of Liberalism I am satisfied that we need a consolidation of our forces for activ work in the interest of Freethought. And the direction of our action should be to the end that every person may hav equal rights before the laws, and that, too, impartially, irrespectiv of their religious or non-religious opinions.

The Christian church is—through its various agencies—busily engaged—insidiously though it may be—in getting laws enacted, both by our state and United States legislatures, that may be used for the abridgment of the rights of those who do not accept or believe in their superstitious dogmas. And it is high time that we awoke to the dangers that are surrounding us, from laws being enacted, under the guise of Christian legislation. You, my readers, who are readers of this paper and other Liberal papers, are conversant with this thing, and need not that I should enumerate the various ways by which the church is trying to encroach on our rights as free citizens of this country. And it is imperativly necessary that we become united for the preservation of our rights as Americans. In union there is strength. We are not weak from lack of numbers, but we are weak from a lack of unanimity. I am satisfied that there are more than one hundred thousand adult professed Liberals and Freethinkers in the state of Illinois; and not one in a thousand of them belong to any activ, working Liberal organization, and not one in ten of them take any Liberal papers. This ought not to be so. We should unite our forces for self-defense, and be prepared to ward off any approaching danger. "Forewarned is forearmed," and by uniting our forces in time we may ward off further encroachments and remove those that threaten us.

The National Liberal League givs us a platform of principles on which we may all unite. No man or woman in this country who is willing to accord to everybody else the same political, religious, and civil rights that they desire for themselvs can find anything to object to in the declaration of rights put forth by the National Liberal League. The League is comparativly a young organization. Its growth has been gradual but vigorous from year to year since its organization. In its every action thus far it has shown its readiness to strike for the right against the wrong.

It is the object of the League to organize state, county, and local auxiliary Leagues all over this country. Some of the states are already thus organized. We of Illinois are in the background in this respect. But, as I hav said before, this is not from a want of numbers.

Now, as the member of the Executiv Committee for the state of Illinois, I want, as soon as it is possible to do so, to organize a state League in this state. And I would like to hav it composed of members from every part of the state of Illinois. Now, my friend Liberals, please re-read my article on this subject in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 25th, and then send me a dollar and become a life member of the Illinois State Liberal League. I hav placed the membership fee for all those who will join me in becoming charter members of the Illinois State League at one dollar. The League may, after a permanent organization is effected, deem it advisable to place the joining fee at a larger sum. I believe the fee for joining the Iowa State League is five dollars.

But I hav placed a life-membership fee to those who will join as charter members at one dollar, in the hope of getting a good large membership to start with. And I expect by that means to get funds sufficient to pay the expenses of the convention that it will be necessary to call in order to perfect the organization. I shall giv notice of the convention just as soon as enough persons wishing to become members hav sent in their names to make it safe for me to call the meeting to complete the organization.

Now I hope that every true Liberal in the state of Illinois will giv this matter a candid consideration, and not hang back, thinking somebody else is the one I am writing to. My brother and sister Liberals of the state of Illinois, I mean you all, by sending your joining fee to me you will secure your membership whether you are able to be present at the convention or not. But I hope that all who possibly can will be there. Let me hear from you! I am in earnest in this matter. Thus far since my appointment on the Executiv Committee I hav worked comparativly alone in this state in the League interest. I need your help and co-operation. Will you giv them to me?

Or will you withhold your support, and by so doing compel me to abandon the work and leave the field? The manner in which you respond to this call will be your answer.

I would like to be able to call the convention for the organization of the state League as soon as March or April.

We can hav a rally that will tell for Liberalism in this state. Now, friends, this cause is yours as well as mine, and its success or failure will rest with you. So again I say, Let me hear from you. Address me at St. Johns, Perry county, Ill., P. O. box 89.

Dec. 29, 1880. F. F. FOLLETT.

P. S.—I hav received no money to report for during the month of December. I take it for granted you hav been too much occupied with the holidays to be mindful of me and the work I am doing for the Liberal cause. Well, I hav weathered the storm so far, and for a few days I hav fallen into the hands of a few good Liberal friends in St. Johns and Duquoin.

The Igneous Theory vs. the Hollow Globe.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of November 27th I find an article purporting to come from the Popular Science Monthly, treating upon the future of the universe, asking the following questions: Is the heat of the sun maintained? How long has it lasted? Are there any signs of increase or diminution?

The popular idea that the sun is a body of light and heat to the utmost bounds of its solar system, and is fed by planets and comets falling in as fuel, is not maintained by any explained demonstrated facts, neither can it be. No man possessing original progressiv thought can accept the unnatural and inconsistent igneous theory gotten up by the elder Herschel, and more fully elaborated by Laplace, the French astronomer. Had this theory first been introduced by ordinary men in humble life, it would hav been ignored as a vain delusion unworthy of rational minds, yet there are a few would-be leaders in the Spiritual ranks whose astronomical and geological ideas are illuminated by the scintillations coming from the same spirits who are now passing through the ignorant teachings they advocated while on earth.

These sagacious expounders of the Laplace theory inform us that our earth, with all the sun's system, was at different times or periods peeled off from the sun's surface and thrown out into space, and our earth coiled itself up, and by the law of condensation became so intensely heated that the materials of which it was composed were in a state of fusion. Prof. Hitchcock says the fusion was ten degrees hotter than white heat. Now comes the wonderful climax of inconsistency. These wisacres declare that in this heated condition the outside matter cooled off and formed a crust of some forty miles in thickness around the remainder of this intensely heated mass of seven thousand nine hundred and twenty miles in diameter.

I appeal to the intelligent, scientific readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to inform me if they are acquainted with any substance composing our earth which could come within one hundred miles of a body of matter eight thousand miles in diameter, heated ten degrees hotter than white heat, without being melted? Again, how is it possible that these learned geologists can build a crust forty miles in thickness down on this hell-hot mass and hav it remain intact so people can exist upon its surface? I say, without fear of successful contradiction, that a crust the size of our earth's crust never has and never can be formed which would surround such a body of heat but what within twelve hours after it was placed there the water in the ocean would boil and pancakes could be fried on the outside of its crust. If the crust were made of steel, such a fire would soon render it so hot that no life could exist upon its surface while the fire was raging inside. Suppose a coal stove, three or four feet in diameter, were filled inside with red-hot coal, and never allowed to cool, when would the outside of the stove cool off? Never until the fire inside was extinguished.

Again, suppose a red-hot ball, ten feet in diameter, were thrown out into space to cool off, where would be the last heat, on the inside or outside of the ball? It is a well-known fact that heat radiates, and I know of no materials composing our earth which can stop its radiation as long as the fire is maintained.

I would inquire of the fire theory expounders if they will, in the plenitude of their wisdom, inform me why it is so cold if the sun has existed, as they say, millions of years before the earth was peeled off from her outside surface, and all this time was sending into space the same amount of light and heat as since. Why is it, if the sun is so intensely hot, that the nearer you approach it the colder it grows, and in going out five miles from the earth toward the sun perpetual snow is found? The balloonists inform us that in six or seven miles from earth not only is it cold but total darkness is all around. Why is it so much colder in December than in June, the sun being about the same distance from the earth, also on the 5th of February and the 5th of August it is the same distance.

A certain scientist whom I wot of, and who thinks that what he does not know is not worth knowing, informs us in his geological works that there was a time when many more volcanoes were in existence than at the present time, but which hav become extinct by being contiguous to the sea-shore, the water of the ocean running into the crater and extinguishing the fire. Think of it, my gentle reader, cold water from the ocean running into the crater which extends into an intensely heated mass of liquid fire, seven thousand nine hundred and twenty miles in diameter. Imagin the terrible explosion which would instantly occur at the introduction of a large body of cold water to this intensely heated matter within the crust of our earth. It would fling all the materials of our earth beyond the boundaries of Jupiter.

Another modern light in astronomy informs us that our moon and the planet Mars are dead and Jupiter is dying. He also says the moon was once inhabited, but at present there is no life there. He thinks the moon much older than the earth, and yet the igneous expounders say it is a child of this planet. The moon, Mars, and Jupiter in any day never appeared fuller of life and health than at present.

Mr. Editor, in my opinion there is as much if not more ignorance manifested in geology as in theology. I would earnestly advise all who believe in the igneous theory to send two dollars to my address and purchase my book entitled "The Hollow Globe." It completely annihilates that foolish idea, and givs rational views concerning volcanoes, earthquakes, and their necessary uses.

Yours for all truth, M. L. SHERMAN, M. D.

Obituary.

Departed for the "Land of the Hereafter," on Dec. 7, 1880, after a sojourn of nearly 92 years, Reuben Billings, who was born at Longmeadow, Mass., Feb. 13, 1789. His father, Thaddeus Billings, was once a preacher among the Shakers at Enfield, Conn. Married, April 30, 1809, to Sally Denis, of Delhi, N. Y. Moved to Pompey, N. Y., in June, 1812, where he resided at the time of his death, at which time he was the oldest man in the township. His wife (my mother) was three years his senior. Born, Feb. 22, 1786, and died, Jan. 6, 1875. Two children still survive him, an aged sister of 70 years and the writer, aged 54 years. In 1832, Reuben Billings united with the M. E. church, at Fabius, N. Y., and was in fellowship with that denomination for seven years, but being misused and stigmatized as a "nigger Abolitionist," he quietly withdrew from that proslavery denomination and ever after his own mind was his church. Being quite Radical in his views he was often denounced and traduced by canting hypocrit or self-styled Christians. The teaching and examples of Jesus Christ, in the main, he generally approved of, believing him as tending toward the type of a perfect man, rather than an incarnate God. Remarks were made at his funeral, on the 10th ult., by Major Carpenter, a Liberal Spiritualist, who gave us his views on the great "problem of life," presenting to us the emanation theory and referring to events connected with the life of the deceased.

At the grave appropriate remarks were made when we deposited the mortal remains of my father near the ashes of an angel beloved mother. Here is where all knowledge seems to end, and where faith steps in with more or less assurance to tell our final destiny, but

> From whence we came, and whither we go
> Is more than mortal man can know.

Paine Not Junius.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Relativ to the claim set up that Paine is the author of the letters of Junius, recently published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, allow me to suggest against it that similarity of style is no evidence. Junius borrowed his from Bolingbroke; and no doubt Paine had read Junius, and his style was suggested. But Paine blazes on you like a sun of calcium light, ever bright as clearest noonday, with occasional bursts a thousand times hotter and lighter; whereas Junius is a steady, shining orb. But this against the claim most of all: Paine declares he never published a syllable in England, and also says that "this great cause [the American rebellion] first made him an author." Why should he hav so asserted if it was false? Of all living souls, Paine was the most obstinately truthful and honest.

Let me add that often as I hav read his "Crisis" and "Rights of Man," I never take them up without being astounded at the intellectual power of the writer. Just imagin the situation: Three million colonists, all loyal to the crown, all carefully educated from cradlehood into servil obedience to kings, lords, pastors, and masters, armed merely in self-defense against the ravishments, assaults, etc., of the Lord's anointed; nearly all the rich and socially eminent ready, like spaniels, to caress the whipping hands—not the first whisper of separation from the mother tyrant. Now, with soul and mind full of the situation, begin and read "Crisis No. 1," and on. You will then begin to hav a just conception of who and what Thomas Paine really was, and as an American to appreciate what you—yes, you yourself—may owe to his memory. CLARKE IRVINE.

Constructiv Liberalism.

LESSON II.

THESIS.

THE COSMOS is conceived of as held together by general laws. The knowledge of those laws is the best and greatest acquisition of the human race. Upon them rests science, or all we can know; our practical life, or all we can do; and our art and emotional life, or all we can feel.

TEXTS.

(To be learned by heart.)

Man, the minister and interpreter of Nature, understands of the order of Nature, either in the world of matter or of the mind, only so much as he has observed; nor more does he know, or is he able to know.—Bacon's Novum Organum.

For Nature is not conquered except by obedience—Ibid.

Nature is made better by no mean,
But nature makes that mean; so o'er that art
Which you say adds to Nature is an art
That Nature makes. You see, sweet maid, we marry
A gentler scion to a wilder stock,
And make conceive a bark of baser kind
By bud of nobler race. This is an art
Which does mend Nature, change it rather, but
The art itself is Nature. —Shakspere (Winter's Tale).

COMMENTARY I.

From Comte's Positiv Catechism (Introduction).

Practically the faith of man never had but one object if you press to the root of the matter. This was to form a conception of the order under which man livs, with the view of determining our relation generally to that order. Man might ascribe that order to fictitious [theological] causes, or he might study its real [scientific] laws; in either case his object was to estimate that order which was independent of him, with the view of submitting to it better or of attaining a greater power of modifying it. Every system of religious doctrins necessarily rests on some explanation, no matter what, of THE WORLD and of MAN—the twofold object at all times of our feelings, thoughts, and actions.

COMMENTARY II.

From Harriet Martineau's Autobiography, Vol. i, pp. 84. 85.

I had fairly laid hold of the conception of general laws. , . My laboring brain and beating heart grew quiet, and something more like peace than I had ever yet known settled down upon my anxious mind. . . From the time when I became convinced of the certainty of the action of laws, of the true importance of good influences and good habits, of the firmness, in short, of the ground I was treading, and of the security of the results which I should take the right means to ascertain, a new vigor pervaded my whole life, a new light spread through my mind, and I began to experience a steady growth in self-command, courage, and consequent integrity and disinterestedness. . . If I hav had the blessing of any available strength under sorrow, perplexity, sickness, and toil, during a life which has been anything but easy, it is owing to my repose upon eternal and irreversible laws, working in every department of the universe [the world], without any interference from any random will, human or divine."

THE LESSON.

In our last lesson we found that Science in its higher discoveries and integration had practically given us a new cosmology, i. e., a new Heaven and a new Earth. The old firmament and universe, with their creating Gods and Heaven, hav been swept away. In their stead Science reveals to us THE COSMOS, the beautiful order, or ornament, as the Greek word means. The Unknowable Infinit is conceived of as the boundless ocean in which this knowable sun and star world of man floats.

Now what are the warp and woof of this Cosmos? What holds it together and makes it one to us? In a word, ITS LAWS. Our sensations of what we call matter are the woof, that is, the phenomena of the outer world, which we touch, see, hear, smell, and taste, or, in a word, sense.

The warp by which we construe and connect together the whole cosmos are the Laws by which we arrange its phenomena, i. e., things as they appear to us, according to their observed unvarying relations of succession and resemblance. The knowledge of these relations, or laws, as we call them, givs to man the invaluable power of foreseeing or prevising some phenomena from others to an extent wonderful and extremely useful.

This is wonderful because it explains how and when phenomena occur, so that we may say that we understand them, and are able to annex them to ourselvs as a part of our own thoughts and senses.

It is useful because by this knowledge of how phenomena occur we are able to foresee them, to provide against them, or to change or modify them to our own uses and for our own benefit. This no other being but Man can do, and this makes him the Lord of the Cosmos. The Laws of Nature, i. e., of the Cosmos, are his tools by which he can serve and save himself and his race and carve out his own fate.

But this, Man can do only by obeying and using these self-same laws. This we are taught by two memorable passages of the two Masters of English philosophy and poetry given above as our texts.

In that way Man shares with "great creating nature" her own powers, and is a part of herself to perfect her for man, and to make the cosmos his home.

There may be nothing new in these re-statements, but these laws and this power of modifying phenomena by them are great affirmations of mind and feeling, and are new in the view that they take the place entirely of the old theological notions of a Will and special Providence as the governor and administrator of the world. They are new and unspeakably important as the foundation of the new Liberal, Positiv, Scientific, General faith of Mankind, which shall bear as its fruit new societies, laws, moralities, and hopes for all mankind. But of that hereafter.

There are several consequences of this discovery and reign of previsable and modifiable Laws which are inevitable, but which some people like to deny. Let us look at some of them.

1. The displacement of the theological or will theories of the world makes it useless to ask the why of anything. We can know nothing of causes either first or final. All arguments from design or purposes in Nature are simply instances of our own Anthropomorphism, and are childish fancies to be recovered from as we recover from the measles and chicken-pox. The Hindoo Skeptic in our first lesson left nothing further to be said on that subject.

Mankind set out intentionally to find the why, and in their vain search for that they hav found the laws which place the how in their hands as the key to the Cosmos.

The Liberal, that is, the Liber, the freedman, that is, the man who has become emancipated from the slavery of theology, always asks for the how and leaves the why to the savages or their successors, who suppose that they understand the Infinit, and the final causes of the world about them.

2. But we may be asked does Science giv no unity whatever to the Cosmos. Certainly. The unity of Man's world, which is the Cosmos, is Man himself. Man is the nominativ case in all scientific parsing of existence. He is the subject, and a subjectiv unity or synthesis is the only positiv one, to man, of the world as he can understand it; and the world exists, as to him, only as he understands it. Any objectiv synthesis, that is, any absolute explanation of the world outside of man, is impossible to him until he understands the Infinit and settles that, which is childish to talk about. Man must ever remain the center of his own world, and only by a figure of speech can he regard it as objectiv, that is, as external and foreign to himself, for the purpose of scientific investigation. Science is a boomerang; it goes out to hit and conquer the world as if hostil to man and then returns; or like a retriever it lays its conquests at man's feet and finds no value for them except in his uses. Man is his own, and only, final cause to all the world he can know.

Thus Science has two halves. 1. Objectiv, or the world of phenomena and their laws considered as if independent of man.

2. Subjectiv, or the same phenomena and their laws considered in relation to man, and leading up to and ministering to his institutions, life, etc. These two halves must ever be used as the complements of each other. When we go to a place do we see everything we pass by the way? No, we see only one-half. The other half we see when we return; and then we bring home all we can of knowledge, gain, or goods for our own use. Philosophers are constantly overlooking the relation of these two halves. For instance, Mr. Herbert Spencer has given us little more than his objectiv half of "a synthetic philosophy" as if the whole. We cherish the hope that he may liv long enough to discover that he is a man and not merely a thinking machine. The objectiv must find its value and solution in the subjectiv.

3. There are two other scientific terms that as students of constructiv Liberalism you must become familiar with, viz., Static and Dynamic.

The order or law that is observed in any class of phenomena at rest, or as they stand, is called the static law—from the latin sto, I stand; but the order that is observed in the variation and changes of phenomena is called a dynamic law, from the Greek dynamis, force or power. Statics treat of things at rest; dynamics of forces and things in motion or change. Thus in anatomy we hav the statics, and in physiology the dynamics, of the human system. And in sociology the laws and customs are the statics or solidarity of society at a given time. But the history and successiv changes of the society would giv its dynamics or continuity of action. Here again our modern philosophers are generally in fault. They giv us only what they see, and found theories of reform or change only on solidarity. This vitiates most of the communistic and socialistic schemes of reform which are presented, and which charm Liberals for a time. The correctiv is to remember that society is the dynamic growth of a complex organism, and that it must be studied historically and in continuity. It can only be wisely and usefully reformed by modifying its phenomena according to the laws of its progress. For instance, this is the trouble with the beautiful and inspiring speculations of Fourier, who seemed to think that society could be manipulated into harmony, like so much music. He was evidently as ignorant of the terrible powers of human nature and of its collectiv history as though he had come to the earth as an angel from another planet.

4. Two other terms are necessary to secure your outfit in Liberalism, viz., theory, as contrasted with hypothesis.

Theory (from the Greek theoro, I see) means to see clearly, so as to hav the correct verifiable law of phenomena. The theory is really the scientific law, and is used in that sense in scientific parlance. As the theory or law of gravitation. But more commonly the word is used to imply that although the theory or law may be abstractly true, it is nevertheless impractical and visionary, and such as can only end in speculation.

Hypothesis (from the Greek upo, under, and tithemi, I place) is a theory or law which is provisionally assumed, i. e., placed under phenomena in order to help us find the true law by giving us the motiv and opportunity of making tests to discern it. Hypotheses are thus the scaffoldings of the science, or the wooden semi-circular heads over which its arches are built and rest until the keystone can be found and put in so as to hold it firmly evermore.

Hypotheses are extremely useful in all branches of science if they are not taken as laws or theories.

A working hypothesis is often invaluable, but must not pass for more. For instance, in the grand science of the Cosmos, astronomy, we hav a grand hypothesis as to the origin of the solar system, commonly but wrongfully called the nebular theory. It is not yet a theory at all in any scientfic sense. Nor is it likely to became one for many ages. Solar systems are of such slow growth that though we get their statics readily we hav not sufficient observation to giv us their dynamics. We hav their observed order, but their genesis is buried in the depths of time and space. Another hypothesis on the same subject is presented by Prof. Proctor in his "Other Worlds than Ours," known as the aggregation hypothesis. It is to the effect that the sun and planets hav been aggregated from cometary and meteoric matter, collecting as we know it does now, and that they are still young and growing, and hopeful for an eternity to come.

This latter hypothesis seems much more plausible than the former, which is purely speculativ. Yet this nebular "theory" is presented in school books and popular lectures as if it were really verified science. Mr. Herbert Spencer has adopted it as a foundation for his evolution philosophy, and closes his "First Principles" with the most doleful chapter ever written, describing minutely the death and funeral of our solar system. Nothing can be more unscientific than this imaginativ use of unverified hypotheses. It was in this sense that Newton said, Hypotheses non fingo, "I do not merely fashion hypotheses." Would that his followers in astronomy and philosophy would follow his example.

You need not be much bothered with further technical terms if you will treasure up the affirmativ ones above given, viz., the World, the Infinit, the Cosmos, the Laws, objectiv and subjectiv, static and dynamic, and lastly theory and hypothesis. Let these words be as familiar as a b c and you will hav something to tie to for the future. Let me in that view also ask you to become well acquainted with that multum in parvo, THE EPITOME of the Positiv Philosophy and religion, published by the SOCIETY OF HUMANITY in this city. What has been said will enable you to master the chart in that little work, and whoever does so will become founded in Liberalism as upon a rock. *

The reign of Law instead of the reign of Will was ushered in by the Copernican system at about 1600. Since then the immense progress of the human intellect in thought and knowledge has eclipsed all that it had hitherto acquired in the countless years or ages of its existence. Civilized and educated people are quite different beings in all except physical form from what the majority of the human race were before that date. They inhabit a different world and are becoming adapted to a new heaven and earth.

The physical, material, and practical life of man has also moved forward with equal pace. The dreams of Bacon hav been fully realized. The age of printing passed into the age of steam, and the age of electricity is upon us. The bolt of Jove has become a tool in the hands of man—the unbound, defiant Prometheus.

One other consideration will bring us to what may be a great treat to you all, a translation from Faust, with which this lesson must close.

We hav just observed what the reign of law has done for the two H's, the Head and Hand of man. But it is said that his intellectual and practical progress has been gained at the expense of the third H, his Heart. This is not so. The assertion and claim is made by those who hav failed to get their eyes fully opened to the new morning light.

Sympathy with and love for the WORLD and MAN hav enlarged the human heart beyond all former conceptions of emotion. Man has learned to feel and express his unity with nature as his mother, and with his fellow-men as his brothers.

The drift of modern poetry and painting could not be understood by a man who lived prior to 1600. What could he make out of modern landscape painting or the poems of Shelley, Byron, and Goethe? This emotional and poetical value of the Cosmos is the point to which our subject to-day directs your attention. This sympathy with nature is a new inspiration. The sense of repose upon law enables Man to fall back upon Nature as his best, enduring, and impartial friend. This is expressed in the remarkable passage from Harriet Martineau given above with our texts. But more than this; man has by natural selection become adapted to his Cosmos, so that it seems as if it had been made for him, instead of he from or for it. He finds in it, therefore, by adaptation, sympathy, and finally, by symbolizing, the support and echo of his own life, designs, thoughts, and feelings—as in Bryant's Thanatopsis. When, therefore, man is crushed and heartbroken by crime, remorse, or misfortune; too far gone, it may be, to claim or obtain the forgivness of his fellows, he finds his heart medicin and nurse in nature. His renewal becomes a part of her process, impartial, slow but sure. The man who is touched by nature need never be lost. This cosmic regenerativ power of nature over the human heart is the turning point in Goethe's Faust.

Faust is beyond doubt a genuin part of our modern Bible. It is the "Divine Comedy" of Liberalism, the book we must study, refer to, and quote till it becomes as familiar as household words. It must become with Shakspere a common bond of thought and feeling to the Liberal world. Both Parts of it must be read together, so as to present the whole plan to the mind thoroughly, though some of the Second Part may not be understood. The salvation of a man in the actual power of the devil, overwhelmed with the most terrible sins and crimes, beyond all human feeling or sympathy, without any savior, forgivness, or divine aid—that is the story and triumph of the Second Part of Faust. How it is done by human strength, usefulness, and love only, you may see in the last act—the crown of modern poetry. But the first step toward that victory is the charm of Nature alone over the desperate heart with which the Second Part of the Drama opens.

Why has the following literal, linear translation been written out instead of asking you to read it in Bayard Taylor's metrical translation? Because it is the sense rather than the poetry that you are to grasp; but read his translation too, and by all means the original. The man who can giv Goethe's sense and poetry in English has not been, and probably never will be, born.

The healing and awakening of Faust out of sin, shame, and misery unspeakable by the influences of Nature, figured as elves in their play; the command and resolve "to strive ever forward to the highest life;" all this, told in poetry that fairly sings in the heart as you read it, introduces the story of the salvation of Man under the new faith and without any theology whatever.

THE AWAKENING OF FAUST.

SCENE—A pleasant landscape in spring at the approach of evening twilight.

ARIEL and his Fairies (as spirits and influences of Nature) hover around as elfish forms.

FAUST is seen reclining on a flowery bank, weary, restless, and longing for sleep.

ARIEL, accompanied by tones of Æolian Harps, addresses his elves as to their duties to the suffering Faust.

When the Spring's return serene
Showers blossoms over all;
When the fields with blessings green
Greet Earth's children with their call;
Then the might of elfish bands
Flies to help where'er it can;
Good or bad, with kindly hands,
Soothe will they Misfortune's man.

Ye who circling flit round his head,
Act well the part of noble Elves!
Calm the grim conflict in his heart;
Withdraw the burning arrows of remorse;
Cleanse his inner self from its fearful past.

Four are your vigils in the nightly watch;
Delay not to fill them all as his friends.
First, pillow his head on the coolest turf,
Then bathe him well in dew from Lethe's flood;
Soon will his crampen'd limbs extend
When restful sleep givs strength to meet the day;
Thus fulfil the Elves' fairest duty,
Restore him whole to the holy light!

CHORUS OF ELVES.

(In solo, duet, then many alternating.)

Serenade: (The twilight vigil.)

When the air warmly breathes
O'er the green encircled plain,
A misty veil, an incense sweet,
Drops the Twilight gently down;
Whisper then the sweetest peace,
Rock his heart in childhood's play,
And o'er the eyes of the weary
Draw to the portals of the day,

Notturno: (The night vigil.)

Now sinks the night, inclosing all;
Eaeh star leads forth his brother star;
The greater lights and starlets small
Twinkle near and glance afar;
Twinkle here in lakes reflected,
Glance above in clearer night;
While, crowning gifts of deepest rest,
Rules the Moon in glory bright.

Matutino: (The early morning vigil.)

Quenched at last are weary hours,
Vanished alike are pain and joy.
Know before, thou wilt recover
Trust anew the break of day.
The vales look green, the hills swell high,
Gathered in their shade of morn;
While in waves of silver drifting
On to the harvest, rolls the corn.

Reville: (The waking vigil.)

Wish on wish to fairly earn
Gaze toward the Glory there!
Lighter now are slumber's chains,
Sleep is but shell—cast it forth.
Without delay awake, awake thy heart.
Though halts the crowd in mazes lost,
His All the Noble-one can gain
Who quickly sees and promptly grasps.

ARIEL to his Elves,

(While sublime sounds announce the rising sun, heard only by the spirits.)

Hark! Listen to the hours' storm
Sounding loud to spirits-hearing.
See, the newborn day has come;
The gates of rock jarring crash,
Phebus's wheels rolling dash;
What din of noise brings the light!
The beat of rays, the clarion cries,
Blind the eye, the ear astound;
The unheard is heard but by itself.
Now escape, each into his blossom-bell,
Deeper and deeper there to dwell,
Or in the rocky cleft beneath the leaf,
Stricken by this din, you will be deaf!

FAUST (slowly awaking):

The pulse of life beats now with fresher force
To greet this mild, ethereal dawn;
Thou too, O Earth, hast outstood this night,
And breathest new-created at my feet.
Hast so soon begun to throw thy joy around me?
Art waking and moving that mighty command—
Strive ever forward to the highest life.

The world below still lies in twilight's glow,
The groves echo with life a thousandfold;
Through vale to vale draws the morning mist;
While in the depths sinks the heavenly light;
Each twig and branch sprouts with life anew
In the moistened dell where they lowly slept.
Each tint and hue from its background starts,
Each flower and leaf drops its trembling pearls—
A paradise grows real within my eye.

Upward gaze! The mountains' grand peaks
Announce before the solemnest hours;
They dare the first to enjoy the eternal light
Which later bends its course down to us;
Now to the Alps' green slanting meadows
A newer glow and light is lavished,
As step by step it downward gains.
It strikes me now! blinded soon, alas!
I turn away with eyes pierced with pain!

So is it, too, when a cherished hope,
We think attained to our highest wish,
Finds fulfilment's gates open to its wing.
So if there breaks from eternal bars
A flood of glory, we stand overwhelmed.
Our torches of life would we light again?
A sea of flame surrounds us—what a fire!
Is it love, is it hate, that glowing conquers?
Alternating, with might, pain, or joy?

So then we gladly turn to Earth again,
To hide ourselvs in childhoods veil.

Behind me, then, the sun must stand;
The cataract roaring between the crags
I'll gaze upon with rapture ever growing.
From fall to fall it drops in thousand,
Then other thousand, streamlets breaking;
While floats aloft spray o'er spray.
How grandly springing o'er this storm
Arches the constant change of the varied bow—
Now clearly marked, now shading into air,
As it wafts away its cool and misty shower.
That mirrors, pictures, all our human toil,
Follow the thought—wouldst grasp it clearly—
Only in a colored reflection hav we life at all!

Beecher's "Excrescences" of Christianity.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: H. W. Beecher says that Ingersoll in his lectures lays hold of the "excrescences" of Christianity, and so condemns the whole system. He goes on to say, "What if a physician should point to the lepers, the blind, the cripples, the imbecils, and then deplore the condition of the human race because of a small percentage of unfortunates!"

You, Mr. Beecher, hav read history, and full well you know that from the time Christianity got the upper hand in power more than a thousand years of mental darkness settled over Europe, and distinguished that time as the "dark ages." Full well you know that during these "dark ages," when Christianity was paramount, the world abounded in cruelty, ignorance, war, and degradation unprecedented. You know that the Crusades and other cruel wars were Christian. You know the persecution for opinion, culminating in such as the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, the Inquisition, and centuries of horrors, were Christian misdeeds illustrativ of a system, and not mere "excrescences." Such as yourself in those days, when they did not actually burn or slay or imprison, yet concurred and raised not a little finger as protest, were sharers in the guilt. You, Mr. Beecher, are aware that Christianity is only modified by compulsion of modern society, and that essentially she is the same now as ever. The imprisonment of Lant, Heywood, Bennett, Besant, Bradlaugh, and such, are the modern persecutions of the church, who does not spill their biood because society forbids. You concurred in their imprisonment, and had their lives been taken you would hav consented thereto. These misdeeds are not to be excused as "excrescences;" they are part and parcel of a system called Christianity, of which system you are a prominent exponent and apologist.

Your argue that the race of man should not be judged by its small percentage of blind and lepers and cripples. The mentally and morally blind and the lepers of to-day are those who cannot or will not see and appreciate the value of human liberty, and the progress of mankind from degradation and want to a better condition. Your "bread-and-water-good-enough-for-the-working-man" is in strict accordance with the teachings of Christianity, past and present. High intellectual attainment, so called, that aims at the elevation of a select few at the expense and degradation of the many is but a maniac's effort—is leprosy, blindness, and mental infirmity past excuse or apology; and not even a preacher can make us see differently. The Use of Reason.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: We find reason appropriated to instinct and producing results corresponding with "intuition when appropriated to reason," which we call wisdom coming down from above, under the law of adaptation, to teach men and animals to understand the difference between good and evil; otherwise animals would be aliens to man universally, as the wild beasts of the forest are.

"Mind and Matter," "What Is Thought?" etc., by E. A. Chapman and kindred spirits, with their negativs in matter, are doing much to expand the human intellect and reconcile man to infinit wisdom, power, and goodness, through this intuitiv faculty and the heralding of Freethought by THE TRUTH SEEKER. Yours truly, CHAS. PARRY.

No Annihilation.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: No recognization of anything in nature after dissolution and transmutation takes place.

I make this statement as being true, and defy any one to produce anything in nature to the contrary. Then, if this be true, how can we recognize each other after death. A. ERWIN.

Centralization of Wealth and Power.

Man is aggressiv. He loves wealth and power. He has shown a fondness for acquiring more than his due share of what has been regarded as valuable, even to the inconvenience and suffering of his fellows, and he has exhibited a decided partiality for making his will paramount, and his fellows about him subservient to his rule.

In the primitiv condition of man love of power took precedence over love of wealth. Love of wealth has grown with civilization. In the infancy of the race man's aggressiv disposition led him in the direction of personal conquests, and this for securing the gratification of his passions, and the bringing of his weaker companions into submission to his will. These led to violent conflicts and bloody encounters.

These contests for power were first of an individual character, then families became involved in them, and then tribes. The same spirit which caused a muscular individual to seek to rule other individual, caused the strong tribes to bring weaker tribes into subjection. To obtain this power and to crush the rights of others countless bloody deeds hav been performed, and unhappiness and misery hav been spread over the face of the earth. This desire for power has led to the most sanguinary wars, the most cruel slaughters, to carnage, wretchedness, and woe.

"Man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn."

This thirst for power and dominion actuated nearly all the ancient nations which history describes. The Aryan race which occupied Central Asia exhibited this aggressiv spirit in prehistoric days. They subjected surrounding nations and tribes to their rule, and when they spread over Europe their power was severely felt by all who came in contact with them. The Persians shed the blood of thousands to establish their rule over other nations and tribes. The Hindoos did their share. The Scythians were exceedingly warlike and aggressiv. The Chaldeans and Assyrians struggled through blood and carnage for power. The Egyptians waged many devastating wars to extend their rule. The Grecians kept up the bloody struggle for centuries and for a considerable period were the masters of the world. The Romans succeeded them, and by causing rivers of blood to flow many nations were made to bow to their imperious will. The Teutons, the Franks, the Gauls, the Britons, etc., hav for centuries exhibited the same bloody efforts to extend their power over their fellow-men.

With love of power, love of wealth has kept steady pace. Gold, silver, diamonds, pearls, precious stones, and numerous works of art and the results of skilful handicraft hav been seized in hundreds of instances by victorious armies and heavy tribute has been laid upon conquered nations. To acquire the greatest amount of gold, to horde up the treasures of the earth, has been the rage of tyrants and misers.

Within the various nations the precious treasures hav not only been madly sought for, but the common soil, the natural inheritance of all, has been seized and made private property. Sometimes the land has been engrossed by the state and the king, but oftener it has been claimed as the property of chiefs, barons, dukes, lords, counts, etc., who had the power to seize it and to enforce their claims. In this way the soil, to which every man has an equal natural right, has for centuries been grasped in the hands of a few who were able to deprive their fellow-beings of their just and natural rights and render them poor, dependent serfs, peasants, and slaves. Had it been possible for men to hav seized the water on the earth, and the air which surrounds it, and made them private property, hording them for their own aggrandizment and depriving their fellow-beings almost of the right to drink and to breathe, there is little doubt but what it would hav been done. Fortunately these natural elements are too fluid, too elastic, too extensiv, too difficult to monopolize, to admit of their being taken from the masses, otherwise the poor to-day could quench their thirst by nature's beverage and breathe the pure air of heaven only by paying the lords and rulers for the privilege of doing so.

This land monopoly, the ability of the few to rob the many of ownership in the soil, has worked incalculable mischief in nearly all the countries on the globe. This is what is making serious trouble in England and Ireland to-day, and must inevitably lead to bloodshed. The same monopoly exists in many other countries, and even in our own fair land it is a rapidly growing evil. The land, like what else is regarded as wealth, is passing from the hands of the many into the grasp of a few. A few thousands are becoming very wealthy, some counting their wealth by tens of millions, while the great masses, amounting to many millions, are becoming poorer and poorer.

This tendency toward the centralization of wealth is steadily becoming more obvious. Within the memory of those who hav arrived at middle age families and individuals hav been seen to advance from the ownership of only moderate wealth to the possess on of hundreds of thousands of millions. There are several in this young country who now count their wealth by millions of dollars, while a smaller number hav engrossed each the enormous sum of one hundred millions, or well on the way toward it. And all this without their really honestly earning a thousand dollars of the sum of which, by sharp scheming and fraud, they hav robbed their fellow-men.

Many whose heads are not yet very gray can remember when Cornelius Vanderbilt was worth but a limited number of thousands of dollars. When he died, a few years ago, he was worth over fifty millions of dollars, and to-day his son is worth one hundred millions or more. His annual income is reckoned at not less than ten millions, and the Cincinnati Commercial has calculated that W. H. Vanderbilt can easily double his wealth every twenty years, and that even in that brief period, together with his stocks, bonds, dividends, and constantly accruing interest, he may probably be worth the appalling sum of two hundred and fifty millions!

Jay Gould is rapidly progressing in a similar course, his wealth being computed at over fifty millions, and rapidly increasing. The Astors are worth more than that, while the Stewart estate does not fall short of it. There are so many other instances of excessiv wealth in our country that even an enumeration of them would become tiresome. There are few that will hav the hardihood to claim that this monstrous accumulation of wealth in the hands of a few is right, legitimate, and honest. None can truthfully insist that it is conduciv to the wefare of the country for one man to be able to accumulate fifty or one hundred millions, while thousands of his fellow-beings inevitably must be deprived of the wealth of the world, and be even dragged down to poverty and direst want. Excessiv wealth in the hands of a few must cause excessiv poverty on the part of the many. This excessiv wealth is nothing less than robbery.

Important questions arise here: Shall this unjust and disastrous course be continued forever? Shall the few continue to constantly become richer, and the many to become poorer and poorer? Shall one in a million of the inhabitants of the country continue to amass million after million, being able to count their ill-gotten stores by from twenty millions to two hundred millions, while fifty millions of people are forced into poverty, often the most abject, and a large portion of this great number without a home in this fair land, or a place to lay their heads? Shall the few continue to add to the millions which they can not use, while the great bulk of the population are sinking in penury and want, many unable to find employment, many suffering the maddening pangs of hunger, many forced to see their wives and little ones suffering for the want of a mouthful of bread, and hundreds of them driven to a suicide's grave? Can it be that the down-trodden masses will patiently submit to this crushing, enslaving process, and never do aught to change it?

It does not require that a person should possess remarkable far-seeing ability to arrive at the conclusion that this course cannot safely be pursued indefinitly. It is coming to this—the masses must either yield up all their right to property, homes, comfort, and even to life, or they must rise against the oppressors, the monopolists, the stealers of millions, and take from them the enormous wealth which they hav gathered to themselvs. Existing evils will be corrected peaceably or by force. Men will not always suffer and starve while almost endless millions of wealth are amassed by those who scarcely hav earned an honest dollar.

This accumulation of immense wealth in the hands of a few while ten thousand times as many hav nothing, is an excessiv evil. How can it be prevented? Until the accumulation of such vast wealth in the hands of the few is stopped the evil of course cannot be abated. It must be made undesirable for individuals and corporations to hoard excessiv wealth. This can be done by an honest system of graduated taxation.

Let poverty be taxed nothing. Let moderate wealth be moderately taxed. Let excessiv wealth be excessivly taxed. To repeat, those who hav nothing should be taxed nothing; those who hav a little should pay but little; those who hav much should pay in proportion, while those who become possessed of vast sums should be made to shell out very freely.

Let a scale of taxation something like this be adopted: If a man simply owns a home worth a thousand dollars, or less, let him be free from taxation. If he owns $10,000 let him pay one per cent annually on the amount; if $50,000, one and a half per cent; if $100,000, two per cent; $300,000, three per cent; $500,000, five per cent; $1,000,000, ten per cent; $5,000,000, fifteen per cent; $10,000,000, twenty per cent; $50,000,000, twenty-five per cent; $10,000,000, thirty or forty per cent, and so on.

These rates may be out of due proportion and excessiv, but taxation should be graduated so that the wealthy of the country should sustain the expenses of the government, and so heavily that the amassing of immense wealth should be stopped. It cannot tend to the welfare of any country for a few to own all the property or the wealth, and for the masses to hav little or nothing. If these vast accumulations are rendered undesirable, it will not lessen the amount of the aggregate wealth, but afford the masses a better chance to gather a share of it. This power for a few to amass unlimited wealth must be checked or in another hundred years a very small number of capitalists will own all the wealth of the land and from fifty to one hundred millions of the people will be little better than paupers. The same course we hav been pursuing must lead to this result.

Not until vast wealth in the hands of individuals is made undesirable will it be prevented; and in no way can it be made so, so easily as in a just system of graduated taxation. Let a stringent law be enacted that dishonest representations as to the amount of taxable property owned, or an effort to shield it from taxation, shall subject the owner to a forfeiture of the half or the whole he possesses. Or at all events let means be taken to secure an honest payment of the graduated tax.

As corporations, like railroad companies, are as fond of amassing wealth as individuals, let the same law apply to them. Let the basis be that the wealth of the country shall pay its taxes and that those who hav the most wealth shall pay the most on every thousand dollars they possess. That rule will be very different from the one now in vogue. The excessivly rich now manage to greatly escape taxation while the poor are taxed beyond their ability to pay. This can all be changed if the masses will act intelligently in the matter and in concert. They hav the power in their own hands, and all that is necessary is for them to do is to use it.

The centralization and aggrandizment of power is an evil of perhaps as great magnitude as the centralization and aggrandizment of wealth. Power largely accompanies wealth, but chiefly is wielded by governments. It is wielded first over the masses in its immediate country, and is also extended to their colonies and dependencies, as well as to weaker governments.

The governments of Russia and Great Britain are striking examples of this governmental power. In the first the people are sorely oppressed and their rights crushed under foot. It is much the same in Germany, whlie with Great Britain her power is not only over her own toiling millions but over her numerous colonies and dependencies. There are doubtless many now living who will see the time when blood will freely flow in consequence of this conflict between the oppressor and the oppressed. And this may take place any day in connection with the present land troubles in Ireland. Nations are too slow to learn that justice is the best policy, and that the highest good to the state is secured by placing prosperity within the easy reach of the masses. If all the people of a country were in thrifty, comfortable circumstances the state would be in a far better condition in every way than if seventy-five per cent of the population were in abject poverty. How to elevate and improve the masses is the chief care of the best governments.

Centralization of power, as well as centralization of wealth, has a strong foothold in our own country. It is sufficient to arouse the apprehensions of thinking people to notice how centralization on the part of the general government has increased within the past twenty years. The war of the Rebellion necessitated a strong central government and justified an exercise of power on the part of the president and his assistants that had never before been justifiable. Congress was very quick to seize the power which the exigencies of the times granted them, and they hav used it to a greater extent than justice and a high regard for state and individual rights would warrant. All governments evince a readiness to seize and wield power, and our own has proved no exception to the rule.

An instance of the exercise of this unwarranted power was the passage of the postal laws of 1873, by which our government took upon itself the right to examin the people's mail for its moral qualities, and to refuse to carry certain matter in the mail, though fully stamped according to law, because some postmaster or assistant might deem it not possessing the requisit moral character; and to establish in every post-office in the land a system of espionage that would be abhorrent to the most despotic government in the world. The postal system belongs to the entire people, to saints and sinners alike, who pay the legal price for sending matter through the mail, and one class has no right in justice or under the Constitution to deprive another class of equal mail privileges. The hypocritical plea of morality, or enmity toward unbelief, makes no difference with the principle. Oppression is oppression, under whatever name it is applied, and it makes the abrogation of Constitutional guarantees none the less objectionable because it is done in the name of morality and religion.

It is far from reassuring to see that Postmaster-General Maynard is again recommending to Congress the enactment of additional laws to further use the postal department as a detectiv-spy system to effect the conviction and punishment of a class of offenses that legitimately belong to the different states to look after and punish. It is sufficient to excite alarm to see the general government constantly encroaching upon the province of the state governments and upon the rights of the citizen. As we hav state governments, it is eminently proper that the general government should allow them to discharge their legitimate duties and not needlessly interfere with their rights and prerogativs. An unwarranted usurpation of power on the part of the general government over the states, and subversiv of the constitutional rights of citizens, is as reprehensible in our republic as if under a monarchy or despotism. It should not ruthlessly trample upon the rights of the humblest citizen within its borders.

The people can hardly be too much alive to the preservation of their guaranteed rights and privileges, and they cannot be too jealous of the encroachments that may deprive them of these sacred rights. A general intelligence, a widespread determination that constitutional rights shall be preserved and that no pretext shall be employed to deprive these valued principles of liberty, are what is needed in this and every emergency.

Other centralizations of power—the danger imminent from railroad and other monopolies, corporations, etc.—will be considered in a future article.

Mother Shipton's Prophecy.

Several references hav been made of late and from various quarters to this somewhat remarkable prediction. Common report has it that Mother Shipton lived in England some four hundred years ago, and thus her now famous prophecy was written several centuries before it was fulfilled. Whether she wrote her prophecy in rhyme, whether she wrote it or spoke it in prose and some other genius put it in verse, or whether she ever enunciated it at all, are probably matters of some doubt. This much is known, that many years ago the following had circulation in England and in this country under the name of Mother Shipton's Prophecy. Whether, if she prophesied this, it was all she did in that line does not appear to be well established. If she really was a correct prophet, it is perhaps to be regretted that she did so little in that direction. If the Hebrew prophets, the two Isaiahs, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Amos, Joel, Micah, Haggai, Zechariah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Hosea, Obadiah, Jonah, and Malachi had prophesied considerably less and Mother Shipton rather more, it is not certain the world would hav been a very heavy loser. Thus Mother Shipton:

"Carriages without horses shall go,
And accidents fill the world with woe;
Around the world thought shall fly
In the twinkling of an eye;
Water yet shall more wonders do,
Now strange, but yet they shall be true;
The world up-side-down shall be,
And gold be found at the root of a tree.
Through the hills men shall ride,
And horse nor ass be at his side;
Under water man shall walk,
Shall ride, shall sleep, shall talk;
In the air shall men be seen
In white, in blue, in green;
Iron in the water shall float
As easy as a wooden boat;
Gold shall be found and shown
In land that's not now known;
Fire and water shall wonders do;
England shall at last admit a Jew;
The end of the world shall come
In eighteen hundred and eighty-one."

Whether that prophecy was made four hundred years ago or not, whether it was written before the events took place or not, whether it was written by Mother Shipton or not, this much can be said in its favor: It is far more concise, far less vague and loose, than the wild and heterogeneous productions attributed to the parties aforesaid, and the best of all, there is no "Thus saith the Lord" about it. Herein it contains no falsehood.

It is true Mother Shipton made no allusion to the printing press, taking photographs by the sun's rays, the telephone, making ice by machinery, electric light, the Keely motor, and several other things, but she hit railroad riding, tunneling, iron steamers, etc., remarkably well. But we hav a hundred copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" that we are willing to wager against a good farm or a first-class house and lot that the world does not come to an end in eighteen hundred and eighty-one.

What Must we Do to be Saved?

This last published lecture of Col. Ingersoll's has been recently issued, and several copies hav been forwarded to fill the orders received for it. It is in the Colonel's elegant, incisiv, convincing style, which no one has been able to closely imitate. In this he pays more attention to the dogmas of Christianity and the teachings of Jesus than in any of his other discourses. It is a question whether any of his preceding lectures excel this in ability. Price, 25 cents.

The Hull-Jamieson Debate.

These two valorous champions held in Republican Hall in this city on five nights of last week a spirited debate on the pro and con of Spiritualism—Hull for Spiritualism, Jamieson against it. A good deal of interest was enlisted, many of both ways of thinking attending the discussion. As a matter of course both knights were victorious, and each utterly demolished the other. This was, at least, the verdict of the listeners—the Spiritualists thinking that Hull demolished Jamieson, and the Materialists that Jamieson routed Hull.

W. F. Jamieson has gone to Boston to arrange for a debate between himself and Mr. Hull, Jan. 23d, 24th, 25th, 26th, 27th. They will also hold a debate in Vineland, N. J., and will attend the Paine celebration in Linesville, Crawford Co., Pa., and follow with a debate, Jan. 31st, Feb. 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th.

The purpose of these gentlemen is to make debating a distinct profession—something like revivalism in Christianity, but far more honorable, courteous and dignified. They maintain there is no reason why joint oral discussions should not be held all over the country. Their personal relationship is entirely friendly, but they show each other's doctrins no quarter. The audiences that heard their debate here were highly interested.

Address Moses Hull, 37 Harrison avenue, Boston, and W. F. Jamieson, Vineland, N. J.

How to Send Money.

We hav the best of reasons for believing that a considerable number of letters containing money, and designed for us, hav failed to reach us. This has occurred so frequently that we hav come to the conclusion that there are dishonest employees in Uncle Sam's postal department. It has possibly come to the knowledge of some of the clerks who hav the handling of our letters that some of them hav inclosures of money, and it is with sorrow that we think some of them are dishonest enough to abstract an occasional letter before we hav a chance to see them.

These letters necessarily hav to pass through several hands, and from the time they leave our patrons till they reach us there are probably twenty persons who hav a chance to filch letters if they are inclined to do so. That all are not strictly honest there is good reason for believing. An ordinary letter can easily be abstracted from the mails, and no one be able to tell when or by whom it was taken.

For this reason it is unsafe to send money or stamps in an unregistered letter. If a letter containing money is abstracted or lost, there is little chance for tracing it up and finding where it was lost. It is very different with registered letters; a record is kept of them, and, if they go astray, it can be ascertained where and by whom. Of the nearly three millions of registered letters delivered in this city within the past year, but a single letter was lost, while of unregistered letters hundreds, doubtless, failed of their destination. The postal department does not hold itself responsible for registered letters that may be lost, but it will take pains to trace them up. The safeguards thrown around registered letters, and the very small percentage lost—one letter in three millions—makes it a safe way to remit money.

Money orders are still safer, for if the order is lost a duplicate can be obtained. Drafts on a New York bank are also safe; if they are lost, the money is not, and a duplicate can also be issued upon application. A large share of the post-offices in country districts are not money-order offices, but all register letters. Where money-orders cannot be obtained, registering should not be neglected. Funds in money-orders, drafts on New York banks, money by express, and in registered letters may be sent at our risk; but if sent in unregistered letters it must be at the risk of the sender.

Imperfect Bookkeeping.

We are aware that friends hav occasion for dissatisfaction at the way in which their accounts hav been kept in this office. Carelessness has been shown, if not a more reprehensible characteristic. First, we hope it will be remembered that we hav been here in the office but a small share of the time within the last eighteen months, and the filling of orders and the keeping of accounts had to be intrusted to others. That they were not as accurate in all cases as they should hav been cannot be denied.

Our system of keeping accounts with THE TRUTH SEEKER patrons is on the mailing list, whereon the time when the subscription expires is given. When a year or six months are paid for the figures are changed to correspond with the payment made. Little other account is kept. If the clerk is careless in not marking these figures for changing, or if the printers do not their part correctly, an error is the result, when even though the best of motivs are intended.

We hope friends will make due allowance for such mistakes, and when they see an error has been made they will notify us of the fact. We wish to be correct, and to do wrong to none. We are quite content if our patrons pay us once for a given year, and do not wish them to pay twice for the same thing. If errors are made we trust our friends will regard it as not intentional. A true Liberal should never be dishonest.

The little tabs on the wrappers are printed once in four weeks, consequently when remittances come in soon after they are printed it will be three or four weeks before the change in the figures appears. If after that time the change is not seen, we will be glad if friends will call our attention to the matter.

If we hav had dishonest or careless help in our employ, we hav them no longer, and we trust from this time forward there will be little ground for complaint in this direction.

Thomas Paine's Birthday.

The Fourth Liberal League of this city—of which the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is President—has invited the other Leagues of the city to unite with it in suitably observing the 143d anniversary of the birthday of the Author-Hero, in Science Hall, 141 Eighth street, on the evening of Saturday, the 29th inst. The invitation has been accepted, and the observance in memory of the revered man will take place at the time and place named. Several speakers will be in attendance and address the meeting. An original poem will be recited, and a pleasant reunion enjoyed. Friends in the vicinity of the city are invited to attend, and from those who cannot be present letters will be received and presented to the meeting. Thomas Paine is worthy of all the honor we can possibly show him, and it is hoped none will be backward in according it. Let the meeting be well attended.

Our New Dress.

We hav received many complimentary letters with regard to the new suit we donned at the beginning of the year. Some of our contemporaries speak of the same, also, in the kindest terms. The Boston Investigator uses the following flattering language. We wish it many years of continued prosperity and that its publisher and editor may liv long enough to see its circulation doubled:

"As we are going to press we received the New York TRUTH SEEKER in a new dress and new heading, but with the same old editor, D. M. Bennett, who is as industrious and persevering as usual. The paper makes a very neat appearance, and the reading matter, as always, is good. We wish our New York contemporary the best of success, a long life in seeking for the truth, and an unwavering boldness in proclaiming it."

The Winsted Press, always genial and friendly, makes the kindly remarks:

"Bennett's N. Y. TRUTH SEEKER comes to us this week in a new dress throughout and with a new head that is a decided improvement on the old one. In its contents it surpasses any number yet issued, and is altogether a creation for Bennett to be proud of. Every Liberal in the land should take THE TRUTH SEEKER and keep it on the center-table with the one book which all Infidels possess, the Bible.

The Seymour Times and Mind and Matter also speak complimentary of our new, bright appearance, and take pleasure in the same. We thank our kind friends for their good wishes, and trust that an amicable spirit may long be cherished by all toward each other.

Agents for The Truth Seeker.

The following persons in different parts of the country are authorized to take subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER and orders for TRUTH SEEKER publications and Liberal and Spiritualistic books and pamphlets generally:

MRS. COLBY AND SMITH,	MRS. FANNY C. ALLYN,
MRS. H. S. LAKE,	F. F. FOLLETT,
W. S. BELL,	MOSES HULL,
WM. F. JAMIESON,	H. L. GREEN,
A. O. PHELPS,	DR. A. B. SPINNEY,
S. D. MOORE,	DR. E. MOREY,
Dr. J. L. YORK,	C. S. ROWLEY,
J. S. BEDEL,	JAMES A. BLISS.

In addition to the above, every earnest friend is requested to act as agent and obtain all the new subscribers he can. The larger the number of truth seekers in the country the better.

We thank those who hav kindly sent us names of Liberals for sample copies, and we will always be glad to receive others. Our wish is while we liv to spread the truths of naturalism and rationalism as widely as possible.

WE giv this week on the last page a partial list of the English works we hav for sale. The same will be continued next week, when the "Elements of Social Science" will be named. We hav a good stock of this valuable work for our readers. Over 600 pages. Price, $1.50.

The Coming Perihelion.

The celebrated Mother Shipton's prophecy that has passed the rounds of the press for centuries will undoubtedly be on another voyage around the world in 1881. Curiously enough, the wonderful predictions contained therein hav all been verified, with one exception, namely, that the end of the world will come in 1881. It is true that some of our Second Advent brethren hav time and again looked for its fulfilment in advance. It will be well enough to inquire what the coming perihelion of the four leading planets of our solar system portends in its physical, moral, spiritual, and religious aspects; and perhaps we may get a rational glimpse of the true meaning of the Shipton prophecy.

The word "perihelion" is derived from two Greek words signifying "about" and "seen," and in astronomy it means the point in the orbit of a planet or comet which is nearest to the sun. Longitude is another of the elements by which the orbit is determined. In astronomy two or more heavenly bodies are in conjunction when they hav the same longitude. The word "conjunction" is derived from the Latin conjunctio, which means to join together. The sun and moon are in conjunction at the time of new moon. The lunar cycle, or golden number, was based on this fact by Meton, an Athenian astronomer. The lunar cycle begins with the year in which the new moon falls on the first day of January. The cycle of the moon is a period of nineteen solar years, after which the new and full moons fall on the same days of the year that they did nineteen years before. In general a heavenly body is in conjunction with the sun when it is on the same side of the earth and is in a line with him. When Mercury and Venus are in a line between the earth and the sun they are said to be in inferior conjunction. When the sun is between the earth and one of the planets, the latter is in superior conjunction.

The planets Neptune, Uranus, Saturn, and Jupiter, the four leading planets of our solar system as far as known, are to be in conjunction with the sun in 1881. This event has not occured for nearly two thousand years, and it will not occur again for a like length of time. On the 21st of April Saturn and Jupiter will be in conjunction with each other. On the 22d of April Jupiter will be in conjunction with the sun. May 3d Venus will be in conjunction with the sun, and May 6th Neptune will be in conjunction with the sun. And on the 6th of September Uranus will be in conjunction with the sun, while on the 21st of September Mars will be in conjunction with the sun. Other conjunctions occur of smaller planets, among which is the perihelion of Mars, May 26th, as well as the fact that Neptune and Jupiter will be in conjunction with each other on June 18th. The conjunction of Jupiter with Saturn referred to above will not occur again for twenty years. Of course it is scarcely worth while to mention Mercury's numerous conjunctions with the sun, or the numerous conjunctions of other planets with the moon, yet a transit of Mercury over the sun's disk will occur November 7th, and will be of importance to astronomers. In addition to the foregoing there will be a partial eclipse of the sun on May 27th, a total eclipse of the moon June 11th and 12th, an annular eclipse of the sun on November 21st, and a partial eclipse of the moon on December 5th. Enough will happen in the movements of the planetary bodies in 1881 to demonstrate to us whether such unusual phenomena hav any direct perceptible influence on the earth's atmosphere or its inhabitants.

Planets are in opposition when they are 180 degrees from the sun. It may be noted here that the four leading planets will be in opposition as follows: Uranus on March 1st, Saturn on October 31st, Neptune on November 7th, Jupiter on November 12th.

The probable atmospheric disturbances arising from these phenomena will be a matter of direct interest to the inhabitants of earth. Such unusual phenomena among the planets of our system must be productiv of unusual atmospheric changes. The character of these changes will be difficult to foretell, but the unusual early storm of October 15th seems to indicate cold for the winter. The natural result might be said to be a very hot summer. Over twenty years ago Dr. R. T. Trall predicted pestilence in the shape of cholera, yellow fever, small pox, and other epidemic diseases, in the summer of 1881. I do not pretend to say that such shall be the fact, but I feel satisfied that we may reasonably look for extreme atmospheric changes and commotions for the next year to come. There was an unusual number of accidents on account of storms the past fall.

To elucidate the questions involved in the coming perihelion of the planets, it will be necessary to giv a brief synopsis of the general principles of law which govern the evolution of our solar system. According to the nebulous theory of Laplace, the matter contained in our solar system once covered the whole space now occupied by our system. As the matter was gradually condensed by the action of cold, rings were formed on the exterior which in time successivly bursted and by the force of gravitation assumed new orbits of their own around the common parent, the sun. Kepler's laws explain why planets pursue their orbits in the manner they do, and are too well known to need repetition here. Bode's law of progress led to the discovery of the minor planet Ceres in 1801, a discovery since followed by about one hundred and seventy minor planets in the same region between Mars and Jupiter, which Sir William Herschel designated as asteroids. The law that led to this discovery is given in Sir John Herschel's "Outlines of Astronomy," 11th edition, page 505, viz., "The interval between the orbits of the earth and Mercury is nearly twice that between those of Venus and Mercury; that between the orbits of Mars and Mercury nearly twice that between the earth and Mercury, and so on." Although the law proved a notorious failure in the cases of both Saturn and Neptune, yet years before the discovery of Neptune it foretold the existence of the broken planet which is represented by the asteroids between Mars and Jupiter.

The failure of Bode's law in the cases of Saturn and Neptune has led modern astronomers to investigate the cause, and it has been found that the facts indicate that the earth and Venus seem to hav characteristics of half-planets and probably were originally only halves of a broken ring, which explains the fact that the distance of Mars is only a little greater than one and a half times that of the earth, while the like is true also of the distance of Neptune compared with that of Uranus. Bode's law, as corrected and modified by these facts, now indicates the existence among the planetary distances in the solar system of three ratios, viz., a whole-planet ratio, an exterior half-planet ratio, and an interior half-planet ratio. The evolutionary law of planetary distances when compared with the fact, givs us the following suns and planets in our system, viz., 1. Sun; 2. Mercury; 3. Venus; 4. Earth; 5. Mars; 6. A broken planet represented by the asteroids; 7. Jupiter; 8. Saturn; 9. Missing half-planet interior to Uranus; 10. Uranus; 11. Neptune; 12. Undiscovered exterior planet of our solar system. According to this evolutionary law of planetary distances there still remains a missing or undiscovered half-planet interior to Uranus. I hav added another missing or undiscovered planet beyond Neptune, as it has been suggested by others heretofore. By a new law which I shall introduce it will be shown that a planet will probably be discovered outward from Neptune, or that a subsequent ring will burst from the sun and condense into a new planet interior to Mercury, but the latter cannot be without interfering with the established law of planetary distances, Mercury being only twenty-eight millions of miles from the sun, therefore the undiscovered planet must be found to exist beyond the orbit of Neptune. As Neptune is distant from the sun two thousand eight hundred millions of miles, the law of evolutionary planetary distances would require us to look for the undiscovered exterior planet of the system in the regions of space at about five thousand millions of miles from the sun. It is quite probable that telescopes will hav to be improved or enlarged before a dark planetary body can be seen at such a distance from the earth, that is, a planet of such magnitude as would be expected to belong to our system.

Another evolutionary law will hav to be considered in order to explain why another planet exterior to Neptune will probably be discovered in the future. Nature is symmetrical and harmonious in all she does. Order, in the shape of mathematics, is one of the fundamental laws of material formation or evolution. The laws of arithmetical and geometrical progression, as well as the other ratios of mathematics, are well known to hav recognition in material formation as well as in the laws of animate and inanimate motion. 1. Positiv, negativ, male, female, indicate natural laws which proclaim that all individualization is dual; 2. The laws of attraction which govern the union of all chemical atoms and elements demonstrate that the union of two atoms or elements produces a third or compound body which corresponds to the triangle; 3. In the fingers of the hand we find the counterpart of the polygon, or five; 4. In the symmetrical comb of the honey bee is found the counterpart of the hexagon, or six; 5. The spectrum of the rainbow givs us the harmonious blending, seven colors. The music scale is another illustration. It has been suggested that odors are graded with seven; 6. As we rise higher in the scale of evolution we naturally look for the more complex. All systems of astronomy agree in dividing the heavens into twelve, as is shown by the twelve signs of the zodiac. It has been discovered by a scientist of the Franklin Institute, Philadelphia, that the number five rules the body of man, while the number seven rules the brain; taken both together, they show that twelve rules the highest order of beings on earth. As there is always harmony between the physical and intellectual laws of evolution, it is reasonable to infer by analogy that the number twelve rules our solar system in its higher aspects. If we admit the force of this reasoning we can reasonably expect to find that the missing planets of our system are now in existence or hav been broken into smaller minor planets in the ages of the past. The only escape from this reasoning is to assume that the facts are not accurately set forth or to deny mathematical harmony to the solar system.

As already intimated, we may expect great and unusual physical disturbances of all kinds both to the earth and its inhabitants. In the moral sphere of action we may expect unusual upheavals. Such has been the case for the past seven years. Crime, corruption, and exposure seem to hav gone hand in hand.

In the spiritual domain there has been a great variety of very wonderful psychological phenomena constantly projected before the public for one-third of a century. Various explanations of these phenomena hav been put forth, but none of them seem to explain all the facts involved in such a satisfactory manner as the theory of the avowed Spiritualists —that it is of a supermundane origin. If the Spiritual theory is the correct explanation, it at once opens up questions of supreme importance to mankind, as well as furnishing a key to unlock the mysteries of all the old religions of the dark past. Heaven knows that there is much in them that needs such a rational key founded on natural phenomena in order to make them even intelligent to the progressiv thought of this enlightened and moderately tolerant age.

As it is self-evident now that the inhabitants of earth as a mass cannot rise in the scale of development faster than the perfection of our planet will permit, it follows analogically that there is an intimate relation between the physical development of a planet and the intellectual, moral, social, and spiritual condition of its inhabitants. This view of evolution would lead us to expect that the unfoldment of man had been going on for almost untold ages. It is quite probable that the growth of our earth required five hundred millions of years before man could exist on it, and from the best geological data it may be reasonably inferred that it has taken man two hundred millions of years to arrive at his presont state of unfoldment. If he has passed through one-half of his evolutionary career, this would still leave two hundred millions of years for the earth to be in an inhabitable condition for man. Three hundred millions of years for the earth to die would giv twelve hundred millions of years, the probable duration of earth as an individual planet. Some authorities hav placed it at about fifteen hundred millions of years.

A brief glance backward into the dark labyrinths of the night of time would reveal to us that man has evoluted from the grim, blood-thirsty savage up through the patriarchal, imperial, monarchical, and only now is getting ready for the republican form of the social order. Only the uninformed can assume that we are yet on the top of the evolutionary hill. Some of earth's inhabitants aspire to a new order of social order, where love shall be the cornerstone, where each works for all and all for each in one common brotherhood of man.

The advance vanguards of science are still pushing aside the cobwebs of mythology in all the old mythological religions of the past. In fact, some of these savants assume to probe the supposed incomprehensibles of supernaturalism and show them to be explained on a perfectly natural although probable supermundane origin. The state of science is now advanced far enough to enable us to see glimmerings of how humanity is gradually elevated in the scale of growth. The researches of scholars, antiquarians, and historians hav shown us that the method of elevating humanity has been systematic during the ages of the past. In regular evolutionary intervals of time individuals hav appeared as the representativs of a new truth. In the religious realm of thought these individuals hav uniformly been called saviors. One author (Kersey Graves) has shown that there hav been sixteen crucified saviors recognized among the nations of the past, to say nothing about the innumerable host of reformers, philanthropists, heroes, and martyrs of the ages. Human beings usually imprison, neglect, or murder the apostles of all new truths which conflict with their old notions; and their descendants afterward canonize them as saints, martyrs, saviors, or gods. It is to be hoped that mankind will be more sensible in the future, and instead of deifying men that they will exalt the new truths they teach by putting them into practice.

A careful analysis of the evolutionary intervals will show that one of these so-called saviors or messiahs appears about every 2,250 years or thereabout. Other lesser saviors or martyrs appear often in different nations. The coming perihelion of the planets is one of the most important physical and spiritual epochs that has occurred since the time of Jesus Christ. Whether this event means that he shall giv way to more advanced truth I will not assume to say, but one thing I will say, that the sway of his principles shall at farthest be overshadowed by higher truths soon, and at farthest in three hundred years or so. Some think that the new cycle will begin in 1881, while others think three hundred years longer will be required for his sway. The end of the world predicted in the Bible, and which the Second Adventists as well as Mother Shipton all look for, is this cycle of planetary conjunctions in 1881.

If it should prove correct that an undiscovered planet exists beyond Neptune, it would of course be the oldest and most perfect planet in the system. It may reasonably be surmised that it plays an important part in the 2,250-year or messiah cycle. The influence it exerts in the coming conjunction cannot be imagined until it is discovered.

The coming conjunction is very important in another respect. The metric system is founded on the length of the ten-millionth part of the terrestrial meridian, or the distance between the pole and the equator. The decimal monetary system is founded on mathematics in its simplest form. The length of our day is one revolution of the earth on its axis; the week and month are regulated by the moon, while the year is one revolution of the earth around the sun. Various cycles hav been proposed for enumerating the passing years. The lunar and solar cycles are too short. The Jewish calendar givs us 5,641, the Julian period, 6,594; Anno Domini, 1881; Geo. Francis Train's psychologic era, 54, I think; the Mind and Matter Modern-Spiritualism era, 34; and E. H. Heywood's Year of Love, 9; while the Japanese, Chinese, Indian, and other periods giv equally reasonable starting-points for chronological eras. The objection that can be raised against them all is that they are sectional eras, which may be very important to the persons, nations, or religions which they propose to honor, but as a scientific chronological cycle they are destitute of a scientific basis. They are useful as showing that science has not given us a basis for a universal chronological cycle as yet. They are defectiv in another direction. If it could be assumed as among the probabilities that the Christians could convert all other faiths to their religion, then the universal adoption of the Anno Domini era might be expected. Still it would be absurd to suppose that the inhabitants who lived in the closing days of man's existence on earth would burden themselvs by dating letters or commercial notes with the wonderfully long chronological cycle of A.D. 199,991,881. The same objection would apply to all the other proposed cycles. They are not based on evolutionary cycles, but on fixed periods, hence must prove impractical and unscientific, and can never command universal adoption by the brotherhood of man.

To my mind the way to obtain a scientific chronological cycle is to take the most important planetary cycle in our system, and then date backward as well as forward from it. The coming perihelion or conjunction is certainly the most important event known to us, unless the 2,250-year messiah cycle can be proved to hav an important physical foundation; we will in all probability hav to wait for the discovery of the planet exterior to Neptune before such fact can be demonstrated. In the mean time I suggest that scientists unite on the coming planetary conjunction as the proper beginning of a new chronological era. We can use the Anno of the present Christian period, because the Latin language is more generally recognized as a universal language than any living tongue. The words perihelion and cycle are both derived from Greek, and could not, according with the rules of word-building, be linked together in one phrase; but happily we hav an appropriate word which has a Latin origin, viz., the word conjunction is derived from the Latin conjunctio, which means to join together. This will giv anno conjunctio for use in place of Anno Domini. Then, instead of dating A.D. 1881, it would be proper to write A.C. 1. If the language was spelled phonetically it would be written A.K. 1.

Let astronomers calculate backward to the time of each past conjunction of these leading planets as far as human history can penetrate, or to the different geological periods if they can. Then let historians adjust their histories of the different nations to this new chronological cycle, and the measurement of time both ways will be very simple. The different cycles can be named first, second, third, etc., so that we can definitly measure time for all time in a regular mathematical manner.

I suggest that all reformers unite on the first of January, 1881, as the new scientific chronological era anno conjunctio, or A.C. 1. I suggest that THE TRUTH SEEKER lend its influence to the new era with the hope of calling the attention of other reformers to the subject. In this way a union of reformers would carry great weight, and force the scientists of the world to investigate the subject of a scientific chronological era. If they can settle on something that will be more scientific than what I hav proposed I shall be heartily glad to adopt it. We must hav a thoroughly scientific chronological cycle. Let all put their pens to the movement by writing all letters other than legal documents with A.C. 1, or A.K 1, for the year 1881. JOHN BROWN SMITH.

VICK'S FLORAL GUIDE.—Of the many guides and seed and plant catalogs sent by our seedsmen and nurserymen, and that are doing so much to inform and beautify and enrich our country, none are so beautiful, none so instructiv, as Vick's Floral Guide. Its paper is the choicest, its illustrations handsome, and given by the hundred, while its colored plate is a gem. This work, although costing but 10 cents, is handsome enough for a gift book, or a place on the parlor table. Published by James Vick, Rochester, N. Y.

Thomas Paine.

A REPLY TO WM. HENRY BURR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: With Mr. Wm. Henry Burr, of Washington, D. C., and tens of thousands of others, I am a great admirer of the labors of Thomas Paine, and am second to no one in the appreciation of his invaluable services in the cause of liberty, both religious and political, the benefits of which the world is now enjoying; but unlike Mr. Burr my admiration will not allow me to close my eyes to historical facts, or endeavor to detract from the merits of others. In your issue of December 1, 1880, friend Burr has a lengthy article asserting Mr. Paine to be the author of "Junius' Letters." That these letters were written by some earnest well-wisher for the better administration of parliamentary power and for the correction of parliamentary misrule is very evident; but daringly exponent as they were, refined in diction, and intimate as the author certainly was with the characters and personages of whom he writes, it is doubtful that they produced much effect, other than like the annoyance of a scolding wife. These abuses in the British government were well known to exist. The officials knew it, the people knew it, and the notoriety of these letters existed mainly in their treasonable character. "Well, go on with your scolding, old woman; but don't you dare to raise the broom handle!" was the silent language of the parties assailed. So much for the letters of Junius. The question friend Burr raises is, was Mr. Paine their author? Little does Mr. Burr imagin that he is trying hard to prove Mr. Paine a foolish liar. I am certain Mr. Burr in his admiration has overlooked the point blank statement in his works that he certainly was not their author. If friend Burr will turn to Mr. Paine's "Crisis" No. 2, published in Philadelphia, Jan. 13, 1777, directed to Lord Howe he will find the concluding lines running as follows:

"Thus far sir, I hav endeavored to giv you a picture of present affairs; you may draw from it what consolation you please. I wish as well to the true prosperity of England as you can, but I consider independence as America's natural right and interest, and never could see any real disservice it would be to Britain. If an English merchant receives an order and is paid for it, it signifies nothing to him who governs the country. This is my creed of politics. If I hav anywhere expressed myself overwarmly 'tis from a fixed, immovable hatred I hav, and ever had, to cruel men and cruel measures. I hav likewise an aversion to monarchy as too debasing to the dignity of man; but I never troubled others with my notions till very lately, and never published a syllable in England in my life. What I write is pure nature, and my pen and soul hav ever gone together," etc., etc.

Of the Declaration of Independence, I think it was friend Burr who asserted and had proved to his own satisfaction that Mr. Paine was also the author of this immortal document. His persistency in urging forth his convictions and his denunciation of Mr. Jefferson's accredited authorship really seem to partake of malevolence. No one doubts that the ideas of Mr. Paine, whose Radical views, popularized through his great work "Common Sense" (published in Philadelphia, Feb. 14, 1776) were therein embodied, gave tone to the principles set forth in that bold document. And no one need doubt that Mr. Paine (being then in Philadelphia), might hav been consulted by Mr. Jefferson, but that the construction of the document certainly was the labor of Mr. Jefferson, the proof is too abundant. Mr. Burr's ill-nature again shows itself in his labor to prove that it was only in the latter days of Mr. Jefferson's life—the document becoming sanctified by time—that he ungenerously allowed himself to be thought its author, and arrogated to himself a portion of its national glory.

Now, if friend Burr will hunt among Dr. Franklin's papers connected with his memoirs, published by his grandson, William Temple Franklin, and printed by William Duane, in Philadelphia, 1809 (six volumes), he will find several allusions to Mr. Jefferson, one from the Doctor highly complimenting him as the author, his name passing down to posterity in equal glory with this bold declaration. And the Doctor should certainly hav known, as he was one of the committee of three delegated to prepare the manifesto. He says (page 360), "It was definitivly drafted (and adopted, with a few slight alterations) by that eminent patriot, philosopher, and friend of mankind, Thomas Jefferson, then one of the representativs in Congress for Virginia, as a document of considerable interest and curiosity." So Mr. Burr will perceive that the knowledge of Mr. Jefferson being its author was far from being a recent assumption.

In presenting the prepared document to the committee of five, viz., John Adams, Roger Sherman, Robert R. Livingston, Benjamin Franklin, including himself, he expressed his apprehension that his document, on which he had bestowed so much thought, would fail to meet the diverse views of the general assembly. The Doctor endeavored to allay his oversensitivness by jocularly relating the story of John Brown's difficulty of preparing a boot and shoe sign to please the tastes of his many friends and neighbors. In conclusion he soothed Mr. Jefferson by saying he must expect great mutilation of his important manuscript.

I reiterate I am a great admirer of Mr. Paine and almost hope the time will come when his valuable works on human rights and human capabilities will be used as a text-book by statesmen, and as a reading book in our public schools—displacing that old razor-strop, the Bible. Let friend Burr enlarge his ideas of this planet and conceive it possible for two great men to exist on its surface at one and the same time. Could Mr. Jefferson be other than a great humanitarian statesman who could giv utterance to the expression of his ideas on slavery, yes, almost prophetical, "I tremble for my country when I know that God is just?" And again he says, in his "Notes on Virginia," "We are told the slaves, the blacks, are naturally thieves and sly pilferers, etc. Well, be it so; can we not pardon them for stealing a small part, when we hav stolen all?" DAVID BRUCE.

Liberals Should be Liberal..

It is a shame that we who are Liberals do not practice our liberality more toward our own cause. The writer of this does not desire to claim exemption from this blame. He has given freely to churches until the narrowness, bigotry, and insults of Christians drove him to close his pocketbook against all church beggars.

When Comstock as agent for the Christians of the United States in their movement against Liberalism and Infidelity began his raids it seemed to me that I was criminally foolish and soft if I gave any more toward sustaining them. It was merely aiding them to persecute my brethren. Let me just say right here that if Liberals would cease to contribute any more toward sustaining Christian churches, ministers, and missionaries, and would giv the one-tenth part of their former favors to such affairs toward sustaining their own cause, you, Mr. Editor, would not be forced to make the appeals you do.

Wake up, all ye Infidels! Just think how much a poor Christian has to giv to his church. And yet nine-tenths of us begrudge the annual pittance to sustain our newspaper, while we are actually, yes, actually, supporting newspapers that either denounce us, or are too cowardly to utter a word for us. There is no doubt about this.

Now, if we are really sincere, and no hypocrits, we are guilty of moral crime in contributing one penny to supply the enemy with the sinews of the open war he is making on ourselvs, our leaders, and our cause.

It is only a few days since I heard a wealthy man, an Infidel open and avowed, who glories in the name as he ought, talk as though he begrudged the money for THE TRUTH SEEKER for a year. Yet were that man a church member there is no doubt that, he being a wealthy man as he is, his church would get out of him in various ways, such as pew rent, priest's salary, church repairs, lights, fuel, "yaller-legged chickens," etc., etc., hundreds of dollars. He would part with it here willingly, and console himself that he was laying it up above, "where moth and rust doth not corrupt"—an insurance against hell fire, in heavenly banks.

Yes, since this united, pre-determined war is being made on us all by these Protestant Jesuits, we are criminally foolish to giv to the enemy, and not to giv to our own.

Let every Liberal who reads this furnish to THE TRUTH SEEKER the name of every free-thinking man and woman he can, and at the same time do something toward getting subscribers and circulating books and pamphlets in behalf of our cause.

HOLT.

The Human Beings that Hav Lived.

The Rev. Mr. Murray, in a recent lecture in Music Hall, Boston, in considering the subject of the number of people that hav lived upon this globe, made use of the following language:

"Now the population of the earth is 1,000,000,000, and a generation dies every thirty years. In every thirty years, then, 1,000,000,000 of human beings go out of the world and 1,000,000,000 come in. Forty years ago the church taught that the world was 6,000 years old. She doesn't to-day pretend to guess within 100,000 years how old the world is. Very well. What has been the population of the world since the race began? Who can estimate the number? By what arithmetic shall you compute the swarming millions? Take the globe and flatten it into a vast plain, 24,000 miles by 24, and would it accommodate but a fraction of the human beings that hav lived upon its surface? Where is the locality of the judgment to be then? Can it hav a locality?"

Letters from Friends.

CASHTOWN, PA., Jan. 7, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I am entirely in sympathy with the movement of the tour around the world, and will do my part in helping defray expenses.

Respectfully, W. O. SMITH, M.D.

DUBLIN, Mo., Jan. 7, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Put me down for five dollars for those fat volumes you propose to publish of the sights you will see on the trip you will soon make around the world.

I recently sent you two new subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I think I can send you some more soon. Respectfully, F. L. YALE.

AMBOY, MINN., Jan. 3, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I will be one of the three hundred to giv five dollars for your trip around the world, as you hav suggested, and would consider the money well invested. MOSES KUNZELMAN.

ESCANABA, MICH., Jan. 4, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 1st the question is asked, "Shall the journey around the world be made?" I answer, Yes. And you can put my name on your book for five dollars, to be paid when wanted. I am sure your letters of travel will make a very readable book; and as much as we shall miss you in the editorial chair, we shall be happy to know that you are enjoying yourself in foreign lands and that we shall know something about those countries that we know little of now. C. HOWARD.

STOCKTON, CAL., Dec. 28, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: Your recent letters in your paper are the best descriptiv reading I ever perused. I think you would make a success of the China and Japan trip proposed by our California friend. I will take one of the books when published.

Respectfully, W. F. FREEMAN.

DWIGHT, ILL., Jan. 7, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I see by your issue of Jan. 1st that promis bids fair for you to take a trip around the world. Therefore I will contribute five dollars for the object, and Mr. G. Z. Flagler says you may put him down. I think that $5 invested to help send you around the world will be about as good an investment as can be made with so small an amount of money in more ways than one. In the first place, judging from the letters you wrote in Europe, we shall hav a rich harvest of knowledge not otherwise attainable. Besides, it will help giv you one year of pleasure, which will help to counteract the misery you must hav suffered the thirteen months that you served in the Christian bastile at Albany. Besides, it will show to Comstock and his company that you are not dead, but moving around to gather knowledge from every quarter of the globe, and that Liberals of the country will sustain you in all efforts where knowledge can be found. Now let the Liberals of the country contribute their five dollars early, that you may hav plenty of time to get ready for the trip. Respectfully yours, WM. WALKER.

LYNDON, KAN., Dec. 25, 1880.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: Count me for five dollars for e proposed trip round the world, as I must hav the books describing the same, for our little D. M. Bennett, who is growing to be a fine boy, now past fifteen months of age. J. M. PERT.

ROCKFORD, ILL., Jan. 6, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: You may put my name down for your future volume "An Infidel Around the World." Just here Dr. G. W. Brown has stepped into my office; he says, "Tell Bennett to count me in." Now if we do not come to time we will be lagging and not begging, as your typo puts it in my letter in the issue of Jan. 1st.

Should you make the journey around the world I much desire you to carefully examin the condition of our foreign missions. For years I gave generously toward them, according to my means, and the preachers promised me no end of blessings and rewards. One or two told me if I ever traveled in those pagan lands I would get back all I gave, with compound interest. I shall never visit those countries I fear, but should you see any of my compound interest lying loosely around please lay violent hands upon it, in the name of common sense, justice, and the flag of the free. Yours respectfully,

MRS. H. L. BUCKNER, M.D.

MT. VERNON, IND., Jan. 7, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: You can count me in for five dollars for the "Round the World Fund" and to take books in exchange. Your friend, A. ED. HARLEM.

CENTRAL CITY, Col., Dec. 30, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Please put me down for one share of that fund which you propose on page 812 of your paper. I will not only willingly giv that to pull down ignorance and superstition, but I think I can safely agree to furnish you names sufficient for fifty dollars, perhaps more; that many, anyhow.

I am an ardent admirer of this—to me—new religion, and, although I am not abundantly supplied with money, I feel that I would almost distress myself pecuniarily in order to learn from reliable authority about those musty old countries from which this Christian religion was adopted. We hav unquestionably had able men traveling and writing from all those old religious landmarks, and upon the subject of religion, but almost all of them were in the employ of religious institutions or biased in favor of Christianity, so that all such reports were unfair and prejudiced in favor of the Jewish Bible and religion. I do want to hav the report of a fair, unprejudiced writer, such as I think you would be—no, I think you would be bitterly against religion, but I think not unfair; and as anything against religion as preached now suits me, the more bitter the better I think I would like it. So put me down for five dollars; and when you get enough other subscriptions to make up the fifteen hundred dollars, let me know and I'll forward it. When I know the enterprise is an established fact I will see how many more five dollars I can obtain. I hav three already. If you obtain the necessary funds, please mark out the route you now think you would take and the places you would visit, and where you would expect to remain the longest, and object in visiting each of the places. How I should like to hav you visit India and find there records, indisputable records, that would establish the fact that the Jewish religion belonged to their country, and with dates long anterior to those of Christianity! I want to be able to hurl into the teeth of these pious frauds the facts that there are dates, positiv dates, reaching thousands of years beyond their creation, in which this same religion was taught and practiced, and can denounce them as thieves and swindlers. So long as people are sent into those countries whose interest it is to keep Christianity afloat, they will invariably report in favor of that institution. So we want no more reports from Christians or their ken. Agitate this matter, keep it rolling, and I feel confident that it will soon be an established fact that you will be on the "rolling billows of the deep" in the near future.

Truly yours, D. D. LAKE.

ROYAL CENTER, IND.

MR. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Count me one who will contribute to your trip around the world. I am of the opinion that five dollars cannot be spent to better advantage. I think you can see more, write more about it, and make it more interesting, than any other man. Your letters from Europe are splendid.

You ask how we like the new dress. I like it well. It suits me. I want to ask you why you did not bring home one of those pagan gods and set it up in your office. It might hav been a great help to you in keeping away Comstock and the Y. M. C. A., and also to stand sentinel while you make your trip around the world. Your friend, GEO. HENDEE.

LEADVILLE, COL., Dec. 28, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: I write to thank you for your letters from Europe. They are well worth the price of THE TRUTH SEEKER for a year. I also second the motion of D. C. Coleman to send you around the world, and will go him five dollars better to raise the amount necessary to pay the expenses of trip. Inclosed find money order for five dollars, for which please giv me credit on my subscription.

I am truly, F. H. MOORE.

ST. JOHNS, MICH., Jan. 5, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: You can put me down for five dollars for your trip around the world, and my wife says she wishes you will let her go along. But my wife is a very foolish woman, always uneasy and ever ready to emigrate. And if in heaven she is permitted to select her wings she will not be satisfied till she has a pair that will enable her to distance all others. 'Twould be just splendid to see her and Elmina, with Gabriel in the rear, coming in on the home stretch. Yours very truly, M. BABCOCK.

P. S.—When you get among the poor heathen you can say that you are the authorized agent for the sale of "The Ghost of St. John," by M. Babcock.

[If our friends should decide to send us around the planet, it would be very agreeable to hav companions on the journey. Should Mrs. Babcock conclude to be one, we will try to induce her not to fly away and leave us behind.—ED. T. S.]

BOSTON, MASS., Jan. 3, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Your "new dress" of THE TRUTH SEEKER is splendid. I like it much. It would be a capital thing if you could travel around this "basement world" and see its wonders and relate them in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am sure there are hundreds of your readers, your humble servant being one of the number, who would like to read your descriptions of here and there and everywhere. With many kind recollections of the past and many sincere wishes of good fortune for you in the future, I am as ever, Fraternally thine, W. S. BELL.

HAMILTON, R. I., Jan. 3, 1881.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: Let me thank you for those letters from Europe, and, if not too presuming, make a proposition. I think the first anniversary of your return from Albany should be noted, and suggest that THE TRUTH SEEKER friends shall chip in and contribute enough that you can giv us a double number the first of May. You say you would giv it away were you able to do it. I'll see a dollar on the venture, and if you will make the trial will send it on in time. Will you do it? JAMES N. ARNOLD,

Ch. N. L. L. for R. I.

VINELAND, N. J., Jan. 3, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: I hav been highly entertained and instructed by your excellent letters from over the sea, and I trust it will not be long before you will hav sufficient means to commence your proposed trip around the world. Very truly, R. P. FELLOWS.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Jan. 5, 1881.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER FRIENDS: I've just received a letter from "Alhaza," mailed from Lexington, Ky., December 30th, in which she says she has not received one stamp since the few I sent her. I supposed, of course, her appeal, so simple and yet so touching, would open all hearts. But no doubt very many of you would hav heeded the call had you been able to address her directly, but all who wish to, our Bennett can put in a stamp or two and a few kindly words and he will forward both to her. She really needs the necessaries of life, and deserves our aid, inasmuch as she has done good work for years in distributing Liberal books and papers, as well as sending out Liberal sentiments through the press. To think of a sick woman in need is hard indeed when we realize the severity of the weather and that she is far away among strangers.

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

ROCKFORD, ILL., Dec., 20, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: Please continue THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year. Your paper and the Boston Investigator are my household gods. May they both flourish until their object is accomplished.

Yours truly, GEO. TULLOCK.

MR. EDITOR: Years ago when on an ocean steamer bound for California, we had a dominie on board who was continually attempting to turn the cabin into a gospel shop for prayer-meetings, One day on deck several gentlemen were complaining of what a bore the dominie was, when I said that I wished some one would go and say to him: "You believe the Bible to be the inspired work of God, and you pretend to explain it. Now tell us, are the words that are recorded in the Bible as being spoken by Balaam's ass to be regarded as the words of revelation or as the words of the ass? If of the ass, was he inspired? and if inspired, was he a prophet?"

This excited the risibility of a Mr. H., who roared with laughter and said it was the best thing he had ever heard, and off he went to find the dominie. It shut that functionary's clap-trap. C.

SANDUSKY, ILL., Jan. 4, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to read of your return home. Your letters were very interesting. A friend and myself read "The Gods and Religions," and we think it one of the greatest works in the world. Truth seekers are increasing here and Christianity is sinking, thank, not God, but reason. I hav tried to get subscribers for your best of papers, but the people excuse themselvs by saying they are not able to pay for it. Well, we will try to be neighborly. They may read ours till the papers wear out, and we will let them hav a little jaw to boot as often as we can. You will allow me to say the church here (Methodist) has to resort to gambling, fishing-for-candy festivals, etc., to make the mare go. Why not pray for anything they want if the Bible is so sure as they say (Mark xi, 24)? Why, because they don't believe the Bible is true. On the 22d of this month the Methodists of Sandusky neighborhood will establish a lying, gambling, swindling post-office to raise funds to build a house in which they will worship God. L. MCDANIEL.

PRAIRIE CITY, OR., Dec. 25, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT: I see that the time for which I hav paid for THE TRUTH SEEKER has about expired; and I shall send to Congress City to-morrow to procure money order for three dollars to renew for another year.

I hav deferred sending the money a little longer than I ought or than I intended; but, like yourself, I often find it quite difficult to get hold of a sufficient quantity of the "filthy lucre" to meet my most urgent demands. Although some weeks hav elapsed since your return, I hope it is not too late to congratulate you on your successful journey and safe return. I had some serious misgivings in regard to your safety when I learned that you were rash enough to venture upon that element which has so frequently been used as a means of destruction for the wicked. In the event of a storm that was likely to wreck your ship, I was satisfied that should they cast lots you would be thrown overboard, but had little hope that Jah would prepare a "great fish" for your accommodation, with special instructions to land you safely at New York. Perhaps you owe your safety to the fact that you had on board some reverend with more than ordinary influence with him who rules the storm, and that that influence was exercised in your behalf with the hope that should you be spared to journey to that land where the grandeur and magnificence of God-houses are made a specialty you might be induced to turn from the error of your ways, or, in Christian parlance, be snatched as a brand from the burning.

As there is said to be more joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, etc., there would indeed hav been a grand old time amongst the sanctified had they caught the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER napping; and I agree with the reverend that the hope of such a prize was worth a tremendous effort.

But the most reasonable theory for your escape is that since the convention of the gods, and his ill-success at that time, Jah has relapsed into one of those long and profound slumbers from which Mercury found it so difficult to awaken some of his predecessors.

One of our friends seems disposed to complain because you devoted so much of your letters to a description of cathedrals. Now I take an altogether different view of that matter. As you hav undertaken to war upon superstition, and as the greatest superstition is fostered by the church and in the name of religion, it is fitting that you should hav gone into its strongholds, acquainted yourself thoroughly with its mode of working, sought out its weak points, and in every way possible thoroughly posted yourself in regard to this, the greatest curse that has ever befallen the human race.

The only mistake I think you made was that you did not visit God's vicegerent on earth while you had an opportunity. You may never hav an opportunity of calling upon Leo "thirteen times" on earth again. And although that may be no great disadvantage to you, I should hav been pleased to know you bearded the lion in his den; but as you apear to hav become quite familiar with St. Peter, perhaps he will at some future time introduce you to his holiness.

I hav been expecting, since your return, to hear of your arrest by that conservator of public morals, who must hav been immensely shocked when he read the letter in which you speak of a fountain representing perfectly the attitude of the little lost boy when obeying one of nature's laws. It is well that the one who executed that work of art did not liv in New York in Comstock's time, for if one-half that has been said of him is true, he has arrested many for a less offense.

I am truly sorry that Bro. Green should hav regarded it as his duty to withdraw from the old League, in which and for which he had long labored so earnestly and efficiently. The suggestion of sister Slenker in regard to forming libraries is a good one and one that has frequently been spoken of by some of the members of Union League No. 196. Hoping that all your old subscribers will promptly renew, and that many new ones may be added to your list, I am Yours truly, A. L. THOMPSON.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Dec. 31, 1880.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: 'Tis the eve of the New Year; and while all the world are making good resolutions for the coming twelve months, I begin my work by saying a few words in appeal for "our paper," the New York Physiologist. The world is full of good papers working for good aims, but not one is attempting a better work than ours. We are striving for sound minds in healthy bodies; for right generation and less of it; for happy homes and pure lives; for the freedom and equality of men and women, mentally, morally, and sexually. We want homes where two heads rule by the just arbitration of reason tempered by love. We want a few well organized and happily situated children, and no others. In fine, we work for the general health and happiness of all the world. And thou, my sister and brother who read this, I ask thee if thou wilt not do a little for so noble a cause. We all need to do some good work in life. This may be thy one chance; pass it not by, but now, while my words are in thy mind, begin the new year by sending me a dollar at least for a trial of "our paper." I do not think thee can hav a better New Year's blessing than this visitor will bring thee and thine. That it may enter many a home, bringing cheer, hope, and gladness, is the earnest wish of ELMINA D. SLENKER.

MR. EDITOR: In compliance with your request in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I forward you the names of people I know to be somewhat Liberal.

I hope that you may be successful in getting their orders for THE TRUTH SEEKER, one of the most logical papers printed in America. Welcome home to your old sanctum!

We hav been having a few lectures at the Opera House, Salamanca, by George Chainey, who calls himself an Agnostic. To say that he is a fine speaker, a scholar, and a gentleman would be to speak in meager terms of his oratory and eloquence. The audiences were rather small in number, but big in intellect. He intends to remain here some eight or ten days longer. In the mean time we shall try and hav him speak in our school district. We cannot but think it a mistake in him and Green withdrawing from the National Liberal League.

A. F. ALBRIGHT.

WELLAND, Dec. 27, 1880.

DEAR FRIEND D. M. BENNETT: I am an Englishman, in the seventy-fifth yoar of my age, and hav been a member of the Society of Friends most of that time; a year ago I resigned my right of membership, as I could not longer be making a profession of what I did not believe. I am a regular subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER and hav much pleasure in its perusal. Your letters from Europe hav been very interesting, and some people that would not hav thought of reading THE TRUTH SEEKER were anxious to read them, and by that means I hav been able to circulate THE TRUTH SEEKER more than I otherwise could hav done.

A. FRIEND.

MODESTO, CAL., Dec. 26, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, ESQ., Dear Sir: I read your reply to my letter, and feel glad that you approve of my proposition in regard to your trip to Egypt, Palestine, Arabia, Bombay, Calcutta, China, Japan, Australia, and San Francisco. Now try to do all you can through your valuable paper to get subscribers by May 1, 1881. I hav the promise of five subscribers all ready, and am proud to say they are intelligent well-read men of families, and of high standing in the county. They say with me that a work giving your circuit of the above places would be a valuable addition in every home, public school, and library. I hav read nearly all the writings of travelers for the past twenty years, and none givs me the plain, authentic facts I gleaned from your letters from Europe. Wishing you may gain your point and make the trip, I also hope if you do that when you return you will not plead poverty and hav your photo taken with a trunk on the end of your stick, (See S. F. Wasp, of Dec. 18, which I send with this letter.) Wishing you a Happy New Year and lots of good luck, believe me your well-wisher,

D. C. COLEMAN.

[Our friend alludes to a caricature of Gen. Grant who is represented as a white elephant.—ED. T. S.]

BURLINGTON, KAN., Jan. 2, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: What has happened at your office? I hav written and mailed two communications for publication, one during the election campaign, giving my views as a Greenbacker and on national issues, another after the division of the Liberals at their Chicago Convention, giving my views on that question as a Radical Liberal. That, I expect, went with the other, into the waste-basket, so that I hav not had a hearing on either subject. I must say that I hav always admired the liberality you hav manifested in the columns of your paper in publishing both sides of all questions, either religious or political.

If my friends will not consider me egotistical, I would mention that although my finance is limited —I am a laboring mechanic nearly sixty years of age—I hav done what I could to help forward the Liberal cause wherever I hav resided for the last twenty-eight years. I hav been a subscriber and a reader of your paper since prior to its removal from Paris, Ill., to New York. I hav purchased a number of books at your office, and hav circulated four petitions, the first for the pardon of J. A. Lant, 250 names; the second to repeal or amend the Comstock law, 275 names; third, for the pardon of E. H. Heywood, 300 names; fourth, for the pardon of D. M. Bennett, 350 names, and I hav mailed you a number of new and old subscribers. At the time of your imprisonment I obtained fifteen trial subscribers and a few for a longer time.

I hav perused the history of your travels in Europe with interest. I hav read every letter published in your paper, and I will take the liberty to inform you that you excel any traveler or writer I hav ever examined in your descriptions of foreign countries and their inhabitants, according to my perception of mind.

The branch of Liberals who divided and left the National League at the Chicago Convention reminds me of the Colonization Society during the antislavery agitation. The conservativ Liberals think of uniting the church with Liberals in an effort to secularize our government, but I think they will do as much in that direction as the Colonization Society did in the emancipation of the Southern slaves. To my mind the signs of the times betoken that the question of church and state will not be settled without considerable hard work on the part of the Liberals in rescuing our government and public press from the grasp of the church oligarchy.

CHRIS. BROWN.

[Friend Brown is always welcome to our columns, but we fear some of his letters hav miscarried. We hav seen but one communication from him since our return. That was handed in to be printed, and it was a mistake that it did not appear. We are grateful to him for the effort he has made in behalf ot THE TRUTH SEEKER.—ED. T. S.]

INNERKIP, ONTARIO, CAN.

MR. EDITOR: Your issue published on New Years day is one of the best. Sparkling thought and live ideas crowd each other from beginning to end. The extra copy sent was handed to my son, who will become a subscriber at once.

Those European letters are well worthy of all the praise they are getting from your readers.

I am expecting a rare treat from those lessons of T. B. Wakeman. Some years ago I read Herbert Spencer's "First Principles," and those papers will refresh the memory with ideas requiring thought.

I was delighted with the experience of Worthy Putnam. He must be a grand old man. I think I must send for his likeness. I could not help comparing his religious experience with that of a good many others that I hav heard in my younger days in religious meetings. Here is about the gist: "Brethren and sisters, I feel it is my duty to take up the cross and tell what the Lord has done for my soul. I am a poor sinful critter, and hope you will all pray for me." Generally by this time the utterance was choked, and a few tears concluded the effort. However, a duty was performed, and the poor soul was happy. Now, the question is, How many of such poor critters would it take to make a Putnam? And yet they will set up their little hate, and let their vile tongues loose at such a man. It reminds me of a little cur about the size of my foot that would stand up against the shoulder of a very large dog and with any amount of growling and teeth-showing dare him to fight.

F. MALCOLM.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Jan. 6, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: THE TRUTH SEEKER, in its fresh, New Year's garb, is here, and looks as clean and neat as a pin. At first we hardly recognized it as our old and beloved friend, so greatly did its change of apparel alter it; but the more we see it the better we like it. The print is clear and easy to read, and altogether it's ever so nice. I wish I could place a copy in everybody's hands and induce each one to read it and ten thousand of them to subscribe for it.

And right here let me put in a word on my own hook to my own personal friends and the many who hav kindly sent me appreciativ greetings in regard to my articles on "Sexual Intemperance." I wish to say to these in particular, as well as to others who will do so, that, judging from letters sent me, second-hand, and a very few first-hand, many hav ordered their papers stopped on account of these articles being such that they did not like to lay them before their families. While I can fully appreciate these scruples, which are only too natural in the present condition of society, I still feel that I hav done a well-needed work in sowing a few good seeds in this field of reform. But I regret more than I can tell that even one person should cease to aid or read the paper because of what I may hav said in it, and so I ask my special friends, each one, to try and get new subscribers and send it in as Elmina's, and thus make up to our perhaps too liberal publisher his loss by being so broad and free as to admit into his columns such unpopular, though useful, truths as these upon sexual intemperance and its deplorable consequences.

"Yet it is right, I know that it is right;
My heart, my conscience, all my highest, best,
Proclaim my duty spite of honor's crest,
Or love, or joy, or other's woe or bliss.
It must be done, though utter nothingness
Should be the bare result of all its glow,
It is the right, and I must meet the blow."

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

ADRIAN, MICH., Jan. 4, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I agree with D. C. Coleman and others that you are the right man to make a trip around this little planet of ours, and to take your time for it. You need not waste much more of your time with those Christian cathedrals and their forms of worship, as from what you hav already said we are pretty well posted on the matter now. But we will want to know something about the old Brahman and Buddha religion, and their temples of worship. Also of the Christian missionaries, and in what esteem they are held by the religionists of the east. But we will not dictate to you, as by your letters from Europe we hav all confidence that you will giv us such a history of the places through which you may pass as no other traveler ever has. And now as Mr. Coleman has made one proposition, which is a good one, and with which many it seems are willing to fall in with, I will now make another proposition, and it is this: I will agree to send to you between now and the time you may leave the sum of fifty dollars in cash for books, tracts, and THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I will now commence by sending you a P. O. money order for seventeen dollars' worth of literature. As I now hav my home matters on the farm in such a shape (or nearly so) that I can be away as well as not, I am going out on missionary work, to lecture on the origin and progress of the Christian religion, and in the place of this superstition to point out the path that will lead us upward and onward toward a higher and happier life; and as for the hereafter, we will not bother our brains about that now, but we will hold ourselvs in readiness to attend to the things of the hereafter when we get there by having fulfilled all the duties of the present life. I will take with me literature that will read as I talk. So if I fail in talking it out plain enough they can furnish themselvs with the reading matter at the same price as though they were at your office in New York.

S. D. MOORE.

DAVIS P. O., LA., Dec. 25, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: For many years I hav been a slave of the church and superstition. I rejoice to-day that I am free. My mind has been led from error to truth by the grand lectures and orations of America's greatest son, R. G. Ingersoll. All men owe you a debt of gratitude, and you deserve the thanks of all free men and women because of your imprisonment. For your conviction the church deserves the fate which she is surely meeting in this land of freedom.

Kill the Devil.

Why not Josse kilee debil?
Besse ting Josse can do!
Makee veto on de evil,
Makee mendee for de "Fall,
Damee snakee—save us all.

Mabee Josse kilee debil,
Savee Chinaman from woe.
Josse headee berry level,
Josse makee goodee so!
Dissee way God-damee sin,
Disse makee Josse win.

When will Josse killee debil?
Josse havee mightee will.
Josse headee goodee lebel,
Muchee mercee, much skill.
"Godee makee big mistakee,"
"God no killee damee makee."

Josse comee killee debil,
Chinaman he not can tell.
Mabee neber killee debil,
Puttee Chinaman in hell.
Godee berree unconcernee,
Hotee hellee makee burnee.

Dot Night After Grishmus.

BY W. A. FAZE.

'Twas dot night after Grishmus,
Down by mine saloon,
Not a cushtomer comes,
Not even a coon.
Dose dables stands idle
Vere dose gamplers do blay,
Unt dot fool mit his money
Gets parted away.

Dose schooners vas resting
Down-side-up over dere,
Like dey vait for dot bummer
To order his peer;
Dose chairs unt dose benches
Looks like dey vas dumb,
Unt dey vinks at each udder
Cause dat rowdy don't come.

Den I stirs up dot fire,
Unt I makes dings all right,
Unt I dinks uf dose games
Dot dey blays evry night.
Somedimes dey blays euchre,
Unt den dey blays bluff,
Ven dey lies unt dey sheats.
Unt dot kind of stuff.

Dose deacons and elders
Blays checkers unt dice,
Cause dey say dot dose poker
Don't vas very nice.
Dot's de vay mit dose Ghristians
Ven first dey begin,
Dey don't would blay carts,
Cause dot vas a sin.

Vas a lot uf young fellers,
Dey calls Young Men's C. A.,
Brings a note from dot breacher,
Or, by tam, dey don't blay;
Cause venever you trust dem
You don't git dot cash;
Uf all uf dose dead beats
Dey is de worst uf dot trash.

Dey hav a game uf dere own,
Unt dey calls dot pe-dro.
Ven dat deacon blays mit dem
Den dey calls dat San-cho.
Somedimes dey feels gilty,
Den dey schwears by St. John
Dot dey makes dot game better
Den dey blays mit dot don.

But of all of dose games
Vat dey blays evry night,
Dere is one looks so funny
Dot I dinks don't vas right;
Dey deals round dose cards,
Den he says vat you pout?
Unt he says, vel I beg,
Dat dey calls seven out.

Somedimes dose little boys
Gets an old, greasy pack,
Unt dey vatch dat old man
Ven he turns him his back.
Den dey stheals dem away,
Unt dey hides in dot hedge,
Unt dey blays mit dot game,
Unt dey calls dot old sledge.

Dot game was so schtrange,
But I don't could tell why,
Dot dot two spot vas low,
But dot one spot vas high;
For dot biggest fool living
In under dot sun
Knows dot two glasses lager,
Vas better as one.

But tish sure 'bout dot game
Vot dey calls seven out,
Dot dot gampler ven dealing
Knows vot he's about.
But dot seven out game
Don't right to me seem,
Ven dot jack vas such fool
To be took by dot queen.

Vell! dey say vote for Garfield
But dot boom beat dem Dutch,
But if dot ish dot boom
Den I don't like him much;
I schtay in dot saloon
Until midnight is near,
Not a rowdy comes round
To buy me my peer.

Den I gets myself mad,
Unt goes my counter pehind.
I say Chake, hav a drink?
Unt I say, I don't mind;
Den I takes down dot Bourbon,
Unt I makes me a sling,
Dot vas heaven to dot tramp,
Unt vould tickle dot king.

Den I looks in dot drawer,
Unt I counts up dot cash,
Unt I foots up dot profit—
It vas nothing but trash;
Ven I counts all dose nickels,
Unt I counts dem again,
It vas nothing, but nothing,
And always, de same.

Now all my good beeples
In dot city around,
In all dot vide world
There don't can be found
A city with half so much Gospel within
Vere dose beeples can boast
Dot dey's got so much sin.

Der reason fur dot
I pelieve 'twas der trute,
Ven a man he vas mean
He don't hav to skute;
Unt dose Ghristians vill say
'Twas an Infidel game,
Unt on dot poor devil
Dey lay all dot blame.

Unt now my good friends,
Ven dot story did end,
Don't say dot poor devil
He don't got some friend;
I'll tell you one and all
From dot pole to dot isthmus,
Dot dish all come about
On dot night after Ghrismus.

Sixteen Saviors or None.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Being a reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examins all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other, and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and themselvs, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. Price, 75 cents, pamphlet; $1, bound.

CONSULT

Your Case Is Curable!

You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, N. J.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

Purchasers of PLAIN HOME TALK are at liberty to CONSULT ITS AUTHOR, in person or by mail, FREE. Price of the new Popular Edition, by mail, postage prepaid, only $1.50. Contents table free. AGENTS WANTED. MURRAY HILL PUBLISHING COMPANY, 129 East 28th st., New York.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

"The Gods and Other Lectures."

Special Notice from Bliss' Chief's Band.

Me, Red Cloud, speak for Blackfoot, the great Medicin Chief from happy hunting grounds. He say he love white chiefs and squaws. He travel like the wind. He go to circles. Him big chief. Blackfoot want much work to do. Him want to show him healing power. Make sick people well. Where paper go, Blackfoot go. Go quick. Send right away. No wampum for three moon.

This spirit message was first published in "Mind and Matter," January 10, M. S. 32, with the announcement that magnetized paper would be sent to all who were sick in body or mind that desired to be healed, also to those that desired to be developed as spirit mediums, for three months for three three-cent stamps. The three months closed with the following result: 3,405 persons hav sent for the paper by mail, one thousand persons hav received it at the office; and the hundreds of testimonials that hav been received of its wonderful work in healing the sick and developing mediums prove that Red Cloud and Blackfoot hav faithfully kept promises. From January 10th, M. S. 32, to January 10th, M. S. 33, over 15,000 persons hav sent for this paper, and thousands hav been benefited by its use. That all may hav an opportunity to test the merits of the paper, the price for the future will be as follows: one sheet, postage paid, ten cents; twelve sheets, one dollar. Send a silver ten cent piece if you can. Address James A. Bliss, 713 Sansom street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Gems of Thought.

IF it is not right, do not do it; if it is not true, do not say it.—Antoninus.

MAKE friends and you will hav friends. Make enemies and you will hav enemies.—Anon.

EVERY religion that casts a shadow over the soul or tends to produce a gloomy state of mind is an offshoot of some form of devil-worship—is hell-engendered and false.—Cerenus.

THE most powerful being on earth is man; the most beautiful is woman. The graces unite in her; in him the forces. He loves her as the embodiment of all the virtues; she worships him as the incarnation of omnipotence.—Anon.

ONE world at a time—this is my doctrin. It is said in the New Testament, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof," and I say, sufficient unto each world is the evil thercof. And suppose, after all, that death does end all. Next to eternal happiness, next to being forever with those we love and those who hav loved us, next to that is to be wrapped in the dreamless drapery of eternal peace.—Ingersoll.

IT would be more consistent with intellectual or spiritual freedom to liv under the whole Mosaic routine of external practices, than under the obligation of receiving the philosophy, history, chronology, and astronomy of the Bible. Whoever does not feel this cannot be a judge of this question. Mental freedom—the right to giv free scope to the noblest powers of his nature—would be a dead letter to such a man. —J. Blanco White.

THERE are some opinions in which a man should stand neuter [neutral?], without engaging his assent to one side or the other. Such a hovering faith as this, which refuses to settle upon any determination, is absolutely necessary in a mind that is careful to avoid errors and prepossessions. When the arguments press equally on both sides in matters that are indifferent to us, the safest method is to giv up ourselvs to neither.—Addison.

SOME modern apologists are fond of arguing that Christianity was revolting to the ordinary mind, in order to prove that its success was miraculous. They are afraid to admit that it was adapted to the wants of the time lest its growth should be regarded as spontaneous. And therefore do their best to prove that human nature is naturally revolted by purity and humility, just as Warburton declared it to be so corrupt that nothing but the fear of hell could preserve it from utter decay.—Leslie Stephen.

THERE is no doubt that a judgment may be formed of nature in general from looking at each nature in its most perfect specimens; and what is a more perfect speciman of a man than those are who look on themselvs as born for the assistance, the protection, and the preservation of others? Hercules has gone to heaven; he never would hav gone thither had he not whilst among men made that road for himself. These things are of old date, and hav, besides, the sanction of universal religion.—Cicero.

All the alleged properties of the soul, whence its immortality is deduced, are most arbitrarily attributed to it. We hav learned from closer observations in the domain of psychology that the body and soul, even if we continue to distinguish between them as to separate essences, are nevertheless so nearly united, the so-called soul so entirely conditioned by the nature and circumstances of its material organ, the brain, that its continuance is unimaginable without it. . . A thing so closely and completely bound to a physical organism can as little exist after the latter's destruction as the center of a circle can exist after the dissolution of the circumference.—Strauss.

IF Noah's righteousness sufficed for his salvation, why were his family equally admitted to favor? That they were not guiltless beings is apparent from the patriarch, immediately that the judgment was over, finding cause for cursing one of the three branches of which it consisted. There was partiality in excepting these sinners, as there was in making exceptions among the animal tribes, if they were justly liable. And what a confused lesson hav we from the constructiv sentence, the harmless animals suffering because of guilty man and the guilty family saved because of the righteousness of one of them! The judgment was, moreover, wholly ineffectual as a remedial measure. What was to be gained by sweeping off one wicked generation, to renew the earth with fresh generations of inevitable sinners? And why if the judgment was suitable for correction should the divinity hav pledged himself never to repeat it? The guilt must recur and why not the punishment?—Strange's "Legends of the Old Testament."

RIGHT generation and right living are the foundation stones of all organizations. We cannot hav good workers unless they are born good, and then properly reared and cared for. And where, then, is the impropriety of this "plank" in a really broad and liberal platform? While life is such an abundant principle, or property of matter, it is absolutely necessary there should be some check to the increase of the human family just as there is to all other forms of life—animal or vegetable. There are few animals who would not in time overrun the earth were not the increase checked, and the same of plants. If any single variety could produce to its utmost capacity, and under the most favorable circumstances, it would monopolize the whole earth to the exclusion of all other living identities. Now science and knowledge are all the time removing the obstacles to man's health, improvement, and long life, and making it easier for him to "perpetuate and increase," as well as to prolong individual lives, and the day is rapidly approaching when something will hav to be done to "check the increase," if we would hav a world of joy, happiness, and intelligence, instead of one of misery, want, woe, strife, and starvation, where a favored and lucky few would be enabled to hav enough to eat, to say nothing of all the comforts and luxuries now so abundant and desirable.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

AS THE twig is bent the boy is inclined to shoot out the door.

SAILORS had rather "double the horn" on shore than at sea.

THE Detroit Free Press asks, "Is a clothing store a coterie, a pantry, or a vestry?"

THE first American inscription put upon the obclisk will be, "Post no bills."

WHAT this country wants is less politics and more pumpkin pies.—Elmira Free Press.

RUNNING your business is very much like courting a girl. No one else can boss the job but yourself.

SOME folks are unfortunately three-handed. They hav a right hand, a left hand, and a little behind hand.

MRS. PARTINGTON said that a gentleman laughed so heartily that she feured he would burst his jocular vein.

PATRICK on the Zebra: "Phat kind of a baste is that—the mule wid his ribs on the outside of his shkin intoirly?"

A CINCINNATI dyer recently went insane from political excitement. We suppose the more he red the madder he got.

A YOUNG lady on being asked where her nativ place was, replied, "I hav none; I am the daughter of a Methodist minister."

A MAN who has ridden in a country stage-coach knows how cream feels when it is being churned into butter.—Boston Transcript.

A LITTLE boy being told by his mother to take a powder she had prepared, he exclaimed: "Powder, powder, mother? I ain't a gun."

ON being asked whether he was guilty, a New York criminal answered, "I guess I am, judge, but I'd like to be tried all the same."

MR. BUDD asked her, "Rose, wilt thou be mine?" Rose answered, "I am sorry it cannot be, for a rose cannot be turned into a bud."

"DO WE eat too much?" asked the Detroit Free Press, and out of five dozen boarding-house keepers sixty answered in the affirmativ.

"DARN the newspapers; why can't they leave such items out?" exclaimed an undertaker when he read an article warning people not to eat green fruit.

"MERCY!" exclaimed an old lady, on first seeing an engraving of the passage of the Red Sea by the children of Israel; "mercy! what a family that man had!"

MANY physicians claim that intemperance is a disease. It must be contagious then; at any rate a man who gets drunk usually catches it when he goes home.

IN a severe gale a lady asked a neighbor if he was not afraid his house would blow away. "Oh, no," was the answer, "the mortgage on it is so heavy as to make it impossible."

"WHEN I was your age," said old farmer Brown, "I rose with the lark."

"I beat you clear out of sight," said Tom, wearily and triumphantly, "I've been up all night with him."

"JOHN, why was you so late last night?" "It wan't so very late—only a quarter of twelve." "Oh, how dare you sit there and say that? I was awake when you came in, and it was three o'clock." "Well, isn't three a quarter of twelve?"

A WAG circulated a report that a certain rich old farmer had been "running rapidly through his property." The farmer called on him to "retract the slander," when the wag said he saw him "running through his property" with his brindle bull after him.

WHY HE COULDN'T DRINK IN COMFORT.

"Is this a barroom?" asked a strapping fellow in a coonskin cap and a butternut suit, as he eyed the pile of glasses and glittering bottles.

"Certainly, sir; what'll you hav, sir?" answered and inquired the white-aproned attendant.

"I reckon not," responded the coonskin, glancing around suspiciously. "Where's the barrels you sit on?"

"We keep the barrels in the cellar."

"Where's the gang sittin' around the stove and ready to waltz up at the sight of coin?"

"We don't allow any sitting around here. When a gentleman drinks he goes out."

"Where's the man with his eyes gouged out?" demanded coonskin, in a whisper.

"We don't hav any such parties here. Can I do anything for you?"

"Ain't you got any odd noses somewhere?" asked the visitor, with a worried expression.

"No, we havn't," responded the barkeeper, firmly.

"Will the man who tomahawks strangers be in directly?" interrogated coonskin after a short pause.

"Don't know any such man. If you want anything, ask for it."

"But the fellow that shoots the glass out of your mouth without spilling the p'ison; where might he be?"

"Perhaps you had better go away from here. I think you had better go out."

"Say them words again, pardner. That sounds like it. That's natural."

"Get out, or I'll throw you out."

"Oh, now you're whisperin', stranger! Fling it over to me. Club me once or twice. Put a bullet through this nigh lung. You're a shoutin' now. Gimme some judgment sunrise. Talk to me again. Why didn't you declare yourself at first, pardner? Why did you hold back? Throw me the tan bark."

And he poured out an allopathic dose and downed it, paid for it, and walked off.

A mountain man can't enjoy his whisky in a barroom that doesn't in some way remind him of home.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 8. No. 4. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. | New York, Saturday, January 22, 1881. | SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. | $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

On the 28th of last month took place the thirty-fourth case of cremation at Gotha. The first occurred on the 10th of December, 1878.

The exports of grain from the port of New York during the year 1880 reached 107,000,000 bushels, an excess of nearly 18,000,000 bushels over the exports of any previous year.

Charles Bradlaugh, who has been challenged to fight a duel by M. Laisant, of Paris, offers to submit the question of his acceptance of the challenge to the decision of a jury of honor.

The Chicago Tribune thinks that there are no grounds for a Chinese labor scare. In a population of 684,000 in California there are less than 30,000 Chinese, and the number is rapidly diminishing.

M. D. Conway writes from London that English ladies at present dress in much better taste than their American cousins. Their toilets are not so loud now, and in elegance eclipse those of the Parisians.

The authorities in London recently sent a detectiv to Mr. Bradlaugh to inform him that they were in possession of sworn information that there was a plot to assassinate him. The person who gav the information said that he had everheard a party of foreigners arranging to kill Mr. Bradlaugh on his way home from the House of Commons.

A nut for Vanderbilt to crack. If the birds could think, what would they think of us under the present relations of labor to capital? Why, precisely what we should think of the birds if we saw one crow sitting amid a heap of grain so large that he could not eat it in a thousand years and a host of half-starved birds slaving themselvs to death to add to his pile.

The Rev. Dr. McCosh of Princeton takes a more hopeful view of things than some of his brethren. He is not alarmed by the presence of Agnosticism, Materialism, and pessimism. In a recent Monday lecture at Boston he bade the doubting Down-East saints take fresh courage. "The time for reaction has come," he said. "We are at the darkest hour. I am looking for the sun to rise."

The truth is that the supposed natural wealth of Central Africa has no existence. The East African expedition has done great good by bringing this fact to the knowledge of the civilized world. The clear and positiv evidence which it affords on the subject will tend to prevent waste of money, waste of effort, and waste of life in enterprises which would certainly prove futil in such a field.—Sun.

It is a poor rule that will not work both ways. The proposition of the Essex County Grand Jury to re-establish the whipping-post for wife-beaters has a good deal of justice in it. The gentlemen who amuse themselvs staving their spouses' ribs in and decorating their persons with bruises and stripes would not be so liberal in these demonstrations if they knew they would receive a taste of the same treatment themselvs. The lash for the wife-beater has proved valuable in England. Why should it not here?

The Rev. Mr. Shorey, in a sermon preached in Boston Music Hall, said, "The political bosses are not more exacting or jealous of their powers than the religious bosses in the churches." He gave this as one of the reasons why many people stay away from church. There are many instances in which a cheap sort of tyrant, who could not anywhere else find a chance to rule, acquires a certain amount of superiority over his brethren, and becomes what Brother Shorey call a "religious boss." There is more of the "boss" in the nature of such a man than there is of pure and undefiled religion. He generally gets the church into some quarrel or other, after making it a very uncomfortable place for the newcomers and others over whom he has tyrannized.

Frank Lambert accused his uncle, the Rev. Wm. G. Browning, who was executor of the estate of Mr. Lambert's grandfather, Wm. Browning, of having fraudulently induced him (Lambert) to sell his interest in the partition of his grandfather's real estate for $10,000, knowing such interest to be worth $20,000. Judge Lawrence, in Supreme Court, Special Term, yesterday, in a suit by Mr. Lambert against the Rev. Mr. Browning, gave judgment requiring the latter to pay the difference between the price he gave and the actual value of his nephew's share.

The progress of languages spoken by different peoples is said to be as follows: English, which at the commencement of the century was spoken by only 22,000,000, is now spoken by 90,000,000; Russian by 63,000,000 instead of 30,000,000; German by 66 million instead of 38 million; Spanish by 44 million instead of 32 million; Italian by 30 million instead of 18 million; Portuguese by 13 million instead of 8 million. This is for England an increase of 310 per cent; for Russia, 110 per cent; for Germany, 70 per cent; for Spain, 36 per cent, etc. In the case of France the increase has been from 44 million to 46 million, or 36 per cent.

The spiritual materialization business goes on briskly. Mrs. Crindle is the latest medium to astonish the believers. A feature of her wonders is the variation in the sizes of the dead persons who appear. The Banner of Light says: "One of the forms was that of a child about four years of age, with the most exquisit face poet's or painter's fancy could embody in verse or put on canvas. Its baby prattle and singing were quite bewildering as its childish accents rose and fell in the 'Sweet By and By.' A majestic form of exquisit mold and fine proportions, beautifully arrayed in white satin and pearls, with a diadem on her head, was announced as the Empress Josephine." Another of Mrs. Crindle's ghosts is a gentleman who talks through a trumpet.

An association of physicians in Hamburg hav been studying the case of Kobelkow, a Russian, who was born without arms or legs, or anything to supply their places except a very short stump attached to the right shoulder, yet who can drink, eat, fire off pistols, thread needles, and even write. Indeed, he can write so well that for a year and a half he acted as copyist in Russian employ. All this he acquired the ability to do with his mouth, aided by the stump dependent from his right shoulder. Although by birth such a monstrosity, Kobelkow does not present a repulsiv spectacle. He has always been in good health, cheerful, rather pleased to see the interest that he awakens, and is, besides, happily married and the father of two sturdy children.

Every now and then some orthodox newspaper points with an appearance of pious exultation to the fact that New England Unitarianism is no longer making any converts to speak of. The implication is that Unitarianism, as a working religion, is a failure. But what, then, are we to think of orthodox New England Congregationalism? From figures published in the Christian Mirror, it appears that of ten financially prosperous Congregational churches in the state of Maine, three did not receive a single new member last year, five received one new member apiece, one received three new members, and the tenth church received four. That is to say, these ten churches, with educated and eloquent pasters, with the approved machinery of Sunday preaching, Sunday-schools, prayer-meetings, and pastoral visitations, with an aggregate membership of 2,226, hav only twelve new members to show for the work of twelve months. At this rate the Independent estimates that religion—we take it to mean the orthodox Congregational variety—will become extinct in these Maine communities in two generations. Here is a state of things that might well hav more serious consideration than it has yet received at the hands of the assemblies, conferences, synods, councils, presbyteries, and preachers' Monday meetings.—Sun.

The embellishment emblazoned on the cover of a domestic missionary journal is intended to convey the idea of an angel relieving the necessities of poor orphans. The angel wears large spreading wings like those of a goose. On her head is a great round bread plate, intended either for a hat or for a halo of glory. Beside her stand two children. In her right hand is a bowl of porridge with which she covers the face of one child, and from which she makes him drink in a way calculated to choke him. In the other hand she holds the nose and chin of the other child in such a manner as to indicate her desire to close his mouth and nostrils, and thus asphyxiate the lad. But as the picture is labelled "Charity," it is evident that the intentions of the angel are better than at first sight they seem.

Havana is said to be the least religious of civilized cities. There are in that city a number of old church buildings which are used for storehouses and cigar factories. The cathedral, in which are said to be the bones of Christopher Columbus, might be supposed to be well-attended, even if only by strangers visiting it from curiosity. But even in this remarkable old sanctuary the congregation does not average more than thirty persons. The strangers in Havana do not generally inquire for churches on Sunday as they do in other cities. There is no register of the churches kept at the hotels, and when an exceptional hotel guest happens to ask a hotel clerk where to go to church that official opens his eyes in astonishment, as if he only imperfectly understood what a church is, and why any body should want to go to one.

The religious statistics of the Maine legislature ought to attract general attention. They show the religious status of New England. It is the drift period in New England theology. One hundred and eighty-two members compose the Senate and House. Of these only eighteen, or one in ten, are orthodox Congregationalists, accepting the original New England faith. Nevertheless, only seven of the 182 were born outside of the state. Nativ stock, but an alien creed, according to the Plymouth Rock standard. If these eighteen Puritans were disposed to persecute, as did their ancestors of notable memory, they would find a fair assortment of victims among their fellow-members, namely, sixteen Baptists, three Quakers, three Churchmen, and one Roman Catholic. More than thirty of these legislators hav no religious preferences; more than thirty are Universalists, while of the college graduates in the legislature, about twenty in all, only three are Congregationalists.

J. Martin, in the New York Sun, under the head of "An Admonition to the Clergy," goes on as follows: "Modern evangelists, surrounded with grandeur and magnificence, with palatial mansions to reside in, well clad and fed, ascend to their cosy pulpits on Sunday and preach humility and self-abnegation. They exhort you to feel contented with the sphere of life in which it has pleased God to place you. They impress upon the plastic heart that this condition of existence is merely probational, the valley of the shadow of death, a vale of tears; while they themselvs enjoy to the fullest possible extent the good things of life in their almost endless variety. Still, tolerably intelligent people pay tribute to such men, and continue to acknowledge them as a faithful reflex of Christian faith. Now, I ask, can it be a matter of such great surprise that modern religion is growing more and more contemptible in the estimation of the world's growing intelligence? Let the rich prelacy of the Christian faith evidence their honesty of purpose less in their precepts and more in their examples."

Report of a Debate

BETWEEN THE REV. A. HATCHARD AND MRS. ANNIE BESANT, AT THE HALL OF SCIENCE, LONDON.

FIRST NIGHT.—CONTINUED.

MR. HATCHARD.

As our time is precious, I proceed at once to business. If I remember rightly, Mrs. Besant challenged my reference to Suetonius. Mrs. Besant quoted from the Rev. Dr. Giles, from his book on the "Christian Records." I hold in my hand another book, which I shall be happy to giv her if she has not got it. It is called Dr. Giles' "Heathen Records." I quote from this, and there can be no double-dealing in the matter, as Dr. Giles givs in the one page the Latin and the other the English. This is what Suetonius says with regard to Claudius: "He expelled from Rome the Jews, who were continually making disturbances, having Chrestus for their instigator." My version of it is this, and you Freethinkers of London may laugh at it if you like: just about that particular time when Claudius Cæsar lived, there was a discussion and a dispute amongst the Jews in Rome about Jesus as to whether he was the Messiah; and Claudius Cæsar says to the Jews, "Depart! go!" There, you hav my version of it. Laugh at it if you like. Nero: "The Christians, a race of men of a new and baneful superstition, were punished." Now, here is the passage; I don't care what you make of it. Well, now, I am not going to be led away by any red herring drawn across the trail. [A voice, "Argument!"] I am arguing! I hav told you that I believe in the miraculous element. Laugh if you like. Now, then, listen again, if you please. Mrs. Besant says that she does not think much of Irenæus, whose name you hav mentioned here [pointing to diagram]. I simply, and I say as briefly as I can, proceed with my argument. What Mrs. Besant says about Tacitus I will not say a word to you on. I hav not the slightest doubt that you will go away and say, "What an ignorant, benighted man!"—["Question, question."]—at least that is the way I believe you talk about clergymen. [Cries of "Question" and interruption].

[The Chairman here remarked that it would be better to go on with the argument and not indulge in personalities.]

Ladies and gentlemen, there is no animosity in my mind. I speak to you fearlessly and frankly. I stand here without fear or favor. If I understand Mrs. Besant's "Freethinkers' Text Book" rightly, she does admit here substantially in this book the accuracy of the passage in Tacitus. I may hav misunderstood her. Very good; then I say I put the passage of Tacitus before you, and let me say all the Freethinkers in Europe, or any body of Freethinkers, cannot break it down. I hav consulted with men older than myself. I hav a knowledge of the Secularist party, not of to-day, but of twenty years or more. [Murmuring, and a voice, "Proceed to business."] I say now Mrs. Besant has told you that the Christians were known, as I understood her to say, before the time of Christ. Freethinkers of London, I stand here to say that there is not an atom of proof of that. I hav read that little book, "Chrestos," which is advertised in the National Reformer, and published by Williams & Norgate. I hav read that, and I simply say I was rather amused in reading it. I simply pass it by. There is not an atom of proof. There were the sects of what are called the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Essenes. I challenge the proof, and know it can't be brought, that Jesus of Nazareth belonged to the sect of the Essenes. Bring to me the proof that Jesus of Nazareth and John the Baptist belonged to the sect of the Essenes. Here let me giv you this, and I am glad that Mrs. Besant has let herself into my hands. I hav a great respect for Mrs. Besant. I hope to see Mrs. Besant return to the Church of England. I hope to know that Mrs. Besant is from this platform preaching the gospel of Jesus of Nazareth. [Cries of "Question."]

Mrs. Besant has challenged the testimony of Josephus to Jesus of Nazareth; but will she challenge it with regard to John the Baptist? Josephus givs you an account. I say that Josephus substantially confirms the gospel history when he givs you an account of John the Baptist, which nobody ventures to challenge, as far as I know; and grant me John the Baptist, and I will prove Jesus of Nazareth by collateral evidence. I don't care a straw about that passage about 10,000 this and 10,000 the other; it amounts to nothing.

Now, before I sit down I want to drive home to you the testimony of St. Paul the apostle. You can't tell me that Paul the apostle never lived, for, if you do, I will overwhelm you with Jewish testimony. Oh! I know all about this matter. Many of my friends are Jews, and I tell you Jews hav armed me for this conflict. If you want something to read I will make you a present of this (holding up a book); I believe you've got a library here. What do I find in Paul the apostle's writings? He substantially corroborates the gospel narrativ, and he supplies several instances which the gospels do not record. Now, then, I shall be told that Paul was deceived! that Paul was an enthusiast! that Paul was a demagog! that he invented these things! that he was a dishonest man! Great heavens! I open the epistle to the Romans and I read one of the most logical, convincing, and satisfactory works with regard to Christianity that could be penned. Read them! Are they the words of a dreamer? Are they the words of an enthusiast? Never! Why, ladies and gentlemen—members of Parliament, or whom you please—they are the words of a sober, honest, cautious, logical thinker, a man brought up at the feet of the greatest of Jewish rabbis—Gamaliel.

MRS. BESANT.

Mrs. Besant, who then rose to make her concluding speech, and was received with hearty applause, said:

I will first as briefly as possible finish the argument upon which I entered, showing the weakness of the evidence within the first century on which my opponent relies. The dispute which is supposed to be mentioned in Suetonius has nothing to do with this debate. If the persons there mentioned were Christians, if Suetonius did mention them, it goes for nothing in this argument; I admit the existence of the Christians, and I make this admission in order to show you that I don't trouble to stop and challenge that which might refer to Christians, but which does not refer to Christ. I neither deny, nor challenge, nor accept the reference to John the Baptist in Josephus. It does not come within the limits of this discussion, which has reference only to the question of the existence of the historical Jesus depicted in the gospels. Paul may hav been a very wise man or a very foolish man. It does not touch the subject with which we hav to deal to-night. I am still dealing with the first speech of my opponent, the one which contains all his real arguments.

Speaking of Ignatius, whose name is put forward by Mr. Hatchard, I may say that I do not accept Ignatius as reliable. He tells us, indeed, that the star appeared to the magi, and further that "all the rest of the stars, with the sun and moon, formed a chorus to this star" (Ep. to the Ephesians, chap. xix). Why rely on his story of the star and reject his story of the chorus? It is alleged with respect to Justin Martyr that the "Memoirs" of which he speaks are the same as the gospels; but it is admitted by my opponent that many of the texts are not the same. Printing not being invented, we are told that the manuscripts of these works were costly and not attainable by the people, and that it is very likely in quoting from memory that these slight inaccuracies should occur. But I urge that the only reason for quoting these authorities at all is to show that their gospels and yours are one and the same, and if you admit that the quotations are inaccurate, what becomes of your proof? You hav yet to prove that Justin Martyr had access to the same gospels that we hav to-day, and we must also remember that that Justin Martyr quotes the acts of Paul as authoritativ, just as he does the "Memoirs." In quoting the text as to the sweat falling down as "drops of blood," I think my opponent ought to hav told you that the words "of blood" do not appear in Justin, and destroy his argument. Justin was trying to prove that the prophecy, "My bones are poured out like water," was fulfilled in Christ when "his sweat fell down like drops while he was praying" (Dial. chap. ciii). It is hardly fair to insert "of blood" in order to make a resemblance where there is none. Then, again, if you take the story of Justin you will find it very different from the story of the gospels; for instance, that Christ was born in a cave and not in a stable, and so on, with a mass of small discrepancies. You might fairly say, How do you explain the general likeness which you find in the four gospels? I believe that various churches had various oral versions of the life of Christ, and that as the years went on they grew vaguer and vaguer, and it was thought wise to write them down. This is the view taken by Dean Alford, and it is the one which I am inclined to adopt, in common with many others.

This is the view which is taken by the Rev. Mr. Sanday, and which is to a great extent held by Canon Westcott. I allege, and I am quoting from Canon Westcott's work on the Canon, where he sums up the value of the evidence from the Apostolic Fathers: "1. No evangelic reference in the Apostolic Fathers can be referred certainly to a written record; 2. It appears most probable from the form of the quotations that they were derived from oral tradition; 3. No quotation contains any element which is not substantially preserved in our gospels; 4. When the text given differs from the text of our gospels, it represents a later form of evangelical tradition; 5. The text of St. Matthew corresponds more nearly than the other synoptic texts with the quotations and references as a whole" [Canon of the New Test., ed. 1875, p. 62]. That is the conclusion come to by Canon Westcott. That is, I should say, substantially accurate, save that I should, of course, somewhat demur to his third statement. I turn then from this evidence, which is no evidence at all, and I will only say further that if you want to break down the whole of the argument as to the existence of these written gospels in the first century, turn to that remarkable work called "Supernatural Religion." There you will find the Apostolic Fathers dealt with one by one with an exactness and detail which I cannot here pretend to use. I hav, then, failed to find corroborativ evidence outside; I hav failed to find in the writings of the Fathers the enormous weight of evidence which I require. Remember, I want evidence of the miraculous. I hav now to deal with four uncorroborated witnesses. Do I find that my four witnesses agree with one another? Do I find that their testimony is one? that the voice is one although it comes from four mouths? Remember the story of the birth of Jesus. Reconcile the story in Matthew with the story in Luke. Find how in one gospel we are dealing with people who come from Nazareth. Read the other where you hear nothing at all of Nazareth in the first place, and when reference is made to it later, it is made in a way that clearly indicates that it was not their own home, but a new place to them—"a city called Nazareth."

Take the story of Herod, and I must say that it is strange that Josephus, who has told you the story of Herod with great fulness of detail, has not one word of this remarkable and monstrous crime. Pass around the story of the birth and take it bit by bit. See how Herod, instead of troubling himsel about the wise men and their star, might hav gone to the temple in Jerusalem, his own capital, and there hav seized the young child; remember how, according to Luke, Jesus was carried to the temple, had sacrifice offered for him, was greeted by Simon, and rejoiced over by Anna. Take the difficulty that according to one account the young child and his mother fled down to Egypt to escape from Herod, and only returned after Herod's death, while according to the other they went up to Jerusalem, and after quietly performing all the duties imposed by the law, returned peacefully to "their own city, Nazareth." It must, indeed, be a miraculous child who managed to be at Nazareth and in Egypt at one and the same time.

Pass to the story of the temptation. Do you believe that that is matter of history and not a myth? Do you believe that there was a wonderfully high mountain, so high and so curiously placed that from it you could see all round a sphere? and that Jesus and the devil went flying through the air to it, and then flew off to Jerusalem and perched on a pinnacle of the temple, surely to the amazement of the people in the streets?

Pass to the comparison of John and the three synoptics. You will find they bear no likeness; that they are different in incidents, different in place, different in character.

Pass to the story of the crucifixion, and learn how Christ was crucified at the third hour, although he was exposed by Pilate at the sixth, and how he was standing in full view of the people at the same hour that he was hanging on the cross, enveloped in miraculous darkness. I am dealing now with the historians themselvs, having failed to get any satisfactory evidence outside the records for which we require proof.

Pass to the story of the resurrection, the very center of the Christian creed, and learn how one woman went according to one gospel, and two, and "two and others," according to the rest; how they went while "it was yet dark," although sun was rising; how they wondered when they found that the stone was rolled away, although the stone was still there unrolled away, and they saw an angel come down and roll it away and sit on it. Learn how one angel, or two, or a young man, gave them a message to go to the disciples. Learn how Christ overtook them and gave them exactly the same message over again. Learn how the women were so frightened that they said nothing to any man, although they ran and told the disciples all they had seen. Learn how the disciples went to Galilee although they remained in Jerusalem; how they saw Christ twice at least in Jerusalem, although they did not see him until they got to Galilee; learn how in Galilee some "doubted" his resurrection, although they had him before their eyes. Learn how Christ ascended up into heaven on the day of his resurrection, and then learn how he remained on earth forty days explaining the things concerning the kingdom of God. Don't take the contradictions on my word; but take the four gospels, make if you can anything which will seem like a reconciliation of one to the other, and give a coherent life of Christ—that was my first step towards heresy. But if you ask me whence does the story come, I reply it is the story of the sun-god spread through the whole of eastern lands—of the child born in midwinter, in the sign of the Virgin, surrounded by winter's dangers, passing on through the signs of the Zodiac, struggling with darkness in the critical time of spring, rising at Easter, triumphing over his enemies, rising into mid-heaven, sitting on the right hand of God the Father, sending down his beams to make the bread and the wine—symbols of his very body and blood. Whence does Christ come? He comes not only from the sun-god, but from Chrishna, the incarnate Indian deity; Chrishna, born of Devaki, hymned by devas, flying from the wrath of Kansa; Chrishna, who had the children slain around him while he escaped; Chrishna, healing the sick, causing the lame to walk, opening the eyes of the blind, raising the dead, crucified, risen, ascended. You will find him, with the sacred stigmata on his hands and feet, carven in the ancient Indian temples which remain to-day. Where does Christ come from? He comes from every place where superstition has been stronger than science. He comes from every land where people hav for ages marveled at the mysteries around them which they could not understand; where they made their theories first and found their facts afterwards. I urge to you that my opponent has failed. The Fathers hav lamentably broken down in their evidence. No pagan writer givs us any fact which can buttress the Christ of the gospels; and when you come to your four witnesses you cannot for one moment trust them, you cannot for one moment believe them, when they tell you the story of your Christ. I say of him, in the words of the Roman poet, "All these figments of crack-brained opiniatry and silly solaces played off in the sweetness of song by deceitful poets, by you, too credulous creatures, hav been shamefully reformed and made over to your god."

What Objections to Christianity?

I feel the greatest freedom to characterize the perversions of former Infidels by proper titles without fearing having infringed on proper courtesy, but when I detect equal errors in your representations I am extremely loth to apply epithets. Besides, the epitheta ornata of a discussion seldom carry any force. To correct, therefore, without forgetting to be courteous, the ridiculous aspect in which you make Bishop Watson appear, I shall lay before the reader your excerpt and assertion, contrasting it with correct quotation without further comment than is necessary to obtain a truthful understanding of his meaning. You say: "Bishop Watson's reply to Gibbon hardly meets the case. 'However mysterious the darkness at the crucifixion might have been, I have no doubt the power of God was as much concerned in its production as it was in opening the graves and the resurrection of the dead bodies of the saints that slept, which accompanied that darkness' [Third Letter to Gibbon.] Thus the bishop would be glad to prove the darkness by the rising of the dead, and probably the rising of the dead by the darkness."

I have looked in vain through my copy of Watson for any such reasoning in a circle. At the end of the fifth letter I find what I presume is the paragraph from which you quote. I will quote it more fully, with its prophetic opening: "I fear I may be liable to misrepresentation in this place, but I beg it may be observed that however slight in degree, or however confined in extent, the darkness at the crucifixion may have been, I am of opinion that the power of God was as supernaturally exerted in its production, and in that of the earthquake which accompanied it, as in the opening of the graves and the resurrection of the saints which followed the resurrection of Christ."

Instead of it being an argument "to prove the darkness by the rising of the dead," it forms no part of his argument whatever. After expressing his belief that the darkness was slight and of limited extent, lest any one should charge him with reducing it to natural causes, Bishop Watson affirms his belief that however slight and limited the darkness was it was as supernatural as the raising of the dead at the resurrection of Christ. That is the whole design of the paragraph quoted; there is not the remotest approach to any such circular argument as is held up to the laughter of the reader.

Your affirmation about Suetonius, Tacitus, and Josephus has often been met and the contrary fully proved. The denial that Pliny referred to Christians has to me, however, all the charms of startling novelty. With your permission, however, I shall leave further criticism on this paragraph until I have examined the succeeding ones.

The next paragraph reads: "I must confess to you that a smile unavoidably came over my face as I read your attempt to prove that there are 'governmental archives' referring to Jesus. You gave a quotation from the apocryphal gospel called the 'Acts of Pilate,' or 'Gospel of Nicodemus,' as it is also called, which, so far as I am informed, no respectable authority regards as anything else than spurious. The book is made up of the most absurd accounts of Jesus descending into hell, about the conversation which took place between Satan and Hades, of the objections of the latter to Jesus being taken into his dominion, of the shattering of the gates of hell, of the conversations with Adam, Seth, John the Baptist, etc. Much of this gospel is too ridiculous for anybody to believe, and no sensible person for a moment supposes that Pilate ever wrote a word of it. Pretty 'governmental archives' indeed! Is that the best kind of proof you have to offer? The bungling of the forger who got it up may be seen by the claim that Pilate wrote his letter to Claudius Cæsar telling about the ministry and death of Jesus, when Pilate had been recalled by Tiberius and was superseded by another procurator, so that when Claudius became emperor, A. D. 41, Pilate was not in Judea at all, and never wrote a letter to Claudius. You might with the same propriety have introduced as 'governmental archives' the remarkable story of the handkerchief of the woman Veronica, on which handkerchief Jesus instantaneously photographed his own picture, and which afterward cured the emperor Tiberius Cæsar. If you have a taste for those 'big stories,' you can find plenty of them in the canonical and uncanonical gospels. There have been doubtless hundreds of them, and gotten up by interested and ingenious forgers."

Your smile is contagious, and I presume that every reader of my last letter and this will have a similar experience. You might indeed claim a victory over my excessive credulity were your foundation stable, but unfortunately for your argument it is not. In the first place, I did not quote from the "Gospel of Nicodemus;" and in the second, if you will glance at the quotation, you will find that it is directed "Pilate to Tiberius," not Claudius, as you allege. It was customary for the Roman governors throughout the different provinces of her vast empire to transmit to Rome written accounts of the most important events of that region, which reports were filed in the governmental chambers. These different documents were called the Acts of the officials who sent them. Among others Pilate sent an account of his reign to Tiberius, the Acti Pilati, which was extant in the Roman archives in the time of Justin Martyr and Tertullian, both of whom in their apologies often quoted from it. It is from preserved fragments of these that I quoted. You will thus see that had you given my letter a less careless reading, and been more anxious to discover truth than to detect supposed error, you would have been spared the mortification of publishing your own carelessness. I presume, too, that many readers swallowed your witticisms with significant nods, without the slightest testing of its reliability. When a letter is plainly printed "Pilate to Tiberius," it is unpardonable stupidity to criticise it as being directed to Claudius.

When it suits your purpose you make a distinction between Judaism and Christianity, and when you consider it more advantageous to your cause you view them as identical. There is no consistency in such argument. The fact is entirely overlooked that Judaism was a dispensation professedly designed to introduce a higher one, compared with which it was "beggarly elements." Repeatedly is this confession of its own insufficiency and its replacement by a better covenant taught even by itself. You show also a hatred to the Bible, which, while it is undisguised, and so is preferable to the sly, Judas-like treatment of many, yet speaks little for your philosophy or scientific desire for truth. The truth of the denial that the gospel was preached to Adam and so downward, as briefly set forth in my fourth letter, must be judged by circumstances. It seems, though, somewhat of irony in a disputant who has laboriously attempted to prove "that the dogmas, rites, sacraments, and ceremonies as held to and used by Christians were believed in and used by pagans hundreds of years before." I do not think that you have the temerity or disregard for truth to deny that the Jews, several hundred years at least before Christ, looked for a coming Messiah on the strength of the assertions of certain books which they believed to be of divine origin, and that in him and through him they expected not only their own salvation but the salvation of their pious dead. I will direct attention to prophecies of Christ's coming in the Old Testament before this discussion is closed, and will now take up the list of parallelisms between the several religions named in your last letter and the scriptures. It seems farcical almost to devote space to a lengthy examination of them, and I certainly should not were it not that they are an extract from your compilation, "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," a work which a writer as eminent as James Parton has praised. According to you the Bible has borrowed from Brahmanism because the latter is the more ancient, and a similar argument is the proof for a like charge of plagiarism from all the other religions you adduce, Zoroastrinism, Buddhism, Egyptianism, and Confucianism. Whether I accept it or not, I doubt not that you do the statement of many scholars that the Vedas date between 1500 and 2000 B. C. But the revelations of Jehovah, the beginning of true religion, claim to date two thousand years before the earlier of these dates. If Biblical chronology is true—and its falsity has not yet been proved in our debate—your argument drawn from these religions loses all weight, so that at the very outset you have built the apex of your pyramid before providing a foundation. If God really spoke to Adam, to Abel, and to Noah, then the parallelisms, if any, between false religions and the Bible is an argument favoring the Bible, not disputing it. And that he did speak to the progenitors and early inhabitants of our earth is the testimony of all false religions as well as the true. As Max Muller says, it is "an idea which we find both among the lowest and among the most highly civilized races. It is a constant saying among African tribes that formerly heaven was nearer to men than it is now; that the highest god, the creator himself, formerly gave lessons of wisdom to human beings, but that afterward he withdrew from them, and dwells now afar from them in heaven. The Hindoos say the same, and they, as well as the Greeks, appeal to their ancestors, who had lived in closer communion with the gods, as their authority on what they believe about the gods."

Hence until the scriptures are proved false your argument is valueless. To make it of any force you have to assume what you cannot prove, very much after the manner of our modern scientists. Still let us follow you. The Bible, you allege, borrowed from Brahminism, because Brahminism teaches:

1. "A personal creator of all existences." But this is an eternal truth, acknowledged even by Infidels. To be sure, science, the glory of the present day, pausing in the midst of her inconoclastic triumphs, has found that the world was made without a maker, or was eternal, and man was created by blind, lifeless, mindless, purposeless laws, or evolved from dead matter, or by the sun, as Prof. Tyndall seems inclined to assert. A personal God is thus needless, and as science is eminently utilitarian, he must be declared non est. Universal consciousness, however, still clings to the old belief without any diminution in its faith; and not only myself, but I judge many a reader will subscribe his assent to the being of God. Reason also enters her protest, and conscience refuses to bow to the "philosophic faith," as Mr. Huxley calls it, which, as he acknowledges, has not been proved, but against which so far every discovered fact bears heavily. The Bible, then, must have copied from an alleged—or even say, proved—previous religion because it is built on a foundation which reason, conscience, and the universe itself prove to every man to be stable. So evident is the existence of God that while the Psalmist asserts that "the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork," and declares that it is the fool who "hath said in his heart, There is no God," yet the Bible never attempts to prove his existence. To argue that the Bible has borrowed from earlier religions, if there are any, because the former contains, like the latter, a belief in a personal God would be similar to the assertion that I borrow from, say for the argument's sake, Lord Bacon, when I say to my wife after a rain storm, "The sun shines." We shall see before we conclude that your argument amounts to this, that for the Bible to have come from God it is necessary that every doctrine must be pure revelation never known before, and your reasoning would compel a preference for untruth, if original, to truth, if it has been known before. Yet even if I admit the greater antiquity to the Vedas, when I compare their doctrines, teachings of polytheism as gross as the polytheism of the Greeks and Romans, with the pure, spiritual monotheism of the Bible, for this reason alone I may be pardoned for refusing to believe that the writers of the Bible had access to Vedic pages and copied from them. And then, since the most ancient Hindoos refer to their ancestors for their doctrines, claiming that they received them from God, it may be that, though distorted by tradition, the truths in them were revelations from Jehovah, a true account of which is alone contained in the Bible, possibly derived from the sons of Noah, to retrace no further.

The Gospel Jesus a Myth.

Mrs. Besant, in her debate with the Rev. Mr. Hatchard, by a historical blunder weakens one of the strongest points against the historical existence of Jesus. She says that Eusebius is the first to quote the passage from the Annals of Tacitus about Christ being put to death in the reign of Tiberius by the procurator Pontius Pilate. The fact is that the existence of the so-called Annals of Tacitus, which contains the passage about Christ, was never known at all until the year 1429, when the forged work first made its appearance. Tacitus did not write the Annals, but Poggio Bracciolini did. He produced the last six books of the Annals in 1429, for which he received a fortune. Then in his old age he forged the first six books, but died before completing the sixth. These were brought to light by his son, a long time after the death of his father, and palmed off on the pope for another munificent reward. The father was secretary to seven successiv popes, during a period of forty years, and the son was also secretary to Pope Leo X. when the steward of his holiness discovered the first six incomplete books of the Annals.

Further details on this subject will be found in the "Revelations of Antichrist," which exhausts the whole subject of the historical existence of Jesus and proves conclusivly that no such person existed in the reign of Tiberius; in other words, that the gospel Jesus is a myth, but that there was a Jesus who was stoned and hanged about 75 B.C., among whose disciples were Simon Kepha, alias Peter, and the apostle Paul, both of whom lived and died before the Christian era.

Forces, Moral and Physical.

I am conscious. This consciousness is not susceptible of proof or disproof from without. I choose some things in preference to others, and I feel the responsibility of it. Philosophy may demonstrate that I could not hav chosen otherwise than I did. It makes no differenee to me if I hav made a mistake; I regret it, nevertheless. It is not of the slightest consequence to me to prove that there is an infinit consciousness before and outside of all individual consciousness which has from all eternity chosen and determined everything to be just as it will be. If there is a moral governor of the individual moral beings that exist, all I hav to say is, Let him govern. If he is not omnipotent over all physical forces, his existence is a useless hypothesis. He is but the minion of matter, after all, or rather an idle fancy of the mind. There is no evidence that he governs morally, and consequently none that he governs physically. Still there is such a thing as moral government, and nobody, with the gallows, the guillotin, and the prison in sight, will doubt that there is such a thing as physical government. They are both exercised by human beings, really by nothing higher, except abstract truth, whatever that may be.

My point is this: These two kinds of government should not be mixed. They don't harmonize. The moment you begin to govern physically you cease to govern morally.

You govern morally when you choose that which is best, or persuade others to do so in view of all the consequences, without yourself controling those consequences. You predict, but don't threaten. Your moral government may be very poor if you predict what is beyond your knowledge, as hell beyond the grave, for example; but it is still moral government. If you kindle hell-fire around your subject, either of green wood or dry, in this life, it is no longer moral government. The Christian theology posits a moral governor over mankind in this life under title of Holy Ghost, who strives to govern here—with small success, however—without using physical force. But this mild sort of government, as to the bulk of mankind, is wholly to cease in a future world, and eternal punishment, without any design of government whatever, is to take its place.

It is undeniable—or at any rate I do not deny—that men who believe in a Holy Ghost may and do exercise a certain degree of beneficial moral government over their fellow-men. But it does not follow that their faith in the Holy Ghost is the cause of it. How could that faith hav any other effect than to diminish their sense of responsibility? We see human nature the victim of vices—sins of the individual against himself. We are perfectly conscious of some power of control over these vices, both in regard to ourselvs and others. Is it possible that our sense of obligation to exercise this moral power is going to be otherwise than diminished by throwing it on a superior being? Do you exert yourself the more to save a drowning child because you believe there is a person present more able to do it? Quite the contrary.

The whole history of Christian theology shows a strong tendency to neglect the moral and physical evils of this world in the struggle to save from the imaginary horrors of the next. The mania has extended to the infliction of punishment for imaginary sins against God, acts which do not in the slightest degree injure any human being. Even the very superstitious are beginning to see that those punishments do not increase the respect for God in the bosoms of the "profane."

When personal vices proceed to the extent of actually breaking the peace or seriously threatening it, doubtless they must be repressed by physical punishment. The virtuous hav the right of self-protection. But even that right has a choice of means. Public sentiment is often stronger than penal laws. One thing is certain, that virtue is not and never was the child of an act of Parliament, Congress, or state legislature. It is the child of good example and disinterested teaching. Knowledge promotes virtue as well as power. Ignorance is the strongest ally of vice.

Yet every one who expresses the conviction that virtue becomes stronger and human homes safer and happier as penal laws against personal vices become fewer and less stringent is stigmatized by a certain class of theologians as a promoter of vice. If he believes the sale of intoxicating drugs vicious, he must favor a prohibitory liquor law or be denounced as himself vicious. If he venerates the mysteries of sex and loathes obscenity as he does carrion, he must support the legislation and lying of Anthony Comstock or be denounced as himself obscene. No doubt ecclesiastics really mean to favor virtue and discourage vice, yet they strangely resort to some methods which cannot but increase it. They repel exactly when they should attract. If they could only see themselvs as others see them they would first of all assume an independent attitude, refusing all subsidy from the state; disclaiming all sanctity, they would exercise simple humanity. Claiming for themselvs a divine mission emanating from the infinitly holy, and for their book, the moral tone of which is far behind that of the average literature of the age, infallibility as the pure and only revelation of the divine, they simply throw away their power as good and reasonable men over all the viciously inclined who hav the power of thinking. If the man of Nazareth were again to visit the earth he would find the salt of it rather among the decent Atheists than the doctors of divinity. When was it ever otherwise?

To Whom It May Concern.

BY WM. HENRY BURR.

Hear ye! Be not deceived by supposing that after riding a hobby for nine years I hav yet to discover that the animal is lame in all four feet, or blind in both eyes. If any of you suspect I am a fool or a knave please ask some one who knows me. I lived fifty years in New York state, and from 1838 to 1869 was nearly all the time a resident of the city.

On Sunday, the 21st of January, 1872, exactly one hundred years after the date of the last letter of Junius, I announced at a meeting for free discussion in Washington, D. C., the discovery that Paine wrote those remarkable letters, and I held in my hand the first printed copy of "Junius Unmasked," containing the proof.

Two years or more ago Prof. Van Buren Denslow, literary editor of the Chicago Times, published an essay in that paper on "Thomas Paine," which I never saw or heard of till August last. In that essay he mentioned a number of works on the Junius question, and lastly "an anonymous work, published in Washington, D. C., in 1872, attributing the authorship, both of the letters of Junius and of the Declaration of Independence, to Thomas Paine," of which he said, "Its argument, derived from unity of literary style, mental characteristics, identical beliefs, and other internal evidences, is conclusiv." In the same article he adduced further evidence of identity.

I know not exactly when his article first appeared, but some time afterward, to wit, in July, 1879, he published another on "Junius," in which he adduced an item or two of external evidence on behalf of Paine, and refuted the claims set up on behalf of Philip Francis and others. But somehow the professor began to waver as to the conclusiv evidence that Paine was Junius, and conjured up "four reasonable objections," only one of which he deemed "well taken."

Well, when he came to republish these, together with several other very able essays, Col. Ingersoll wrote a fine introduction to the book, but raised three more objections to the identity of Paine and Junius. My answer to the four objections appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 18, 1880. A prominent lecturer and author complimented me in a postal card by saying, "I think your article on Ingersoll and Denslow completely unanswerable." Prof. Denslow has since replied in the Investigator of January 5th and 12th, and my rejoinder, I hope, will appear in the same paper of January 26th. In it I call attention to this remarkable admission of the professor:

"As to Col. Ingersoll's second point, viz., that Paine knew at that time but little of Englishmen, Junius expressly declares his obscure social position; and Mr. Parton's statement that Junius was ignorant at first hand of the prominent men of whom he wrote, is confirmed by every other trustworthy statement on this point."

If that is not a giving up of Prof. Denslow's only objection, viz., "that Paine's means of knowing the state and court secrets were inadequate to the demands of Junius," what is it? I furnished the testimony of Mr. Parton and of Junius himself, which overthrew Col. Ingersoll's second and Prof. Denslow's only objection to the identity of Paine and Junius.

But now an objection is presented simultaneously by two tyros, with entire confidence that it is fatal to Paine, and one of the writers is certain I hav overlooked the point-blank statement of Paine that he was not the author of the Junius letters. The objection was completely answered in "Junius Unmasked," nine years ago, and several times since. (See Truth Seeker Tract No. 131.) But if other readers will bear with me I will answer it again, together with the writers' other points.

Paine says truly: "I never troubled others with my notions till very lately, and never published a syllable in England in my life." And yet he had more to do with the publication of his "Plea for the Excisemen" in 1772 than with that of the authorized edition of his Junius letters the same year. He himself published neither. And as for the expression, "till very lately," there is no trace of any literary work by Paine or Junius before April 28, 1767.

Again, he says the cause of America made him an author. That cause crops out in the Junius letters from first to last. Nor did Junius expect to become an author, for he wrote privately to Woodfall, July 17, 1769, asking him to correct another publisher's eprint of his letters, saying, "I did not expect more than the life of a newspaper, but if this man will keep me alive let me liv without being offensiv."

The idea that either Paine or Junius borrowed their style, and that they differed in style in any particular, is very erroneous. Their unity of style is conceded by Prof. Denslow.

But what shall I say to a writer who, though a total stranger, calls me repeatedly his "friend," and at the same time says this, "His denunciation of Mr. Jefferson's accredited authorship really seems to partake of malevolence?" And this, "Mr. Burr's ill nature again shows itself," etc., toward Jefferson? Does such a pseudo "friend" expect a good-natured reply? When and where hav I exhibited malevolence or ill nature toward Jefferson? Hav I not repeatedly apologized for the falsehood of Jefferson in his old age, when it seemed useless to him to avoid any longer the confession of the authorship which everybody believed and there was none to dispute was his? I say again that it was perhaps the whitest lie a statesman ever told. I wish I could admire the political principles and conduct of John Adams and Geo. Washington as much as I do Jefferson's. He rode to his inauguration on horseback and abolished the aristocratic court which Washington had introduced. Washington drove a four-horse coach. Helmbold and Grant did the same in the national capital. I long for the republican simplicity of Jefferson. I am sorry he ever said he wrote the Declaration, but am I to be blamed for vindicating the truth of history?

But what now will my accuser say to this from Col. Ingersoll?

"Certain it is that Jefferson could not hav written anything so manly, so striking, so comprehensiv, so clear, so convincing, and so faultless in rhetoric and rhythm as the Declaration of Independence."

Or what will he say to the opinion expressed by that most excellent judge of mental caliber, the late Theodore Parker?

"His [Jefferson's]intellect was not very profound, nor very comprehensiv. Intelligent, able, adroit as he was, his success as an intellectual man was far from being entire or complete. He exhibited no spark of genius, nor any remarkable degree of original, natural talent."

Once more, take the judgment of one of Jefferson's contemporaries, a statesman of highest intellect. This is from a journal of the late Henry J. Raymond:

"This, Mr. Webster said, was like Jefferson, who told him once that in early life he resolved to hav nothing to say to John Marshall, for he would always get him to admit certain propositions, which he could not question, and then he would lead him to conclusions which he would not believe and which he could not avoid. This, Webster said, was characteristic of Jefferson, who had no reasoning faculty."

I forbear to finish the quotation, lest my accuser should charge me with more malevolence. But the Declaration of Independence being a masterpiece of rhetoric and logic, I affirm, with Col. Ingersoll, that Jefferson could not hav composed it.

But now comes a new point never before discovered. Franklin said that Jefferson drafted the Declaration; and Franklin, being on the Committee, must hav known about it. True, but if he was in the secret, as I hav not the least doubt he was, and if at any time he had to say anything, what would he say? That some one else wrote it? Put yourself in Franklin's place and consider how you would hav to finesse about it. I hav not much doubt that Franklin discovered soon after making the acquaintance of Paine in 1774 that he was Junius. Hence the total silence of Franklin's writings on the subject. Hence the fast friendship between the two men. Franklin, the Solon of that age, detected in Paine what no other man did, and he found use for Paine's talents in America.

Do I, then, make Franklin also a liar? Yes, if you choose to put it so, but an exceedingly harmless liar at that. Franklin was a cunning old fox. When the Federal Convention had failed after six weeks to make any progress, he moved that they try what virtue there was in prayer, and supported the motion in a speech that would do credit to a parson. The American Tract Society says the motion was adopted, and the Convention finished its work in short order. But the fact is, the motion was not adopted, and it took three months to finish the framing of the Constitution.

If anything would tend to make me ill-natured or malevolent, it would be such animadversions as these from professed Freethinkers and admirers of Thomas Paine. Many of them hav treated me as if I had committed a crime, others as if I had stultified myself in maintaining the integrity of a self-evident liar. Will Freethinkers please enlighten themselvs by reading the evidence on this question? I worship no idols, but I do insist that if there ever was a man worthy of the highest admiration, the author of the letters of Junius and the Declaration of Independence is that man.

IT is related of one god that he came amid thunderings and lightnings, in order to tell the people hat they should not cook a kid in its mother's milk.

Some left their shining abodes to tell women that they should or should not hav children, or to inform a priest how to cut and wear his apron ; and to giv directions as to the proper manner of cleaning the intestins of a bird.—Ingersoll.

Mother Shipton and her Prophecy.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Don't be alarmed, Bro. Bennett, about "Mother Shipton's Prophecy!" Did you not know that those prophecies which relate to modern times and appear true are quite recent fabrications, like the Bible predictions, made after the events took place?

"A Mr. Charles Hindley, of Brighton, England, acknowledged years ago that he was the author of most of the 'prophecies' published in 1862 in what purported to be a reprint of an old version of the fifteenth century prophecies."

I hav had this in print for several years, so did not scare on that humbug, and hope none of your readers will. The whole force and significance of the assumed prophecy lies in the fact that all but the last:

> "The world to an end shall come
> In eighteen hundred and eighty-one,"

Hav proved true ; and no wonder, for they were written since the events occurred. So much for prophecy !

Yours for another score of years, "Mother Shipton," notwithstanding. Ella E. Gibson.

Reflections.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: During the holidays it was fearfully cold here. One morning the mercury stood twenty-five degrees below zero. The intense cold was so sharp and penetrating as to make it dangerous to be out of doors long at a time. On that arctic day I reflected thusly: There can be no God, for if there is he would not be so cruel as to make such weather to freeze every poor man's potatoes in spite of all he could do to save them. True, he may delight in artistic frostwork on cathedral windows, and forget all about the potatoes in the cellar, but I don't believe he would; and so I must throw the God idea overboard altogether. I thought, too, that since our earth has not developed into a more balanced condition we need not expect its inhabitants, as a mass, to be anything but unbalanced beings. So long as life must be one unceasing battle to conquer the adverse elements; so long as tempests, hurricanes, earthquakes, cyclones, wind storms, drouths, alkaline tracts, desert places, famin fields, arctic cold, and scorching sun heat make up a part of the earth's spectacular scenes upon the stage of nature, we cannot hope for a millennium upon earth. We may cry ourselvs hoarse in our efforts to elevate humanity to higher conditions; but it will avail little so long as the elements of earth and air conduct themselvs so cruelly, recklessly, and destructivly. It would be contrary to the law of correspondences to hav it otherwise than it is. It is true that there are here and there beauty spots and scenes of divine enchantment, and seasons of bloom and fragrance and vintage, upon this torn earth, and in harmony with these we find an occasional human character approximating a happy balance in organization and action; and these here and there beautiful Edens, together with these rare reposeful characters, are the prophecies of that coming time when the earth and its inhabitants will hav evolved into better and more harmonious conditions. But as the material world will probably never become entirely tempest-stilled, nor free from the extremes of heat and cold, we cannot hope for the perfection of soul development in this sphere of existence; but in another life that we are born into when death, like a good mother, soothes us into a sweet, spiritual slumber from which we awake into the new life.

Mrs. Slenker, in her warm and flowery south-land home, sits and talks like a philosopher, and no doubt livs like one, though it has been my fortune to know many people who could talk but could not liv philosophically. At all events, Mrs. Slenker seems to hav taught herself to be content with the "death-ends-all" theory. She looks at her blooming flowers, at the calm blue sky above her, and on all the brightnesses of her busy yet contemplativ life, and thinks that the uses and joys of this brief earthly existence are enough to satisfy any aspiring soul. It is fortunate for her, believing as she does that death ends all of individual consciousness, that she can be so much of a philosopher. Her spirit and life are attuned to the harmonics of earth, to its reposeful aspects. But in most human lives there are barren spots, unanswered longings, tempests of feeling which rise and surge through the soul, to be stilled only in the calm of desolation; experiences which dash into atoms almost every earthly hope, like the terrific cyclone that sweeps the ground clear of every vestige of life and vegetation, and no possible earthly experience can fill out these shattered and beaten lives into those of rounded hope and happiness. The discordant play of the elements of this material universe is parallel with the fact of almost universal discordance in human nature. Stripped of all imaginary dressing, this earth, in its present stage of unfoldment, is really a rough and rugged island in the ocean of space, where physical might rules with unrelenting sway, and where nature exacts from man toil and tithes to the very uttermost. It is, in truth, a rudimentary or preparatory life for a more advanced one, where the elements are more concordant, more in unison with the peace and love elements of human nature. With this view of things, the most unbalanced of us can toil and struggle and suffer and yet feel thankful that we liv because life means so much more and reaches so much farther than the hour when death closes our eyes forever upon the scenes of earth.

But with all our wistful yearnings toward the better life, we must not forget that it is the humanity of to-day that needs assistance; that right here in our midst our activ love and labor are always demanded in the service of human helpfulness.

A New Theory of Thonght.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: If "woman's work is never done," it is more so with farmers in corn-gathering time. I hav long neglected to send you the power which makes society circulate, but here it is at last.

Rare enjoyment is afforded in your European letters. I felt as thongh I were taken back to those old towns once more. I felt like stepping forward and translating for you when on the St. Gothard you were told of the silent monks and "didn't understand a word." These monks are very useful people, strange as it may sound. They wear out their lives among their everlasting ocean of snow in the effort to rescue from the ravines and drifts, with the help of their dogs, the lost travelers who are starving and freezing. Many lives they save at the risk of their own, and only after thirty years of activ service are they allowed to remain at the monastery and prepare the tea.

When I receive my mail I look over the contents of The Truth Seeker first, and enjoy the sparks of thought so lavishly thrown out by the volcano spirits who write upon Materialism and Spiritualism. I too am interested in the question of "What is thought?" Please allow me to contribute my mite.

I transplant the creativ power to produce thought from the North Pole (now don't laugh and shake your head) about the same as daylight on the photographer's plate creates the image of the surrounding objects. Just so magnetism imprints on the substance of our brain the picture of thought. As the photographer, by the use of daylight, may increase his picture to any size, so we in comparing thoughts create new ones.

The, so to say, spiritual nourishment of the big brain, the gray mass, or the committee on resolutions, is magnetism; while the small brain, the white mass, or committee on ways and means, depends on electricity to direct the movements of the nerves. A few examples will show this. In mesmerism we see that a person destitute of magnetism may speak and move his limbs under the direction of the mesmerist, but all unconscious, medium-like, givs the answer as the questioner would answer himself. I hav rescued from the claws of a hawk hens and pigeons which remained paralyzed a few minutes after the hawk was driven away, although they appeared to be conscious. So are frogs, mice, and little birds, so to say, struck by lightning when the eyes of the snake are fixed upon them. One stroke of the wing would save little birdy, but electric influences prevent it, whilst the trembling frame and pitiful sounds of agony show that the thinking and feeling capacity is not interrupted. Or see the man that has softened the small brain by the gases of rum, and consequently dissolved his electricity. He tries in vain to speak correctly, or walk straight. His effort to be correct shows that his big brain is at home and trying to do well under unfavorable circumstances. I want to show by this that magnetism is the main power to produce thought.

This brings me back to the North Pole and volcano spirits. Combustion creates magnetism. The greatest combustion is that of mother Earth. Geologists tell us that the heat of our globe increases so that three hundred miles deep the diamond would melt. It takes a lively imagination to carry this increase of heat to the center of the globe, and we hav to look quick for a vent for the escape of the gases, or the thin crust of earth will explode before anybody has time to put on their life-preservers to swim through the ocean of fire.

This safety valve is at the North Pole, a volcano of huge dimensions. The northern lights, I suppose, are volcanic eruptions; and as their light is seen on both hemispheres, the crater must be hundreds of miles wide. The current of heat may hav produced a mild climate in that region, and consequently another vegetable and animal kingdom creation may hav followed, and our imagination may run wild in forming the polar man.

This great orifice that mother Earth has succeeded in keeping from the sight of profane eyes so far I call the birthplace of all existing thought, because from thence floats, like the light from the sun, currents, rays, streams of magnetism. There is not a minute's time when this flood discontinues. And so, as the giant, the son of Mars and Ertha, in his fight with Hercules, received new strength whenever he touched his mother, I hope the giant thinkers and volcano spirits will succeed in conquering the Hercules of superstition and bigotry.

Mr. Fitz's miracles of Moses crossing the Red Sea and the Lord delivering showers of manna and quails can be done every day yet. The Jews passed over an arm of the Red Sea, and as the ebb and flow of the tide reach that level country, the Jews simply crossed at the time of ebb. The manna is yet falling, but only from the branches of the bread-fruit tree abundantly growing in the wilderness, and the quails, or rather pigeons, still fall one month in the year. After they pass the Mediterranean Sea they are so lame on the wing that they may be caught by hand. The only miracle I can see is how Moses managed to stay forty years in a wilderness he might hav tramped over in two days.

Yours for progress and light,

Charles Naumann.

George Eliot.

The strongest woman's brain of this generation has passed away into the eternal silence. The news of George Eliot's death has come with the sadness of a personal loss to many a one who knew not her face but who reverenced her mind. Her name has shone aloft so long that it seems impossible to believe that it no longer symbolizes a living person; yet George Eliot is not dead, for her life is with us still in the words her genius gave to us, and her immortal work is with us although her mortal brain is passing back into the nature which formed it.

Marian Evans was born some sixty years ago, and of her early history but little is known. She was quite young when, through George Henry Lewes, she became one of the contributors of the Westminster Review, and the whole of her intellectual life was passed side by side with the brilliant philosopher who won her girlhood's love and her woman's loyalty. In addition to this nearest friend, her circle was a remarkable one; John Stuart Mill and Herbert Spencer were among those who were strong enough and brave enough to stand by her side. For in those days the world did not smile on her as in later years. Society closed its doors against the unmarried wife, and was as rigid then in its determination not to know her as it was anxious afterward to be admitted to the honor of a word. Even in the notices of her life, it is pitiful to see how the husband of more than thirty years of love and faith is pushed out of sight, and the husband of a few months is paraded, merely because the one was an illegal and the other a legal tie. Yet George Eliot herself would be pained and shocked if she saw the life-long lover ignored as part of her life, and her loyal nature would claim for George Henry Lewes the honored place at her side, which is his and his alone by the right of their long fellowship of heart and mind and life. His influence is marked on every work of her pen, and since she closed his eyes she has been dumb to the world.

George Eliot was nearly forty years of age ere she wrote her first novel; she came to her work with faculties mature, experience ripe, and with culture broad and deep. For many-sided humanity, for wide sympathy, for humor and for pathos her work has, not unfitly, been compared to that of Shakspere. The great bard himself need hav felt no shame if Mrs. Poyser, Hetty, Maggie Tulliver, Tito, Dorothea, has been his own creations. How different is each of these, yet how perfectly human is each; how they liv in memory, not as pictures we hav read of, but as people whom we admired, loved, despised, reverenced. Alas! they liv longer than their maker.

George Eliot dead? Nay, such lives are immortal. While the English tongue livs, George Eliot cannot die, and the sex that claims her rises in her to a higher level, and in the diadem that crowns womanhood Marian Evans shines as one of the brightest gems.

Annie Besant.

There will be a convention of the Spiritualists of New Hampshire, at Manchester, commencing Saturday, January 22, 1881, at 10 A. M., and continuing over the following Sunday.

The object of this convention is to form a state organization, for the purpose of strengthening and advancing the cause of Spiritualism.

E. B. Craddock, Chairman of the Com.

The Spiritualists and Liberalists of Van Buren and adjoining countries will hold their next convention at Breedsville, Mich., in Gray's Hall, commencing Friday evening, Feb. 4, 1881, and continuing over Sunday the 6th. Dr. A. B. Spinney, of Detroit, and Mrs. E. C. Woodruff, of South Haven, are engaged as speakers, and a good time is anticipated.

Was Robert Burns a Liberal?

BY GEORGE CHAINEY.

But few call this in question. Still there is, I find, upon the part of Scotch Christians a growing tendency to make him out a pious and devoted believer in orthodoxy.

No man has studied more thoroughly the life and genius of Burns than Carlyle, and while he pronounces him one of the heroic and godlike productions of humanity, he declares that he had no faith in revealed religion.

To decide who is right in this controversy we must study, first, somewhat into the times of Burns, and, second, get some idea of the character of his genius.

No spot on this planet has ever been so cursed with orthodox religion as Scotland. No people hav ever been so priest-ridden and fettered with superstition as the Scotch. The history of Scotch religion is the most barbarous and cruel of any that has yet been written in blood. Under the darkest night of the Spanish Inquisition there was light and beauty left in the homes of the faithful Catholics. But Scotch religion was more cruel to its adherents than to its opponents. It had mercy for neither friend nor foe. The Scotch kirk, or church, was, in the times in which Burns was born, the greatest curse and tyranny that ever afflicted any people claiming to be civilized. Almost every minister was a tyrant —every man and woman in a parish was his slave. He was feared alike by rich and poor. The privacy of homes was invaded to see that no one staid away from church. No man or woman could engage themselvs in service without his consent. To pass a minister in the street without saluting him was a crime. They assumed to hav a more direct control over the bodies and souls of men than was ever claimed by any pope or priest of Rome. So constantly did they pretend to hold in their hands the power of God over life and death that all sorts of stories sprung up of instances where men for opposing them had been threatened and brought to sudden death. It is no wonder that through indulging in this kind of power and arrogance they became merciless, and that religion was turned by them into a system of daily persecution. According to their teachings, all natural affections, social pleasures, and innocent amusements were regarded as sinful.

It was a crime for a mother to wish for a son or to be anxious about the welfare of her children. Cheerfulness to laughter was a great crime, though they might occasionally smile. To smile on Sunday was a sin, while on week days it is said that the most godly only sighed, groaned, and wept.

No wonder, when they were compelled to sit under sermons from two to six hours in length that taught them it was wrong to enjoy beautiful scenery, to be pleased with the beauty and perfume of flowers, a crime against God to walk in the meadows among the daisies, and in sound of the skylarks on Sunday, or to sit in the open doorway of their gloomy homes, where the warmth and brightness of the sun might attract their minds away from the serious and sober contemplation of religion. The shadow of this horrible nightmare of superstition rests upon every Scotchman's brow until this day.

Though through the large humanity of a Burns and logic of a Hume the sunlight is gradually breaking, yet the darkness of superstition still lingers. Such a fanatic as Moody can gather there a larger harvest than in any other place in Christendom, while in most churches it would be still considered a crime to praise God with an instrument of music or with anything besides a psalm tune.

In all other places a wedding has ever been regarded as a fit time of mirth and gladness, but the Scotch clergy thought otherwise. At the weddings of the poor they would allow no rejoicing, and at those of the rich it was customary for one of them to go for the express purpose of preventing any excess of gayety. We can hardly conceive of a better way to accomplish this end. But think of two hearts tremulous with the joy of love, intoxicated with the fulfilment of youth's happy dreams, holding to their lips the cup of life's purest joy, forbidden in the name of religion to rejoice or to surround themselvs with the cheer of mirth and pleasure!

But though the church was all-powerful, and no one could eat or drink, smile or weep, without heeding its command, yet morality was never among any people at such a low ebb. Though marriage was thus watched over by the church with suspicious eye, almost as many children were born out of as in wedlock. The most pious elders and deacons often had to imitate "Holy Willie's Prayer," while the amount of whisky consumed at an ordination or presbytery was only rivaled by the length of the sermons and prayers. Though there was such outward display of godliness, it was mostly but the garment of hypocrisy, while all beneath was filth and corruption.

The clergy, not satisfied with tyrannizing over their congregations, quarreled fiercely with each other over the most trifling textual differences, so that two or three of them never met together without a disgraceful jangle.

Of course, there was here and there a minister that rose in character and humanity above the class, some homes where true piety lived and made pure and bright the family life, such as was described by Burns in the "Cotter's Saturday Night."

Think of Robert Burns being born into such a condition of things—capable of appreciating the most subtle beauties of nature, and yet taught that to do so was a crime; possessing the most ardent passions, and yet surrounded on every side with temptations to lawless indulgence!

Though most of the transgressions from the path of virtue ascribed to him hav been traced to the malice of his foes, it is not fair that we should judge him by the same standard as we do ourselvs. If he cannot be entirely cleared in this respect, yet the common opinion of Burns' immorality is entirely false, and to one who by his songs has made the world so much sweeter and better to liv in we can afford to forgiv much. That the dark and horrible religion of the Scotch church is being replaced by that of the fireside, the sweet loves and joys of home, we owe much to him who sang,

> "To make a happy fireside clime
> To weans and wife,
> That's the true pathos and sublime
> Of human life."

In reading the poems of Burns, we must remember that he was describing, just as he saw it, the life and character of his age. The prayer of Holy Willie illustrates the kind of holiness that prevailed under the influence of Scotch orthodoxy. It represents its dark and ferocious character in being addressed to a God who sends one to heaven and ten to hell, all for his glory.

While the worshiper acknowledges a life of constant fornication, yet through the grace of God he assumes to be "a burning and a shining light" in the church. Though he prays divine vengeance on all who hav ever noticed and disapproved of the faults he confesses, yet for himself he petitions for "mercies, temporal and divine, that he for gear and grace may shine, excelled by nane."

With few exceptions, orthodoxy, rigidly interpreted, generally produces this kind of piety. Men and women to-day are more moral because they no longer believe in this selfish and corrupting system. "The Holy Fair" is simply a description of a large religious meeting, something like a modern camp-meeting. The various schools and shades of theology are most graphically described, while the twinship between this sort of piety and sensualism is also honestly told.

Among the Scotch clergy there was here and there a Liberal one who, in the place of theology, believed in righteousness. Burns never failed to sing their praise. When one of this number arose to preach, the more pious arise in anger and go out—complaining of his "cold harangs on practice and morals" —to console themselvs by giving the whisky-jars and barrels "a good lift that day."

> "What signifies his barren shine
> Of moral powers and reason?
> His English style and gesture fine
> Are a' clean out o' reason.
> Like Socrates or Antonine,
> Or some auld pagan heathen,
> The moral man he does define,
> But ne'er a word o' faith in > That's right that day."

When Burns describes the joys of a social glass with boon companions he is glorifying the pleasures of the world over those of the church and religion. Such was the blighting and withering influence of Scotch orthodoxy that it was only by bold and open defiance to it that any one could enjoy a ray of light and pleasure. His nature was too large, his genius too penetrating into the truth of things, not to perceive that there was more pleasure in the hearts of the so-called wicked than of the righteous. The true poet of nature is gifted with universal sympathy. He sees and feels instinctivly for and with all.

Many hav supposed that in these songs he always related his own experience. This theory is now known to be false. But to him there was far more humanity in the excesses of the so-called wicked than in the cant and hypocrisies of the professedly holy. While in his "Cotter's Saturday Night" he sang the praise of simple and sincere piety, yet no one ever lashed with such terrible contempt the hypocrisies and cant that are the product of all formalized and systematic theories of religion. To him the real religion of the heart was found in pure love, friendship, and sincerity of soul.

The greatness of Burns consists largely in the fact that he dared to defy, in the most reckless way, the unnatural restraints and tyrannies of the church.

If in this recklessness he was sometimes led too far to the other extreme we should not blame him so much as the cruel system that had made it impossible for such a tender, loving heart to do otherwise.

The spirit of humanity was fighting in him for deliverance from the oppressions of religious bigotry and fanaticism.

Natural human love and joy had been so long repressed and persecuted in Scotland that such a nature as that of Burns could not fail to resort to any means in order, if possible, to end the oppression. He who could mourn for a mouse disturbed by his plough, or for "the wee, modest, crimson-tipped daisy," how must he hav felt at beholding the dark and withering influence upon human life of false theories of religion! To him natural goodness and human joy were the true religion; "an honest man, the noblest work of God." He was emphatically the child of nature, and so all through his poems, in contradiction to all the religious teachings of the age in which he lived, we find him glorifying nature. Through all those shams and hollow delusions of the times he looked directly into the very heart of things and saw that the divine truth, instead of being shut up and confined to some musty parchments of a past age, glows in all nature and lives in every truthful soul. As the poet of human nature, Burns' was the divinest influence that ever came to Scotland. His songs hav made its inhabitants more humane than all the sermons, long or short, ever preached by its priests.

The growing love of the people for this their greatest poet is a healthier influence than all of its orthodox churches combined. When we take into consideration the nature of Burns, the lot in which his life was cast, his brave endurance of his poverty, the work he did, and the songs he sung, I think that whatever may hav been his faults we must count his life one of the bravest and noblest that has yet been lived on this globe. That he escaped free entirely from the superstition that afflicted and cursed the world at that time I do not claim. Such a sudden change would be impossible. The brightest, clearest sky is generally specked with some fleecy clouds that remind us of darker days. So the freest, noblest life in days like those could not quite escape from their shadow. His life was one long struggle with and against the ideas of the church.

Sometimes he thought himself an Atheist, at others a Theist, and then again in a rational way a Christian, but never an orthodox one.

It is to me not at all surprising that once or twice he used language which givs a slight show of justice to the claim that he believed in revealed religion. There are moments of weakness in every man's life. To stand for the truth and sacredness of nature was a far different thing then than it is now. He who walks in the light of genius is compelled sometimes to suffer the torment of its absence, and to cower before the foes which in its light he would never fear. Such may hav been the fate of Burns.

But whoever judges him from the inspirations of his genius will find in its light no mingling of the darkness of orthodoxy. No man believing in a devil or hell could hav written so wittily about them as he did. He made every gloomy terror and absurd dogma an object of satire. He preached a new gospel of love as he heard it in the songs of the birds and saw it painted in every modest wayside flower.

Genius, especially poetical genius, might be defined as anti-orthodoxy. There never was an orthodox poet, and never can be one. Even Dante was a heretic to the faith of his time, while Milton was regarded as almost the arch-fiend of heterodoxy.

Genius glorifies whatever it touches. It finds "sermons in stones, books in the running brooks. and good in everything." Behind the most material fact it finds a supersensual utility. It can never submit to the bondage of the priest, but ever flies forward on the wings of hope into the more glorious future. The man of genius always represents a coming more than the present age. It is only by thus enlarging the life and hope of humanity that genius has any existence. It is on this account that every true genius has been a heretic.

Orthodoxy is standing still Heresy is going forward. Orthodoxy says, "All is here." Heresy says, "Nay, there are better things yet to come." Orthodoxy is a shroud of despair wrapt about the grinning skeleton of the past. Heresy is a star of hope shining above the cradle in which slumbers the possibility of the future. Orthodoxy says that religion has descended from the skies; heresy, that it rises fresh with the dew of eternal youth upon its brow from the human heart in all its loves, hopes, and joys. Heresy, you see, is only another name for genius.

To hav genius is to grow, to advance. It is to be a prophet, not a priest. It is to know and love nature, not to fear and hate it. Almost every poem of Burns' is tremulous with a passionate devotion to nature. His illustrations drawn therefrom are always strictly true to life.

He gathered much of his inspiration by opening his heart to the charms of nature, though to do so he defied the church that pronounced it sinful. Because he wooed her with amorous devotion, she revealed to him many a secret that made him her prophet and interpreter.

When religion shall fully descend from the skies to take up its abode in the sweet loves and lowly duties of earthly life, it will find in Robert Burns one of its most inspired prophets. On his forehead rested the light of that coming day when nature, instead of being held to be cursed, shall be regarded as divine.

It is impossible to believe in and love nature in the same heart that loves and believes in orthodoxy. Devotion to nature is just as inconsistent with orthodoxy as genius.

Burns was also the child and prophet of the people. Every poem is filled with the spirit of humanity. Though flattered and courted by the great and rich, yet to him "princes and lords were but the breath of kings." He never forgot from whence he sprang. Rank to him was always but "the guinea stamp." Tyranny in all its forms was to him a most hateful thing. The French Revolution enlisted his sympathies. Every struggle of humanity toward larger liberty won his warmest devotion.

How could such a man uphold a system that is founded on caste, that says kings and priests reign by divine right, and forges the links of the slave's fetters by divine authority?

He was the poet of the people, and so the prophet of the future when the genius of the people shall hav trampled under the feet of victory every vestige of tyranny.

The hope of humanity is the heart of humanity. Any system of religion that does not find its proofs in the natural instincts of the human heart, or that exalts one class above another, must, in the very nature of things, be false.

Orthodoxy is bound hand and foot with tyranny. Destroy the presumptuous claims of priests to a special divine protection, of kings to a divine right, enthrone the people as the highest court of appeal, above courts or synods, and there shall not be left of it one stone standing upon another.

Whatever Burns' faults may hav been, he made ample compensation in the consecration of his genius to humanity. Because he crowned the honest man, however obscure his toil, as "the noblest work of God," and declared the faithful, tender human love that builds and guards a home the truest and sublimest thing on earth, the idea of human brotherhood is indeed becoming a religion.

As the champion of liberty and of every sweet humanity, Robert Burns was one with Robert Ingersoll, and the first Robert was no more orthodox than the second. Robert Burns was just as reckless in his defiance of the church as Robert Ingersoll, and hated just as stoutly by the clergy. It is just as intelligent to try and prove one orthodox as the other. I wish I could inspire all my readers with the purpose to drink deep at the fountain of his genius. A little study will break the rough shell of the language. To me there is no poet so tender and pathetic. Every line throbs with human passion.

While men come and go on this green earth they shall weep and laugh at the touch of his genius. The nearer we come to his spirit, the more shall we honor and respect our human nature as divine. While love intoxicates the soul of youth, or patriotism is counted a virtue, will his poems continue to cheer and inspire. As much as any man who ever stood in the light of the sun, he has left the world the brighter and better for having lived in it. His is one of the names that were not born to die.

When liberty shall hav dethroned every tyranny, the light of love dispelled every shadow of hate, the joy of hope drowned every throe of despair, his spirit shall hav mightiest empire in human hearts.

As the poet of the people, he is, in his best inspirations, what the people shall become when the last sad, dark influence of superstition and ignorance shall be dispelled.

The fulfilment of his daring hopes will destroy every injustice and wrong and fill the world with the living joy of eternal right. Though the church of his day held human nature to be totally depraved, yet out of this depravity he wove the most beautiful garlands that ever decked the brows of mankind. May the enthusiasm and tender pathos for humanity that filled his life, and drowned deeper than the sight of every human eye his faults, fill all our hearts with holiest consecration to the same religion of humanity!

A Private Letter from a Dear Friend.

BOSTON, Jan. 10, 1881.

MY DEAR MR. BENNETT: I hav your letter inclosing your beautiful and well-deserved testimonial from the Secularists of England, and asking me to write for THE TRUTH SEEKER. That I will gladly do, to the extent of my ability, which is getting small. I am glad to see THE TRUTH SEEKER in a new dress, so neat and attractiv. I inclose something to keep my subscription square. It is a wonder to me that the literary world does not see its obligations to you for defying a law which, impartially executed, would imprison every one of them for owning a copy of Shakspere—if he could be enticed to mail it.

I trust your health is good and will long continue so. The world, of course, will feel its obligations to you after you are dead. I am happy to let it know that I feel mine while you liv.

Yours truly, ELIZUR WRIGHT.

Beautify Your Homes.

The home should be as beautiful and pleasant as it is possible to make it.

It is the place of rest and pure enjoyment. It is the refuge from care and trouble and all the tumults and turmoils of life.

It is the one spot where the heart's purest affections garner themselvs and seek their chosen resting-place.

It is woman's first duty to make this dwelling-place, over which she is the mother-queen, as cheery, cozy, and lovely as she can. The first requisit for this desired consummation is that she herself be happy, hopeful, pleasant, and contentedly agreeable.

To become this she must liv hygienically, she must eat proper food, wear comfortable clothes, and not be oppressed by too many cares and burdens.

If she is her own housekeeper she should study to do her work on the most simple and easy plan, cook but a few dishes at a time and hav each as perfect in itself as possible. She must save work wherever it can be done, and above all else limit the number of her children to only two or three at the most.

Two children, if well cared for and properly reared, are all that one woman can possibly attend to and do her own housework, sewing, knitting, gardening, etc.

To those who think woman's work a small thing we would advise the careful perusal of the following advice of Thomas K. Beecher:

"All men ought to go to the woods, and religiously do their own washing and general work, such as sewing, cooking, housekeeping, and dish-washing. The work of women is not spoken of sensibly by men until they hav done it themselvs. Gentlemen readers, it is easy to talk! But just try it on a very modest scale once, and you'll honor working women more than ever. Do as I hav done—do a wash of six pieces, and then remember that a woman turns off two hundred pieces in a day. Look at your watch and see how long it takes you. Look at your soap and see how much you hav used. Look at your white clothes, handkerchief or towel, and see what you hav done or not done, and never again speak harshly of or to a woman on wash-day, nor of laundry work as if it were unskilled labor. Try it. A sympathetic gentleman, having washed two dozen pieces, will never change his shirt again without a glow of reverence and gratitude. She did this. A similar and salutary consciousness will come to him who darns his own socks, patches his own trousers, splices his suspenders, and washes dishes. Look not every man upon his own things, but every man also upon the work of a woman. Such an experience in the woods will go far toward the settling the woman question, by teaching us that we are all members one of another, and there must be no schism."

But with all her cares and duties there is none that is more important than this one of making home pleasant.

Neatness and cleanliness are indispensable to a cheery, cozy-looking home. A plain room, plainly furnished and scrupulously clean, is far more bright and beautiful than a more pretentious one richly adorned with costly furniture that is soiled, mutilated, and always in disorder.

A few thrifty, nicely-kept flowering-plants and trailing vines are one of the most enlivening adjuncts to a living room; and a sheltered, sunny window-shelf, just outside the window, is far better for them, in moderately cool weather, than the over-heated and often dusty inside position, and they are also just as easily seen.

A few nice pictures on the walls are always pleasing. But no picture that shocks the feelings should ever hav a place there. Pictures of death-bed scenes, war, murder, animal fights, and all other soul-harrowing views, ought never to be made at all, and especially allowed within the sacred precincts of home.

Bright, gay, happy, and inspiring views alone should meet the gaze of the family circle.

Should there be unsightly objects in the room, and recesses that contain necessary adjuncts to comfort and convenience, a bright chintz curtain will screen them from view, and will of itself make a pleasant resting-place for the eye.

Should a bit of plastering fall from the wall, a piece of white muslin neatly pasted over the place will hide the defect and save all further scaling off and droppings of litter.

In a thousand ways one can veil the ugly and add to the beautiful, till the humblest little room may become a very bower of pleasantness and cheerfulness.

The love of the beautiful needs the fostering care of every one who would make life pleasant and happy.

Whoever creates a lovely picture, whether on canvas, in a poem, or on the broad brown bosom of mother earth, or in a cozy, cheerful home, adds to the world's priceless treasures, and does something toward elevating, refining, and happifying the race.

"'Mid pleasures and palaces though we may roam,
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home.
A charm from the sky seems to hallow us there,
Which, seek through the world, is not met with elsewhere.
Home, home, sweet, sweet home;
There's no place like home."

Musings of a Kalamazoo Skeptic.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A few simple reasons of the many why I cannot become a Spititualist: First in order, it has got to become universal instead of local. Next, if it is what it professes to be of spirit communion, it can tell us exactly where the steamer Alpena, on Lake Michigan, went down, and how many passengers were on board, and what their names were, also in what condition the vessel lies. This could be done by locating on each side of the lake a certain point, so that a line would pass directly over it, and also tell just how far on that line one would hav to go before he would be just over it.

Let spirits prognosticate the weather to a certainty, and foretell future events, such as elections prosperity of individual enterprises, foretell deaths, just when they should occur, and in fact giv us something that we all could bank upon.

The facts are, they talk of subjects that our minds cannot comprehend. They giv us tricks, and perform them before our eyes, that we cannot understand. I hav seen jugglers go upon the stage and tell people that the tricks they were going to perform were tricks, and that we could do them as easily as they do provided we understood them as well as they did. I hav seen a man of this sort go upon the stage, go into the audience, borrow a plug hat, take it upon the stage, set it down, and take out of it a pair of turtle-doves, and they flew up and lit on the scene wires; next take out a pair of guinea pigs, and they ran around on the stage, then take out a suit of doll's clothes, then a loaf of bread, then a dozen or two of eggs, and at last take out what seemed to me feathers enough to make two good pillows. This same man came again into the audience, borrowed a gold watch, put it into a mortar, took the pestle, and, before our eyes, pounded it fine, then called for some meal; a waiter brought it, he put it into the mortar and added water, stirred it all up, put it into a large tin can with a cover, put it over a coal-oil lamp and baked it; and then afterward took a knife and cut the cake in pieces, took out the watch and gave it back to the owner apparently without injuring it. And so I might enumerate, but this must suffice.

Now not one of us could tell how it was done, although he warned us previously. When we go into a circle we are not thus warned, and if we were, what better off would we be? We could not then tell.

I own I am skeptical, but at the same time I profess to be teachable; but I will not go as the person does who attends a protracted meeting, ready to swallow anything. I may hav to be like the nest of young birds, who swallow down anything the old ones see fit to put into their mouths. Neither will I go up to Jerusalem or to Detroit or to Chicago, or anywhere else where I believe they hav things fixed up for the special occasion. What I want, and what all Materialists in this country want, is the truth, and we can receive that here as well as there.

Why am I not permitted to see my friends as well as other folks? They tell us we hav not come into the right condition, or that we are not en rapport. Well, how are we to be, unless we fall down to this shibboleth? I believe, with Prof. Jamieson, that it is one of the greatest humbugs of the age, and will disappear as soon as its true inwardness is found out. Anything but tricks for me, or fairy stories, or stories of departed spirits returning to earth again as they say.

I believe many of the Spiritualists are honest, and I count among them many good friends, but I sincerely believe they are deceived, that their minds hav become hallucinated and they cannot help themselvs. For all such I feel to pity them. I do hate to read those articles wherein they say our belief is like a winter, a forest without leaves, where all is decay, and we end in annihilation. They say this is our doctrin. Well, we only preach as far as we know, and do not draw on our imagination for future results. Their theory is very nice and pleasant to think upon, but they cannot demonstrate it by one single well-authenticated fact which every person can understand. Until such a time arrives I trust they will not blame me for not becoming a Spiritualist. Universal knowledge is what we want, not special, and confined to comparativly a few. This is what I seek after, and nothing but this will satisfy the longings of my heart. JAMES S. BEDEL.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., Dec. 10, 1880.

THE Jesuits hav obtained a papal decree condemning Galileo's doctrin about the motion of the earth. It is all in vain. If the world is really turning round, all mankind together will not be able to keep it from turning or to keep themselvs from turning with it.—Pascal's Letters.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 22, 1881.

Death of Charles H. Phelps.

On the morning of the 11th inst. Charles H. Phelps breathed his last in the hospital of the Albany Penitentiary. Some seven years ago, while cashier in the State Treasurer's office at Albany, he was in an evil hour, by men he deemed friends, induced to appropriate funds, amounting to $250,000 belonging to the state to the private speculation of himself and those supposed friends, thinking he would be able to replace the money in time to answer all purposes. But the facts were learned, and he was arrested before he could effect his plans for restoring the funds. He himself retained but a few thousand dollars of the money, which was expended in making his defense; the rest was invested by those to whom he executed checks and is still thus retained. Public sentiment set in strong against him, and his trial was very severe. He was convicted on three counts or specifications, and was sentenced to five years' imprisonment in the Albany Penitentiary on each count.

While we were serving out our unjust sentence in that institution we were thrown in company with Mr. Phelps and became pretty well acquainted with him. He had become utterly broken down in health and was sent to the hospital. When we were ordered to the hospital we occupied the same room with Mr. Phelps, and sometimes a score of other sick and dying men. He was an amiable, pleasant man, and keenly felt the degraded position in which he had unfortunately placed himself.

When taken to the prison he was placed in cell No. 1, which was near the outer door opening into the prison yard. In winter weather this was a very exposed position and caused him much suffering. Many a time when he came in from the workshop to eat his miserable prison meal, water would freeze in his cell in fifteen minutes. None but himself could fully realize the weeks and months and years of positiv agony he passed in that dreadful cell. He worked in shop No. 1, over which "Brute" Monohan presided as overseer, who, regardless of how severe the weather might be, caused the windows to be kept open, the cold air striking the prisoners, who were forced to stand by their work tables with their coats off and their shirt sleeves rolled up. Between the cell and shop poor Phelps, not of a very strong constitution, contracted a disease of the lungs which has finally taken him to his grave and released him from the bolts and bars and prison keepers, he having served out six years of his sentence.

He was kept at work in the shoe shop long after he was unfit to be there, and when he was scarcely able to stand upon his feet, but at length he was permitted to enter the hospital, where he passed a living death of over two years. His sufferings both physical and mental were intense.

In the fall of '79 Dr. Geoghan, the prison physician, and the members of Superintendent McEwen's family, seeing that Phelps must die, and believing his sufferings had fully atoned for the mistake he had made, wished to see him released so he could close his days with his unhappy wife and family, who reside in this city. Governor Robinson was appealed to for a pardon. He deferred acting till after election, and being defeated he decided not to act upon the case but to turn the matter over to his successor, Governor Cornell. All this time Phelps was slowly but surely dying, but hope bore him up. We watched him from day to day, from week to week, and from month to month, and we saw how his hopes and fears rose and fell as the dreary time passed away.

When he become convinced that Robinson would not pardon him he looked forward with great hope that Cornell would be more merciful. He knew Cornell personally, and had held a position under him several years ago in the Custom House in this city. He indulged the hope that Cornell would be merciful.

Weeks had to pass away after the inauguration of the new governor before it would do to press Phelps' doleful situation upon his attention, and few can realize the amount of suspense and agony the poor man endured. At length pitying friends saw the governor and implored him to do a deed of mercy. He expressed himself willing to do so if he could be convinced that it was all right and that Phelps could not liv.

Physicians were sent to examin the poor prisoner. They sounded him, thumped him, tested him with various instruments, and gave it as their concurrent opinion that the unfortunate man had consumption of the lungs and must die. The governor's own family physician also made an examination and gave the same opinion, that there was no hope for the prisoner's life. Still Cornell refused to pardon him.

He said he could not grant a pardon till the judge who tried the case and the district-attorney who prosecuted the case should express a wish that the suffering man should be pardoned. Mrs. W. H. Van Allen, a woman of great sympathy and kindness of heart, frequently visited the hospital in company with her mother, wife of the superintendent, and both felt deep sympathy for Mr. Phelps and wished to see him released to die at home with his family. Mrs. Van Allen made a journey to Cobleskill to see Recorder Smith, who wrote a letter imploring the governor to release the dying prisoner, believing the ends of justice had been fully answered in the imprisonment and suffering the man had already endured. Judge Westbrook, who tried the case, wrote a letter to the governor of the same tenor, asking that the man might be let out to die. Prosecuting Attorney Moak joined in the same appeal and expressed the opinion that the erring man had been sufficiently punished. But still Cornell refused to be merciful.

He said to Mrs. Van Allen on one occasion that if some of the rich men and leading citizens of Albany would petition him to pardon Mr. Phelps he would do so. "How many signatures, Governor, do you require?" asked Mrs. Van Allen. "Sixty will be enough. Get sixty good names and I will let him out."

The large-hearted, sympathetic woman dropped everything and walked and rode over the city of Albany and saw the first men of the city, including men holding official positions, men of wealth, bankers, lawyers, physicians, editors, etc., etc., and hardly a man refused to sign the petition that Phelps might be pardoned. She obtained double the number of names that the governor said would be sufficient, but still he would not be merciful. He broke his own promis; he violated his own word. He seemed to be governed by some strange obstinacy and was determined not to do what all good people wished him to do and which he himself knew he ought to do. He did much as Rutherford B. Hayes did in our case when 200,000 people asked for our release—after promising he would grant a pardon he went back on his word and falsified it. Or probably he was like Pharaoh of old when he said he would release the Israelites—he afterward hardened his heart, or God was accused of hardening it, and he would not let the people go. We cannot believe that God had anything to do with hardening Cornell's heart, but that it all depended upon his own consequential, stubborn, unyielding, unfeeling disposition.

During all this time the painful suspense, the days, weeks, and months of hopes and fears, the absolute agony that Phelps endured can be only partially imagined. From day to day, for months together, he hoped the pardon would come. Whenever the door of the hospital opened he fondly looked hoping a messenger had come to break the glad news to him. It was expected he would be released before our term expired. He was greatly interested in the reception promised us upon our return home, and he was extremely anxious to attend it. But Cornell would not say the one merciful word. Like Pharaoh, his heart was hard, hard, hard. Influential friends made repeated visits from Rochester, and had interviews with the governor in behalf of Phelps and received assurances that gave them great hope, and this intelligence reached the poor waiting man only to buoy him up for a time, to afterward sink in the deepest despair. The governor falsified every promis, broke every hope, and drove the poor man and his dear wife to inexpressible grief.

But death proved a far better friend than the man temporarily at the head of the state government. Death came at last to his release, and he is now at rest. If Cornell could hav had mercy enough to let him come home to die, to allow his dear wife to nurse him and attend him during the closing days of his unhappy life, and allow her to close his eyes in death, it would hav simply been an act of justice. But he had not the promptings of mercy to perform such a good deed. Let it be remembered that A. B. Cornell is a man devoid of mercy.

Our Thanks.

We wish to express our thanks to the kind friends who hav exerted themselvs to obtain new subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER. We instinctivly feel that every man or woman who sends in the name of one or more new subscribers is a true friend to the cause of truth and mental liberty. If we are in the right, if the doctrins of Freethought are more true than the fables and absurdities of theology, every person who has his mental eyes sufficiently open to see the superiority of the teachings of science and reason over the errors and claims of superstition should feel interested in bringing others to the knowledge of the truth and in increasing our numbers all over the land.

It is to the interest of every lover of Freethought that our forces may be augmented and our organs sustained so far as possible. Every person who is convinced of the truths of Liberalism should feel desirous to see his neighbors and acquaintances equally fortunate. When one has heard the good news he should be anxious that others hear it also.

It is to be regretted that so many of the Liberals of America should feel indifference as to the success of Liberal papers. It would seem that every man who has become Liberalized should take a Liberal paper, and those who are able should patronize more than one and hand them to others when they are done with them. There is no means of spreading the knowledge of Liberalism equal to giving a wide reading to Liberal papers and books. They are the good seed being constantly sown upon the soil of the mind. Let every one who believes that the good seed ought to be sown help to circulate Liberal literature. Let those who think THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing good work, is making earnest efforts to spread the good tidings far and wide, do all they can to sustain these efforts and furnish the ways and means to keep up the warfare. There are always some who get tired or faint-hearted, who find one excuse or another for discontinuing their paper, and it beeomes the duty of those who are earnest and public-spirited to help keep the numbers good. None can do so much toward increasing the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER as those who take it and know its value. They will try to induce their Liberal and inquiring acquaintances to help sustain the sheet that is struggling hard to fight the battle of truth against error.

There are thousands upon thousands who hav lost all faith in the false claims of theology who ought to take THE TRUTH SEEKER. Let every friend of the sheet exert themselvs to accomplish it.

Tried and Compromised.

Mr. Baldwin, of Chicago, who was arrested many months ago for selling or mailing "Cupid's Yokes," has had his trial. He was fined one hundred dollars and given a few weeks in which to raise the money. No imprisonment, no incarceration with felons! Mr. H. L. Barter, of Davenport, who was arrested for publishing in his paper a story containing extracts from "Cupid's Yokes," and arguments condemnatory of excessiv sexual indulgence, has been able to compromise his case in the United States Court by paying one hundred dollars and costs. Really, things are improving in the "obscenity" market. Heywood was sent to prison for two years at hard labor and fined two hundred dollars for mailing a copy of "Cupid's Yokes." We were sent to prison for thirteen months, with three hundred dollars fine, for the same thing. But now for the same act two men in the West are let off on the promis to pay one hundred dollars each, with not a word about any imprisonment! It look as though after awhile a man would be able to deposit in the mail a little pamphlet without losing his liberty for two years, and being torn from his family and business. One hundred dollars for the present appears to be the ruling price for mailing a copy of Mr. Heywood's pamphlet, and perhaps after Garfield is inaugurated, and "Bob" fills an important place in the administration, the price may be still further reduced.

By the way, it is hard to understand by what right United States authorities can arrest a man on a criminal charge, as in Mr. Barter's case, and then let him off without a trial upon the payment of a stipulated fine and costs. Mr. Barter either did not commit an offense or he did. If not, he should hav been discharged without the stigma of a fine. If he did commit an offense, the government attorney had no right to let him off without a trial upon the promis of paying a little money. With all the greatness of our government, it still has defects.

A Christian Blackguard.

Among the names which hav been sent in to us some friend gave the name of the writer of the following letter, and of course a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER for January 1st was sent him. This harmless act seems to hav excessivly stirred up his Christian spirit, and caused him to evince the same vengeful, persecuting spirit which for hundreds of years moved his brethren of the church. One has only to read the following delectable document to be satisfied that he would not only like to see the editor of this sheet longer doomed to a prison cell, but would take pleasure in inflicting the most cruel torture upon him, and even depriving him of life, and this for simply trying to dispense the truths of reason and science in contradistinction to the myths and fables of theology. Listen to the ignorant bigot:

Here are most favorable opportunities for securing a large amount of Liberal reading matter at a very reasonable price. Let the truth spread far and wide.

A Liberal Offer.

Having arranged clubbing terms with the North American Review we are enabled to offer that foremost of American periodicals, together with THE TRUTH SEEKER, at the low price of $6.50 per year. The Review is the organ of the best minds of America, nearly every writer of note in the country being a contributor to it. It discusses the subjects that are most prominent in the public thought at the time, and presents both sides of all important questions. It combines to a considerable extent the thoroughness of the cyclopedia with the timeliness of the daily paper. It should be read by the professional man, the student, the merchant, the manufacturer, the farmer; in fact, by every one who wishes to form intelligent opinions of the events of the day.

Co-Operativ Economy.

The great popular monthly, the Californian, and THE TRUTH SEEKER, one year, for $5.75. The Californian is the best and most popular monthly ever published on the Pacific Coast. It is the only magazine west of the Mississippi Valley, and is full of the vigorous life of the great West. Its large and handsomely-printed pages are filled with interesting and valuable contributions from the pens of many of the ablest and most eminent writers in the United States. It is universally and highly commended by the local and Eastern press. It is the rising magazine of the day, and its excellence increases with each issue. Yearly subscription, in advance, $4.00. Single number, 35 cents. Furnished, postpaid, with this paper, for $5.75. Send your subscription to this office.

A Word of Appreciation.

Many friends hav interested themselvs in working for the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and in selling TRUTH SEEKER publications. There are several of this class whose names we could giv with pleasure, but this time we specially wish to name two friends who hav exhibited great earnestness and unselfish effort in this direction, to wit, Mrs. A. H. Colby and Mrs. O. K. Smith, who work together. They hav sent in the names of many subscribers and sold many TRUTH SEEKER publications, both while we were in prison and since, and hav never taken a cent of commission or made a penny by the operation themselvs. We feel that their names should be specially mentioned, Mrs. Smith's particularly, who has made untiring efforts for THE TRUTH SEEKER, that friends of the cause everywhere may know who its true friends are. They are now holding forth for a few weeks in Rochester, N. Y. There are others richly worthy of mention and praise, and whom we will gladly name on another occasion, but a particular desire is now felt to render tardy justice to these two faithful and worthy sisters.

Paine's Birthday.

Let it be remembered that on Saturday evening, January 29th, the 143d anniversary of Thomas Paine's birthday will be commemorated in Science Hall, 141 Eighth street, this city. Half a dozen or more speeches will be made by different persons, an original poem recited, letters from a distance read, etc. Let all be present who can, and those who cannot come, write a letter to represent them and to be read at the meeting. All honor to Thomas Paine, America's great friend!

Book Catalog.

Mr. James A. Bliss, of 713 Sansom st., Philadelphia, has gotten up a neat little catalog of Liberal and Spiritualistic works, alphabetically arranged, which he is prepared to send to patrons in all parts of the country. Among the works are TRUTH SEEKER publications. Those wishing one of his catalogs hav only to write him and he will send them gratis.

MRS. VICTORIA WOODHULL is soon to be married to the scion of a wealthy English family, and is destined to move in aristocratic English society. In view of all this, she has been induced to come out in the Court Journal and deny that she was ever a Freelover, that she ever wrote on article in favor of Freelove, or that she ever sanctioned any article on Freelove that appeared in her paper. To those who know her well this will be a trifle surprising, but perhaps nothing that she can do will surprise them greatly. For a woman who lived with two husbands, or two men, at the same time, and advocated a woman's right to select the father of a child she wished to be begotten, all this may do very well. More than all the rest, her name is not Woodhull, and never has been, but Woodhall, as she now calls it, and soon to become something else. Verily the people of this world hav some amusing traits!

THE Liberal, of Lamar, Mo., G. H. Walser, editor and publisher, has become a weekly. We hav received No. 2, but No. 1 failed to reach us. It is overflowing with of interesting matter. It has the kindness to use the following language of us: "THE TRUTH SEEKER comes to us this week in a new dress and looks as tidy as a pin. THE TRUTH SEEKER is the largest Liberal paper published in the world, and every week is brimful of good reading matter. It ought to receive a generous support from the Liberals."

Thank you Bro. Walser for your genial words. May success attend you, lo, these many years, and may your teachings find response in thousands of hearts.

English Works.

Prominent among the books which we bought in London is the "Elements of Social Science; or, Physical, Sexual, and Natural Religion." An exposition of the true cause and only cure of the three primary social evils, poverty, prostitution, and celibacy. By a Doctor of Medicin. Nineteenth edition. Thirty-seventh thousand. 600 pages. Price, neatly bound, $1.50.

Translations of this work hav been published in the following languages: French, German, Dutch, Italian, Portuguese, Russian, Swedish, Hungarian, and Danish.

Opinions of the press:

"This is the only book, so far as we know, in which—at a cheap price and with honest and pure intent and purpose—all the questions affecting the sexes, and the influence of their relations on society, are plainly dealt with. It has now been issued in French as well as in English, and we bring the French edition to the notice of our friends of the International Workingmen's Association, and of our subscribers in France and Belgium, as essentially a poor man's book."—National Reformer, edited by Mr. Charles Bradlaugh.

"The 'Elements of Social Science' is a most remarkable work, written by a man evidently with great knowledge of pathology and political economy. It will be greatly liked or disliked according to the 'school' of the reader; but no one can fail to consider it as one of the most remarkable works of the day on the subjects of which it treats. We are told that it has been largely read in London by medical men."—Medical Press and Circular.

"We hav never risen from the perusal of any work with greater satisfaction than this."—Investigator.

"That book must be read, that subject must be understood, before the population can be raised from its present degraded, diseased, unnatural, and immoral state. We really know not how to speak sufficiently highly of this extraordinary work; we can only say, conscientiously and emphatically, it is a blessing to the human race."—People's Paper. By Ernest Jones.

"It is because, after an impartial consideration of this book, we feel satisfied that the author has no meretricious professional object to subserve, that we are induced to use its publication as a text for the discussion of a vital and pressing subject; and because it bears evidences of research, thorough although misapplied, professional education, some pretensions to philosophy, and a certain earnestness of misguided conviction of the truth of peculiar prevalent economical theeries, which seems to hav led him off his feet, and to hav induced him to venture upon any extravagance in their support. It is in vain to attempt to hide these subjects out of sight. This one book of six hundred closely-printed pages is in its third large edition. It is of no use to ignore the topic as either delicate or disgusting. It is of universal interest. It concerns intimately every human being."—From an adverse review in the Weekly Dispatch, January and February, 1860.

"This work has had eleven English editions, two French, a German, and a Dutch one; and is about to be published in Italian and in Portuguese; and we who hav read and meditated on it rejoice with the author at this success, auguring for it new and increasing good fortune.

"He is convinced that in this lower world too many people are born, and hence very many of them are condemned either to a premature death, or, what is worse, to a wretched life, oppressed by hunger and suffering. He comes forward, therefore, to propose what we ourselvs hav modestly urged in our 'Elements of Hygiene' since 1864, when we said, 'Love, but do not hav offspring.' A disciple of Malthus and of Stuart Mill, he is well versed in modern philosophy and in political economy, and studies the abstruse problem in all its aspects, setting out from the most elementary domestic hygiene to raise himself gradually to the lofty regions of human dignity and civil progress. A foe to all hypocrisy and prejudice, the author of the 'Elements of Social Science' calls things by their real names, and shrinks only from the excessiv sufferings and privations to which the poor children of Adam are condemned. He is firmly convinced that to measure human fecundity in accordance with the economical production of families and of nations is the most certain means of destroying pauperism and all the forms of want. And in this, perhaps, he is in error, for the evils of modern society hav many sources, and with the drying up of one (perhaps even the most fruitful), another and another would present themselvs, which only the combined and constant labors of future generations will perhaps be able to overcome. However this may be, the courage with which the author faces one of the most formidable problems of human society is most praiseworthy.

"Human morality is gradually changing its center of gravity to rest upon a more solid and durable basis. In this new morality the doctrins of Malthus and those of the author of the 'Elements of Social Science' must also hav a large share. In the place of almsgiving, which humiliates, in the place of charity, which caresses an evil that it does not know how to cure, there will be substituted a preventiv philanthropy, which, by studying want and suffering in their most hidden and deep-seated springs, will be able radically to remove them. Jurisprudence, medicin, and morality follow the same movement—are aiming at the same end—to prevent rather than to cure."—Professor Mantegazza, of Florence, in the Journal Medico di Casa.

From James Parton.

MY DEAR EDITOR: Accept my thanks for your new book, "An Infidel Abroad," and the kind words which accompanied it. That book of yours is another proof of the old saying, that perfectly sincere human speech is always interesting. The curse of modern writing is insincerity and half sincerity. That is the chief reason why so very much of it is dull and unreadable. The simple way to make a hit in authorship or editorship is to strike right out from the shoulder at your object. I do not mean that a writer is to disregard the proprieties and decencies of civilization, nor show disrespect to those who differ from him in opinion. I mean merely that he who speaks to his fellow-men with directness and simplicity of what really interests him will be heard with attention.

You hav done so in your book, and hence it is racy and readable. I wish you had had more time, but then you had not. If you go around the world I hope you will take your time to it and write at more leisure.

Very truly yours, JAMES PARTON.

P. S.—Mind and hav THE TRUTH SEEKER well provided for. Let us hav one paper in New York in which honest men utter their real thoughts—not merely the thoughts they think will be acceptable to the reader. Mr. Wakeman's articles are of more than golden value. He is one of the most enlightened of our limited race, as well as one of the most noble-minded. There is healing in him. P.

The Liberal League.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

Herbert Spencer says: "The mere gathering of individuals into a group does not constitute them a society. A society is formed when, besides nearness, there is co-operation. So long as the members of the group do not combine their energies to achieve some common end or ends there is little to keep them together. They are prevented from separating only when the wants of each are better satisfied by uniting his efforts with those of others than they would be if he acted alone. Co-operation, then, is at once that which cannot exist without a society, and that for which a society exists." It is evident that co-operation is essential to the existence of society, and unless there is a full recognition of the fact that co-operation of individualities is a fundamental necessity in the very structure of society, no society will be formed with cohesion enough to accomplish any worthy end or ends.

"But co-operationi mplies organization. If acts are to be effectually combined there must be arrangements under which they are adjusted in their times, amounts, and characters."

The National Liberal League, seemingly, must in the event of success conform to these general laws. As a society it can not, it will not, escape the usual environments of societies in general. And soci ies are not so unlike each the other as not to legitimate the inference that similar needs and conditions come alike to them. However widely the purposes of different societies may be, it is evident no such wide difference exists as to the use of legitimate means for the attainment of these widely different purposes or ends. All societies demand as a condition of success multiplicity in unity, or co-operation through organization. These are conditions without which reasonable hopes of success cannot be entertained.

The Liberal movement of a hundred years has lost much, and has thrown away much of its power, because of the light value it has put upon organization. This, no doubt, is partly due to the memories of the past, so filled up with abuse, as seen in the bloody records of religions, which hav been the true outcome of theocracies and ecclesiastical organizations, and partly from the fear that the individual will be lost in the organization. We can readily see the force of this reasoning, but we must remember that the bloody pages of history owe their existence to the assumed fact that these ecclesiastical organizations were acting only in the name of their divinities, and were only doing the will of the same. But we of to-day are in no such fear, for we are reasonably emancipated from those conditions which rendered church organizations so formidable.

The organic cohesivness of the National Liberal League compromises no individual rights. It has no infallible dictum. It has no bible of antiquity which we must believe or be damned. It has no thumbscrew, no fagot, no threat of torture, though we are under its organization. You or I, if not pleased to remain within the organization, can step out, and we are in no danger from thus doing.

I know that there are many of our Liberal people who seem to think if they allow their names to be put upon paper in any way connected with any of our Liberal societies they are signing away their liberties, and yet how absurd it is to look for the prosperity of our Liberal cause without co-operation, without organization. I think if the Liberals of this country would work as they can, if they were to do their level best, we could redeem this land of the brave and free in the next ten years. I mean that we could reach that point where, in the councils of this nation, the church would no longer rule supreme. I do not think that this will ever be done by any kind of strategy, no fighting with concealed weapons. I am not a believer in that kind of warfare. I do not suspect that we are to win by any attempt on our part to deceive the church. The success of our cause is in the loss of power to the church. That they are to aid us in this work is among the most imbecil of expectations, or that we are to secure the silence of the churches by telling them that we mean nothing, that we are a harmless pack of fools, that our success does not mean their fall from the dizzy hights of their ecclesiastical domination, that the demands of Liberalism when granted will leave them in possession of the earth as theirs, held for their Emanuel, for the benefit of God's elect.

Nay, nay. The success of Liberalism in this land means the loss of power on the part of the church. It means hostility, but not hate, not thumbscrews, not the dungeon. It means the hostility of an open, fair, fight. No strategy, no lies. It means to the church that we propose to win by fair means, and only such. Liberalism claims the right to win on the ground of justice to man, woman, and child. We will not in this fight trespass upon the rights of any man, woman, or child, let them be in the churches or out of them. We will fight for the rights of a church as soon as for our own, taking it for granted that she can hav no rights conflicting with the general interest of mankind.

Here we speak in the interest of one of the Liberal organizations of this country, and in doing so we are of the opinion that what is true in regard to one, as to the best means to accomplish our purpose, is equally true as to the various organizations, because they mainly aim at the same end. The objects as set forth in the platform of the National Liberal League need not to be reiterated here, as they hav been so long before the public, and hence are well known. The important question itself is, How are we to realize the end as set forth therein? The conditions which are pre-eminently important are thus stated, viz., co-operation through effectiv organization.

First. The need of local societies or Leagues. I am sure that to these we are to look for the force behind the throne, which is mainly responsible for the doing of the needed work. We cannot well overestimate the value, the potency of these local societies in the performance of the work around which our fondest expectations cling.

Second. Through state conventions of these Leagues.

Third. In the last place, through the national annual congress.

Now, here is a trinity, as important in the interest of our work as the trinity in the church—God, the devil, and Christ. We cannot, any more than the church, divorce either one of this trinity.

What can be done to invest our local Leagues with effectivness? We hav two hundred of them. Surely it is a reasonable presumption that two hundred Leagues are a power if they are at work. How are we to obtain the real strength of the thousands of associated individualities? That there is at least a very large possible strength none will call in question; but to make this possible strength effectiv, this is what we want. Can it be done? I believe that it can. But it is a fact that many of our Liberalists are not informed as to how this work is to be done, and here is where we need instruction. Here is where the third person in this trinity has a large duty to perform, of which hereafter.

An interest must be created in these local societies. But an interest can be made to exist only as the lesson of co-operation is learned. In the excitement of the moment, when there is a clear presentation of the Liberal League platform, comparativ strangers are called together, and at once a League is organized, and everything looks promising. But how soon the zeal of the first meeting cools, and interest seemingly dies out. This is all legitimate, and is just what a reasonable expectation would warrant. But suppose that something more than the mere fact of signing our names to the platform was made prominent—the fact of co-operation. This is the word, this is what needs to be accomplished. We are to learn that having become members we must work all as one in this noble cause. A League does not mean work for one, two, or three, but work for each member of the League. If we are to look for some one else, some one who peradventure has more influence than we hav, to do the needed work, we will only witness defeat. What we need, as members of these local societies, is to feel that each one, always including ourself, has a work to do. And not only this, but a firm resolution to do that work. When this spirit pervades our ranks we will soon see the results will be commensurate with these individual co-operativ endeavors.

But what are the stimuli which would reasonably secure these activ measures? We must in the first place plead with ourselvs the justness of our cause, the reasonableness of the claims made. It would seem to every well-developed Liberal that here in this one consideration alone is enough to inspire all such with a spirit of work and sacrifice. But there are many good reasons which should act as incentivs to such minds to persistent work. The spirit which prompts a man to set out fruit trees or shade trees when he may feel that before the days of their fruitage, or before the shade tree shall spread its branches he will hav passed away, would make workers in our ranks to defeat whom it would be impossible. To work in the interest of our humanity, to loose sight of self for a day, and read the history of human woe and the agony of humanity's great heart under the domination of superstition and priestcraft, we will find enough, as before, to inspire us with zeal in this Liberal work. Are there not incentivs drawn from the needs which the reign of superstition and priestly rule hav rendered evident? Needs which a hundred centuries hav created through the misrule of these damning agencies, superstition and priestcraft?

The people are still largely superstitious, and are led or driven, as are the beasts, without their consent; damned or saved according to the value which a priesthood puts upon them. And then if we care at all for those that are to come into this world may we not strive to make suitable conditions, so that the hope might be entertained of having a better babyhood out of which a better manhood and womanhood would come to us.

Now, these are among the primary incentivs to effectiv action on the part of every member of the local Leagues. But an interest can be created in this home work, in a League of four, five, ten, twenty, or any number if rightly managed. Is it possible for any number of thoughtful men and women, having an understanding of the meaning of Liberalism, to meet at regular intervals without creating an interest? Let the societies thus meet, though but few, and they will soon build up an interest that will draw to them other thoughtful persons, and then a free interchange of views among these faithful few will develop an increasing interest which will proclaim the coming of liberty to the victims of superstition and a corrupt priesthood.

Again, how soon such devotion would find aid in the state conventions and in the national, and in securing men of ability to speak for them. Such a League would hav a living record, and from such well-disciplined men and women how readily we could find those suitable to represent the Liberal work in the National Liberal League.

Secondly, we speak a word for state conventions. I am inclined to think that through state conventions we could accomplish much in the interest of our state work. An interest can be worked up in the state which will tend largely to secure co-operativ action among the Leagues of the state, and thereby we would get twice the represeutation in the national congress that we do now. Let a state convention be held every year in the early part of the summer. Having worked up an interest in that direction during the winter, we could hope for a grand success in bringing together the Leagues of the state in council, comparing respectiv methods of work, and thereby learning the best method in co-operativ work, and thus a rule for action would soon become formulated into a general law. This is the way to make effectiv laws as well as those that are just.

If at the annual meeting of the National Liberal League there could be a meeting of the entire Board of Directors, requiring perhaps a whole day or more, for the purpose of hearing reports from the different states as to the work done, and the methods in the doing of the same, we might thereby find the best possible data to present to the National Liberal League for its action. I think that there can be no well grounded objection to thus calling into existence state annual conventions. Last year, largely through the efforts of S. B. McCracken, of Detroit, Michigan, such a convention was held. This was the first attempt of anything of the kind to my knowledge. Although the time and the weather were most unfavorable, no doubt can exist in the mind of any thoughtful person who attended the meeting as to the practicability of holding such conventions, nor the usefulness of the same. The state was quite well represented by representativ men and women of the state. I hope that the matter will be fully considered, as I am satisfied that much strength would come to the National Liberal League through such conventions.

Third. The National Liberal League. This body is an indispensable factor in the furtherance of the work so much needed to be done. At the annual session of the National Liberal League much can be done to aid the local societies and the state conventions in having reports made to the congress as to the condition of the Leagues represented in the congress. A day or days might be set apart solely for the purpose of hearing these reports from all parts of the nation. How full of interest the reports would be, and what a large amount of practical wisdom would come of these reports! And then this fact alone would be a strong incentiv to put in an appearance at the congress. The fact that something is expected of the delegates would induce many to attend; a sense of duty would come up as a reason for going. Then a report from the executiv officers of the states, with the advantage which they had derived from the state conventions.

And thus would the National Congress be advised as to the condition of the work throughout the entire union, and would understand through these reports the needs of the entire field of labor. An annual address sent out from the National Congress to all of the Leagues of the country would also hav a happy result. I may be all wrong, but I am fully persuaded that if these measures could be adopted we would see good results come therefrom.

Orthodox Parentage, Hell, and Fear.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am glad you permit the subject of parentage to be discussed in THE TRUTH SEEKER, although those who discuss it may be called low, loose, lawless, impure, indecent, etc My parents were both zealous Methodists in the old Blue-law state of Connecticut. I was begotten and in embryo during a great revival period. Having made hereditary descent a study for forty years, I hav been able to trace the cause and origin of that which is, and has been, to me life-long organic curses and suffering. Previous and years subsequent to my birth my parents were attendants upon and filled and intoxicated with the fervor and heat of camp-meetings. They both had great faith in their religion, and according to the law that two positivs produce a negativ, not only in a grammatical but a cerebral sense, I was born a skeptic, and a natural hater of priestcraft and bigotry. I hav not faith enough for the purposes of a normal, mundane life.

My mother's naturally activ fear was, during my fetal life, often greatly excited—fear of that hell that in those days (62 years ago) was depicted with so much terror, exciting language, and emotion, and that fear was impressed upon my plastic brain, and was a most cursed, withering, damning inheritance. Ah, reader, no tongue can tell, no language describe what my imaginativ, sensitiv nature suffered through childhood and boyhood from this inherited orthodox camp-meeting fear of the impending judgment day, and my awful doom that I might receive. And this extreme inherited fear was constantly excited by what I was taught at home—what I heard in prayers and doleful hymns such as I was taught to sing. My mother, my good, loving, but blindly-led mother, would tell me that if I was naughty God would strike me dead; that if I played or whistled on Sunday I would hav to go to a lake of fire and brimstone, etc. And I used also to hav awful dreams of the great judgment day, and be so frightened that I would be wakened to gladly find it was not a reality.

When I saw a dark cloud and heard the peals of thunder, the wind roaring, and saw the lightning flashing, I trembled with terror, thinking it was God coming to judgment, and I would run into the house, catch hold of my mother's dress, or crawl under the bed, etc. Such, reader, is a mere allusion to what would fill a volume in detail, to what I suffered in my young days from inherited fear.

Thirty-five years ago I examined the head of a young man who had been through a Baptist revival. There was much heat in his top head, and pain too. I told him and his parents that he ought to keep away from meetings, that he might become insane. He thought he had committed the "unpardonable sin," went to the insane asylum at Utica, N. Y., and died there a victim to his inherited blind faith and fear.

"Nor doom, nor tower, nor twilight shade,
Nor hero fallen, nor beauteous maid,
To ruin all consigned,
Can with such pathos touch my breast,
As on the maniac's form impressed,
The ruins of the mind."

I knew, when a boy amid religious excitement, several noble mothers rendered insane, and lost to reason, hope, themselvs, family, friends, and society by this damnable magnetic, psychologic raving from the pulpit. In 1843, during the Millerism epidemic, I knew in Chenango county, N. Y., a noble woman driven to insanity, to the great grief of her husband and children. She raved and tore all her clothes off, and was taken to the asylum, the wreck of a cultivated mind, the victim of the Miller delusion that the world was to come to an end, etc. That asylum contained fifty of Miller's victims. Had he murdered one of them, or even stolen a horse, he would hav been a criminal in court, and the subject of public condemnation, but he was a preacher of the extreme orthodox stamp, and, at most, only a little wild or premature. Oh, what awful volumes might be written on religious insanity and its causes! Oh, how my young, sensitiv mind trembled with terror at Methodist revivals in New York as I listened to the doom of poor sinners from the divine preacher whom I was taught to reverence, and vainly tried to like! Oh, how I suffered when women fell down on the floor with "the power," and raved and foamed, and minister, men, and women would shout and rant at the scene! Often was I in the condition of the poet,

"What hope, or whither to retreat?
Each nerve at once unstrung;
Chill fear had fettered fast my feet,
And chained my speechless tongue."

I tell you, reader, that the people hav, by the law of evolution through parentage, become organically orthodox. By this law what is habit and education in the parent becomes organic in the child. I hav seen children three years old cry and beg for whisky or a pipe because one or both parents drank or smoked continually. So it is, socially, morally, or intellectually. We must get out of orthodoxy through education and parentage. I am glad our sexual, social, and marital relations are coming to the front for rigid investigation. I hav made myself odious for forty years for writing and talking about them. All hail, Slenker, Preston, Colman, Pillsbury, Tillotson, Barry, Heywood, and many others who see this matter as I do, and are not to be silenced by those who see truth and light in some directions, but are too wise and pure to see anything wrong in our inherited orthodox social and sexual relations, laws, customs, etc. Yes, the great mass of the people are organically full of fear and of faith in unreal gods, devils, heavens, hells, and judgment days. Thanks to the light of science, the false and frightful stories of ghosts, apparitions, raw head and bloody bones, and witches I used to hear at night around the fireside till I was filled and thrilled with fear and trembling, hav about "played out."

If there is anything infernal it is to excite human fears about that which has no existence, whether by the fireside or in the pulpit. Let all, especially children, be taught that there is nothing in the world to fear but our own ignorance and discordant brains, and a true and happy life will follow in due time.

J. H. COOK.

First Patter of a Shower.

120 LEXINGTON AVE., NEW YORK, Dec. 18, 1880.

FRIEND LELAND: That letter from your pen in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 11th under the head of "How to Promote the Leagues" is practical and to the point. It ought to arouse an enthusiasm which shall extend even beyond the circles of the local auxiliary Leagues. It points out the way for those who are in sympathy with its objects to ally themselvs with this organization, even if there be not Liberals enough to organize an auxiliary League. Let all such become either life or annual members of the national organization. And why should we not hav at least one hundred life members? If I am correctly informed, there is at this time only one. Put me down for another. Inclosed you will find my check covering the fee for life membership. I find it not a little inconvenient at this time to make this contribution, but if we all wait until we can do it as well as not, a very important duty to a no less important organization will be indefinitly neglected. Why cannot Liberals throughout the country who hav either a business or a salary which will insure them a comfortable roof and a tolerable outfit of clothing for the next twelve months turn in and enroll themselvs as life members of the National Liberal League? If all who, with a little self-denial, could do this would do it at once, we might not only hav one hundred but one thousand life members. And the funds which would thus be brought to the treasury of the association would enable it to do an amount of work which would more than quadruple the present number of the auxiliary organizations, and place the national association in a position to command the respect of those who only speak of it now in a way to misrepresent it and its purposes. It would require but a small individual contribution from each member of the auxiliary Leagues to honor their presidents with certificates of life membership. In most places the presidents of the Leagues are, most likely, representativ men. When they are also men of means they will be likely to respond to your invitation, and send the necessary $25 to make them life members. But when they are not thus blessed with abundant means, it would be certainly the graceful thing for the members of the auxiliary to "chip in" and obtain the certificate of life membership for its presiding officer.

In addition to your suggestion of life and annual membership for increasing the number and the financial strength of the national organization, I would propose to Liberals throughout the country to make contributions to the secretary or treasurer of Liberal publications, and a great variety of other things, to be set up in an anteroom bazar at each annual meeting, these articles to be sold for the benefit of the League treasury. I am willing to initiate this project with a proposition to furnish $25 worth of my publications. Let it be understood that either the secretary or treasurer can draw on me for my publications to this amount when they shall be wanted. If other Liberal publishers will contribute of their publications in like manner, the book counter of the bazar will be quite attractiv. There are those engaged in mercantil, manufacturing, and other pursuits, who could contribute some of their goods to the bazar. Liberal women throughout the country can make up various useful little articles for the same purpose. I would suggest that they be useful articles rather than ornamental ones in the main, for the reason that Liberals are generally practical people, and want to know the use of a thing before purchasing it. If every woman whose sympathies are with the League would make up something, even though it be of small value, the aggregation of these little things would afford a vast variety which would meet the varied tastes and wants of those who attend the annual congress. Let me ask the Liberals who read this if they will not each and all pledge themselvs to send in to the treasurer, Mr. T. B. Wakeman, 93 Nassau street, New York, before the next annual meeting, such books, manufactured articles, handiwork, etc., as they can afford to contribute to the cause. The pledges might be given by postal cards or letters addressed to our worthy secretary. Let us hav a Liberal League boom for 1881.

I hav no doubt that every member of the League feels to thank you, as I do, for that ringing article, which informs us how to promote the Leagues.

Trusting that it may arouse others as it has me, I remain
Yours truly, E. B. FOOTE, Sr., M.D.

This a prompt example, which I hope will be contagious. How many more Liberals are there in the United States who love Liberalism twenty-five dollars' worth? Could a thousand such as Dr. Foote be found, the League would be invincible. We often hear of disciples in the church who are instant in season and out of season. Well, Dr. Foote is one of the few cases out of the church; but at every "instant" he is doing more good than a whole meeting-house full of dear brethren in the Lord. His suggestion about our annual bazar, or fair, seems practical, and we hope others will take up the idea and make response. The old antislavery movement was urged on and aided by festivals and fairs. Let the Liberals be wise unto their own generation as other reformers hav been in theirs.

Dr. Foote is an activ member of the Defense Association here in New York. If he were out of it, a large part of its defense would be gone.

I am happy to add that annual members are also coming, in response to the same appeal which has stirred up Dr. Foote. They are, so far as received, E. Carpenter, Charlevoix, Mich.; D. M. Worley, Lebanon, Ohio; Louis H. Freligh and Louis H. Freligh, Jr., St. Louis, Mo. Will many others in this Christmas and holiday time remember the League and become its supporters? T. C. LELAND.

Mrs. Severance on Mrs. Slenker.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav been greatly interested in Mrs. Slenker's papers on the subject of "Sexual Intemperance," but I think she is unsound in some of her positions. For instance, the assumption that all sexual diseases of women are the result of sexual intemperance.

In my experience for over twenty-three years as a physician, I hav had many cases, and some of the most severe ones I hav been called to treat were unmarried women, those who had never had any sex relations at all.

I will agree with her that in many cases such results as she depicts follow marriage, but that does not prove that no sexual relations are necessary or healthful. We find this is almost a nation of dyspeptics, but that does not prove that we would be better off without food, or that it is not necessary and useful. It only shows a disregard among the people of understanding and living in accord with natural laws in selecting the kind of food adapted to the wants of the system and using only enough to supply the natural waste and keep the body in a healthy, balanced condition. So in regard to this question of sex relation. We hav not studied the subject sufficiently with reference to the natural law of use, but hav blindly followed laws and customs instead of reason and understanding.

If men and women were to commingle only when love was the basis, and a mutual demand existed, benefit, instead of injury, would result. But with demand on the one side, and submission on the other, whether from a sense of duty or desire to please, disease and unhappiness must result.

Improper food, which fails to furnish the necessary materials to build good, strong muscles, fashionable dressing, which presses upon and weighs down the abdominal muscles, are frequently causes of uterine displacements and diseases, while gross food, which loads the blood with impurities, may develop either catarrh, consumption, or leucorrhea, without any local cause that can be discerned.

I hav known cases of prolonged uterine diseases that had baffled the skill of the most eminent doctors to be perfectly cured by proper treating. I hav also known men in whom abstinence had caused seminal weakness to be restored to health and vigor by resuming sex relations.

Sexual abuses are almost universal and come to a great extent from the long-taught doctrin of woman's inferiority and her duty "to submit herself unto her husband in all things," and it is ruinous in its effects upon both women and men, and likewise injurious to offspring. A properly-adjusted relation, founded upon love, entered into by mutual desire, with a realization of the sanctity of the relation, regenerates the whole being by the highest magnetic exchange, each being benefited by receiving the elements of the opposit, and lifted thereby to a higher plane of existence.

Looking upon this relation as low, filthy, or obscene is the result of debauchery, and will never be found with parties rightly adapted to each other.

That procreation is the only use belonging legitimately to the sexual act is placing that relation upon a purely animal plane, whereas it is not only a generator of physical life, but of mental and spiritual as well, quickening the whole being into new activities.

Giv women to understand that they are mistresses of their own bodies, and that they are to rule as queens in the realm of the affections, instead of belonging to their husbands, as they now do legally, giv them a chance by equal rights before the laws and in society, which will invest them with powers for pecuniary independence, with laws protecting them from rape in marriage as well as out, and education in regard to the laws governing their being in every department of life, and the abuses of sexuality will soon be remedied and the uses preserved. Rose tints of health will then take the place of the present pallor on the cheeks of women, and hearts weighed down by the chains of sexual slavery will rebound with happy gladness in their newly-acquired liberty.

Freedom for woman is what is needed; freedom in its broadest, highest sense, religiously, politically, and socially; individual sovereignty. And from free mothers a race of moral and intellectual giants will be born, exempt from disease and premature death. For this much-desired condition, let us all use our best endeavors. Yours for all truth,

JULIA H. SEVERANCE.

Letters from Friends.

FALLS CITY, NEB., Jan. 11, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: You can count on me for a "V" for your trip round the world. Yours truly,

J. V. HALLENBAUGH.

FALLS CITY, NEB., Jan. 11, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: You can put me down for five dollars to send you around the world. If enough can't be secured at that, put me down for ten dollars. I am so well pleased with your travels abroad that I must hav them in book form, with steel plate.

FRANK WELLS.

BELLEVILLE, KAN., Jan. 4, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Because I am willing and ready to carry on the good work of liberalizing the world, and because your letters from Europe were so very interesting and eminently graphic in their delineation, I will respond to the call for ten dollars for two copies of the work to be published descriptiv of your travels around the world. You will draw on me any day when the fund is assured for that purpose. Fraternally yours, H. PATRICK, M.D.

FREEPORT, L. I., Jan. 11, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: Count me one for five dollars on your proposed trip around the world. I think you an excellent writer for the occasion. I don't know that I could spend that amount in any way where I could receive as much benefit as reading your letters of travel. I read all your letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER concerning your trip to Brussels and back, and liked them very much.

Accept my best wishes for your health and the circulation of your paper.

Very respectfully, MRS. WILLIAM RAYNOR.

RENOVA, PA., Jan. 12, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Put me down for $5.00 to aid in sending you around the world. I consider this a good investment, as I feel confident that upon your return, and after the publication of the book, I will receive something worth $10, and thereby double my money I will remit whenever you are assured that you will undertake the trip.

Yours truly, GEORGE W. HUBER.

CHAMPLIN, MINN., Jan. 7, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: The friendly letters in your first number for the new year in regard to your round trip strike me with delight, almost to excitement. It is just the thing we want. You are without exception the choice of the Freethinkers to undertake that grand but hazardous journey. Your descriptiv letters of your European travels hav given us proof of your ability to giv us a rich feast of information from your pen. You will hav to go, and be sure to visit the rock-hewn temples of India. Put me down good for five dollars when you are ready to start.

J. KINSER.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., Jan. 10, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Though I read with great pleasure your European letters, as I hav much of your other writings (not all by any means, for you must hav a steam engine attached to your arm and brain), I would rather subscribe five dollars to hav you stay at home and conduct THE TRUTH SEEKER than to send you to China (where I spent four-and-half years) and around the globe. You are needed here. After your work of reformation is finished (say one hundred years from now), you can count on me as a subscriber for a foreign trip.

Yours, HORACE L. FAIRCHILD.

LISBON, IOWA, Jan. 8, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Count me one that will giv five dollars toward raising the necessary funds to send you around the world. I wish I could send a number of names, but I am a school-girl only fourteen years old. If the book comes out I will try to hav it placed in our town library if none of the other Liberals around here do. Nothing will please me better than reading those books. Yours truly,

ANNIE LAURIE SAILOR.

NORTHFIELD, MINN., Jan. 11, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Though a stranger to me, I hold you my friend. The suggestion made by D. C. Coleman, of California, strikes me very favorably. Count me as one of the number for $5.00 toward sending you around the world.

Your letters from Europe (those that I hav read) were very interesting and instructiv. our descriptions were so clear and vivid that I almost fancied myself present at every scene. I am over anxious to read the "Infidel Abroad." Please send me one containing steel plate engraving. Please accept my best thanks for that symbol, "We Seek for Truth." I prize it very highly. Thanks, too, for the parcel of TRUTH SEEKERS; they are read with eagerness, then circulated. In that way they fall into hands which otherwise would be ignorant of its existence.

I am indebted to my friend Sadie Rice for the first TRUTH SEEKER that I ever saw. I presume if it had not been for her I would still be ignorant of the existence of one of the best papers in the world, and ignorant, too, of our brave and noble hero that was arrested and convicted, cast into prison, and for what? For defending liberty and free speech. And by whom? By our Christian devils Comstock, Colgate, debased villains! R. B. Hayes is no better. Thanks that his power is drawing to an end. Perhaps, however, it will be while one bigot steps out a fogie steps in. But let us expect better of Garfield. Time will tell. Truly yours, S. J. LENONT.

MEMPHIS, MO., Jan. 5, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I unite with your hosts of friends in congratulating you on your safe return from roaming among the tombs.

Your letters were exceedingly interesting and instructiv. You seem to hav met with no dead devils —all gods or goddesses. It does not enter into the scheme of Christians to kill their devil, he being their principal stock in trade.

I think you should hear from at least five hundred at five dollars apiece to warrant you in starting on a trip around the globe. But when you get promised what you think will suffice let me know and I'll send five dollars.

I hope you will "take in" the Garden of Eden, and giv us a correct map of those four holy rivers described in holy writ. It seems they originate in a little garden plot, and diverge to the cardinal points. I say little garden, for even Christians must consider it to hav been A-dam outrage for Jehovah, bad as his character is according to the Bible, to doom the twain to cultivate a garden of more than an acre, while yet in a state of nudity, with eyes unsealed, and without pruning hooks or any horticultural implements, and Eve still innocent of the apple and snake.

Profane rivers are formed on the opposit principle, small rivulets unite to produce them. What a surging flood it must take at their source in the garden to form four such remarkable rivers. And that must hav been another source of terror and danger to Adam and Eve. The roar must be awful, and they might hav stumbled in and been swept out of the garden by the terrific current.

But we shall consider whatever you say of the garden as authentic. STEPHEN YOUNG.

BAXTER SPRINGS, KAN., Jan. 14, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: I hav been at work here for several years in behalf of truth, freedom, and humanity, and especially for you and the noble beacon-light of humanity, THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav worked with more zeal and inspiration for that than any other cause. I ask every one I see (except those who I know would feel insulted) to take it, and giv away mine after I hav read it. I think the truth has received a new impetus here and will spread fast.

J. H. Cook gave us a lecture, and O. A. Phelps three able and effectiv lectures, last week.

I hav enjoyed the reading of your letters from Europe more than I can tell.

I, too, will giv you five dollars to go around the world, and send me two volumes containing a description thereof. May you liv to do this great work!

H. CRUM.

EAST RODMAN, N. Y., Dec. 27, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: I want the paper another year, and you will find a post-office order for $3 to pay for the same. I will second D. C. Coleman's proposition with a V that you visit the Holy Land, if no other country, though I should like very much to read your travels around the world. Mark Twain, in "Innocents Abroad," did up Palestine somewhat and was the means of opening my eyes to some of the pious frauds of the Christian church. I will agree to dispose of five copies of your book as soon as completed. Also I will canvass my town and sell as many more as I can, and really I think that Liberals could do nothing to better account to break up those monstrous lies and myths which hav been for the past eighteen centuries the stock in trade of priestcraft than to accept your offer in No. 51. I think that it would be going direct at the foundation of as false a system of religion as there is on earth.

I heard a sermon a few days ago at a funeral, from a Universalist standpoint, combating skepticism, and such arguments, good only from the coward's castle, could not stand a minute in a fair discussion.

It is no wonder that Christian nations are particularly noted for their dishonesty, hypocrisy, and bloodthirstiness. It is the sure outcome of its teachings that crime and sin can be propitiated by prayer to an ever-changing God or through the belief in the blood of the Savior. If there could be an easier method still exhumed from the mind of some monomaniac for the remission of sin it would take the place of Christianity in a very short time. It is the easiness and quickness with which sins are bleached out that particularly recommends it for patronage, and generally its patrons need some whitening to make them fit for decent society. M. E. ROSE.

CHAMPAIGN CITY, ILL., Jan. 8, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND: I wish to say that I hav been a constant reader of your valuable paper for three or four years. I could not get along without it. There are many good articles in it. While you were in prison I watched you. I hav found you what I call a true man. I will say right here I respect you far more than I do R. B. Hayes and wife. They work well in the Grundy family. They are afraid to do an act of simple justice. I can never forgiv them for the course they pursued in not setting you free when that contemptible Comstock and that Christian Benedict placed you behind the bars for no crime. I hav no respect for them.

I wish to say that I will subscribe five dollars for two volumes on your trip around the world. I hope you will go. Your writings are so interesting, giving such a plain history of that old country. If five dollars is not enough I will giv more. I think the $200,000 ought to be made up for you instead of Grant. Hoping to see you some time, I remain, A. SHERMAN.

BOZEMAN, MON., Jan. 1, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I favor friend Coleman's proposition that as many as feel disposed giv five dollars and send you to China, Japan, and Judea, and get a history of your travels.

I pledge five dollars to that object. Pass the word along the line. BYRON PLUM.

[Similar letters to the foregoing hav been received from other friends, agreeing to contribute $5.00 to the Round-the-World Fund and take in exchange the promised two volumes. Among such are the following: E. Van Buskirk; F. S. Ray, $10; G. B. Purdy, J. J. Reuscher, Louis Goddu; John Heibel, John G. Reichel, J. J. Reuscher, C. B. Tucker, W. F. Freeman, W. O. Smith, M. D., A. E. Haslem, Wm. Fray, L. P. Santy, Amos Knapp, A. Cohn, A. Bennett, F. A. Day, Joseph F. Burr, L. F. Johnson, Abe Fiske, F. F. Blodgett, Abner Kimball, Jacob Neihart, M. H. Coffin, J. M. Woods, H. S. Hall, Chas. Wiltse, Icahabod Stafford, James B. Denton, Wm. Holgate, Wm. K. Gerhard, Henry Tilly and a few others. As we said before, it rests with our friends whether we make the circuit of the planet or not. It will require a good many at $5.00 apiece to make up the necessary amount.—ED. T. S.]

FALL RIVER, MASS., Jan. 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Many thanks for the copy of "An Infidel Abroad." It is really the best book of travels, for so short a period, that I hav ever read, for I followed you all the way in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and gave away the papers that others might be pleased also. I sent some papers as far as Montana, and one person told me the letter from Rome was the finest from the Eternal City he had ever seen. I shall take great pleasure in giving favorable notice of the book, and hope you will feel encouraged to make the proposed tour around the world, that you may gather information and material for another volume.

I congratulate you upon your safe return, and I know you must feel, after all you hav seen, that "there's no place like home."

THE TRUTH SEEKER in its new dress and handsome type is a perfect gem. It is just right now, and presents a lovely appearance; and I trust it will continue to grow in grace and beauty, and "may its shadow never grow less."

I am greatly pleased with T. B. Wakeman's articles. "Constructiv Liberalism" is very fine.

With thanks for your kind wishes, which I fully reciprocate, I am, as ever,

Your sincere friend, SUSAN H. WIXON.

CHICAGO, ILL., Jan. 4, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to see the improved appearance of THE TRUTH SEEKER and you may rest assured I shall do what I can to extend its circulation. I am delighted with the article of Mr. Wakeman's on "Constructiv Liberalism," and let us hav more of it.

We Western Liberals know the stuff heroes are made of and propose to recognize it.

Fraternally, MRS. H. S. LAKE.

CENTRAL, S. C., Jan. 10, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: During the last seven years I hav written you quite a number of letters. It has been a great pleasure to me to correspond with you, especially when my communications were acknowledged. I used to feel that I was some advantage to your paper and the Liberal cause generally, but it seems those days of usefulness hav passed away, leaving me a drone in the hive.

I must now say what I once thought I never would say, and that is, Stop THE TRUTH SEEKER to my address. This is the hardest sentence I ever wrote in my life, and is like burying a dear friend. But I feel it my duty, and the sacrifice must be made.

I hav stood the pangs of conscience that all honest delinquents feel too long already. But I only did so under the hope that my health would improve and I become able to pay you up and still take your paper. I had made myself almost certain that a favorable change in my business would take place with the close of the year 1880; but just as I was about to realize my cherished hopes an unlooked-for misfortune blasted every prospect of success and made me poorer than ever, and now shame forbids me to sponge on you any longer.

In ordering you to stop the paper I beg leave to say that THE TRUTH SEEKER and its editor are no less dear to me now than at any time previous. THE TRUTH SEEKER is still my darling paper, and its editor, in my estimation, one of the greatest and best men on earth, and I only beg of you to think of me as you used to when I was in better circumstances and working diligently for your paper. I am still the same man in mind and principle, but not financially. I further hope you will not despair of getting what I owe you. I am determined to pay you if I hav to do so by sending you ten cents at a time; and if I liv long enough to get you paid up, and your paper is still alive, I will take it again as far as I can pay for it.

It is a hard struggle to giv it up. I now think of the long Saturday nights when I will hav no paper to make me forget my poverty and misery. How much I will miss it none but myself can know. As I said before, it is like burying a dear friend.

I now take a sad, sad farewell of you and your corps of employees. I hope you will sometimes think of me as your old friend, and reflect that I don't leave you from choice, and hav only yielded when prostrated by disease and poverty. You now hav, as you always hav had, my best wishes for your present and future prosperity. Farewell! Farewell! R. M. CASEY.

P. S.—My warmest emotions of friendship will follow you if you make the trip around the world.

R. M. C.

[No; no. This old friend's TRUTH SEEKER shall not be stopped whether he has money to pay for it or not. So long as he wants it he shall hav it if we are able to continue its publication. It would be well if some generous persons who hav the ability might also hav the inclination to contribute something toward furnishing the paper to such ardent admirers of THE TRUTH SEEKER as Bro. Casey is when not able to pay for it. There are many such in the country.—ED. T. S.]

EXCELSIOR, MINN., Jan. 11, 1881.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: You must be greatly bored receiving so many letters, but I am a little girl only fourteen years old and don't know any better.

Through the kindness of friends I hav read your history for the past couple of years in THE TRUTH SEEKER

While you were in trouble I hardly noticed how good a paper it was; but now that you seem to be happy I hav found it will be hard for me to do without THE TRUTH SEEKER.

It is a bad time of year for one like me to make money, so Mr. Bennett, if you will send me the paper for a couple of months I pledge you the word and honor of an Infidel maiden that I will pay you for it, and I think by that time I shall be able to take it longer. I would like it to commence with Mrs. Besant's debate. Your friend,

BIRDIE SHUCK.

P. S.—Whether you send the paper or not, I shall not join the church. B. S.

[Most assuredly we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER to our young friend, having full confidence that she will pay for it as she says, and that she will be a regular reader of it for years to come. We hope our little sister Birdie has a long and happy life before her. We hope to hear from our young friend again.—ED. T. S.]

CINCINNATI, O., Jan. 10, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Religions of all kinds are a delusion, inasmuch as gods and other states of existence are all fudge. Such things never existed as facts. From beginning to end it is all founded on fiction and purely imaginary, and the whole fabric is built upon falsehood and deception. When nothing but the square truth stands to the front the whole business falls flat.

I care not when, or where, or by whom a religion was invented, it never possessed one particle of truth outside of the present life. There is neither sense nor honesty in any religion constructed on a theory that mankind never ceases to exist. Death to all is the end of life, and total extinction, and almost every priest knows this to be true, but is too dishonest to say so. T. WINTER.

SOUTH BARRE, N. Y., Jan. 5, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: We hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER from its first issue in Illinois. Told you at the time we would giv you the half-dollar for the cause, that we were out of the woods, and that we did not need your little beacon, but being honest and earnest you continued to send it to me, and finally, as many can testify, the little thing became more and more earnest and truthful, until it has taken on full dimensions, and we think it is now the most outspoken and fearless truth seeker (as its name implie) in all our country.

Friend Bennett, I can not flatter, nor will I, but we just want to say the road to truth is right straight ahead, and more than that we will say, you come as near traveling that road, in my opinion, as any public man on our continent. Some think Brick is close on your track, but then the clergy don't hate him half as bad as they do you, nor is he half so damaging to them. Then there is Robert, a great, good-looking, sarcastic, logical fellow. But he caters to politicel interests. Well, he is a big magnet, and I suppose he commands big pay.

Well, brother, many names could be mentioned in both sexes at this time that are doing much to break old dogmas and myths o the past. Thanks to science and natural law more than to God, the mists are clearing away and the light of truth is shining in upon our understanding. Why, friend Bennett, the people for the last decade hav learned more how to appreciate such a glorious man as was Thomas Paine than in all their lives before. The time is coming when he will rank second to none of his age—would hav done so from the first but for the wily, lying priests. But, thanks to knowledge and truth (which is power), they are fast losing their hold on the human growth. Thanks to the few that are coming out and trying to reclaim their dignity and manhood; it is much easier to be truthful than otherwise. We are told they are useful to happiness and human growth. We say, nay. Why, they always as a body hav opposed all and every new idea or improvement. It would be as novel for a priest to improve or patent any new or good thing as to put pockets in shrouds. Who ever heard of either. They know (that is, some of them) that true mental growth always dwarfs theology, but I pass them over to their own brother Chainey; he can do them greater justice than we, as he has been one of them.

Well, now, kind friend, we will say a few words that will interest far more. Inclosed find $2, which brings me up to date and a little more. Will close by wishing you success. M. B. DE LANO.

BARRE, MASS., Jan. 9, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: I hav been wanting to write you ever since your return from Europe, and say, with the many others, that your letters are excellent.

Your trip around the world will bring the river Jordan, the Read Sea, Mount Sinai, Jerusalem, etc., very near to us poor Infidels, and more facts than our Christian friends are willing to admit. Go ahead and shake old theology to its center with wide-awake truths, sound castigations, and scathing ridicule.

The new heading to THE TRUTH SEEKER is a decided improvement, besides giving more space on the first page to those charming items that interest all.

I hav been ill all this time, but hav ventured to engage myself to lecture for the Albany Liberal Club, January 23d, 25th, 28th, and 30th, on the subjects, "The Bible Not Reliable," "Are Christians Followers of Christ?" "When we Die Shall we Liv Again?" "Life and Services of Thomas Paine."

Don't you think those are good subjects? They were selected by the Committee.

Yours for the truth, ELLA E. GIBSON.

SALEM, IOWA, Dec. 23, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT: I send with this the names of three new subscribers and the renewal of my own subscription for 1881. Although not half the number I sent you when the paper was in its infancy, it is the best I can do under the circumstances. My health is very poor, and has been for four years.

Now, brothers and sisters, if any of you that are over seventy-one years of age can do better, I shall not envy you in the enjoyment of the happiness that is and always must be associated with rendering good to our fellow-beings.

We cannot all be great; but we can at least endeavor to be good. Great men are not always wise, neither do the aged understand judgment, hence the second split or bolt in our National Liberal League. Tell it not in New York, publish it not in the streets of Washington, lest the Christians rejoice—lest the daughters of the Young Men's Christian Association triumph, and say, See how these Liberals love one another! Fraternally yours, F. A. SHELDON.

MEDICINE LODGE, KANSAS, Dec. 30, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: The able and eloquent champion of Freethought, Prof. O. A. Phelps, has given us a call and delivered a course of free lectures in this city upon the following subjects: "Evolution," "The Bible at Variance with Science," "Special Providence an Absurdity," and "The Plan of Salvation a Failure."

It is needless for me to say that Mr. Phelps is an able and eloquent speaker, handling each individual subject with all the ease imaginable. Well is he worthy of the position he holds in the National Exectral Committee, and I sincerely hope that all his future years may be bright and prosperous, so that the cause of Liberalism may claim him as one of her good and noble workers.

In spite of Christian opposition and the extremely disagreeable weather (the Lord being willing), there was a pretty fair turning out of intelligent-looking men and women, who testified by their constant cheering and exclamations of pleasure that they appreciated the soundness of his logic and the strength of his argument.

If it would not be too badly out of place I would like to relate a little occurrence illustrativ of the ill feeling Christians bear toward Mr. Phelps. By chance, the third lecture and an exhibition to be given by my uncle's (Rev. A. H. Mulkey's) school were to be on the same night. The principal of the school sent Mr. Phelps a complimentary ticket for the entertainment, whereupon he gave way at the same time, knowing that he held the success of the exhibition in his power.

Now let us see the result of this generous-heartedness. Our friend presents his ticket at the door, but there is a Christian doorkeeper there, who says, "No, sir; your fifteen cents." He would not even look at the ticket.

The question, Why did he do this? The answer is, For pure Christian devilment and nothing else. Again the question, How do you know? Because he told me so.

But to my story. Our friend paid the admission fee, stayed until the close, was not asked to say a word, and went home without his fifteen cents, all to render the Rev. A. H. Mulkey a favor.

The next morning the principal hearing of this Christian act of his Christian doorkeeper, yielded to his humanity for once, and sent a strap of a boy up town without any letter of apology to giv "old Phelps" his fifteen cents.

I shall make no comments. I hav but stated the facts in the case. I must say, however, before leaving the subject, that it was a very rough joke. And though I am here in a Christian land, in a Christian boarding-house, and going to a Christian school, with a Christian uncle principal of that school, I say to the Christians' enemy, O. A. Phelps: Keep on in the good work in which you are now engaged. Strike those sledge-hammer blows in defense of liberty, love, and law, and the people will bless you for it in a hundred years to come. S. V. MULKEY.

WESTCHESTER, IND., Dec. 27, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: I was in Tennessee in October and part of November. I found a few Liberals there, but none who had ever investigated. I circulated a few TRUTH SEEKERS, leaflets, and tracts, and since my return home hav sent several TRUTH SEEKERS to parties there. After I read THE TRUTH SEEKER I always mail it to friends in different states. I inclose the names of some that call themselvs Liberals here. They talk Liberalism freely, but attend a church and pay in their dimes and quarters to the Sunday-school. hav tried hard to get some of them to take THE TRUTH SEEKER, but cannot. When I hear of them helping the Sunday-schools and churches it makes me mad. I don't like to hear them talk Liberalism unless they will support it. If they would let the churches go, and help get up a reading school for Sundays, the church here would go down, as it is about gone anyway. I hav kept lending THE TRUTH SEEKER to all of them, and they read my Liberal books, but I hav got sick of keeping them in reading matter, and hav about concluded to let them go to l.

Yours for humanity, A. BROWN.

EATON RAPIDS, MICH., Dec. 6, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: While attending the Hornellsville Convention I ubscribed for your paper for three months, and hav come to the conclusion that it is my duty to become a permanent subscriber. I hav taken the Boston Investigator nearly ten years, and as I pay nothing to build churches or support priestcraft, I think I can afford to take two Liberal papers. Inclosed find post-office order for $3.75—three to renew my subscription for one year, and 75 cents from a new subscriber for three months and Paine's "Age of Reason." Yours truly, A. ATWOOD.

Don't stop my paper short of my death, and then send it to the one who most comforted me and lulled me into pleasant and eternal rest. If I find it otherwise, I will pluck up my ears and put up my hands, and fight it out on the same line.

Ever for our cause, E. W. HATHAWAY.

EPHRAIM, UTAH, Dec. 11, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find inclosed money for the continuation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am indeed sorry that you hav to ask for your dues in the columns of your paper that is so richly worth the money it costs. The only fault I hav to find is that I can't keep it at home. There are a good many people here that like to read it, and I am willing they should just long enough to get a taste. Then I think if their taste is good they will soon want a paper of their own, as well as books treating on the glorious principles of Freethought. I frankly acknowledge to you that the books and papers of your publication hav made me happy and cheerful many fold more than the money I gave in exchange for them could hav done.

I hav been told there is a gentleman somewhere in space that pays a hundredfold for one. I am happy to say that I found him without going so high, as I do not like the church up there this time of the season. I would rather go to New York, and I hav assured people here that if they will only save three dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER they will be rewarded a hundredfold.

I am so much delighted with your letters from Europe that if you should take a notion to visit the place where the immaculate conception and birth took place you can count on me for $5.00 to commence on. Yours truly, R. CLAWSON.

WHO WILL "GO AND DO LIKEWISE?"

BERRIEN SPRINGS, MICH., Jan. 8, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: The way I get subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER: I go right out among the Brotherhood of Humanity and the Liberals generally, with a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER (Jan. 1st), in my pocket; read to them a few select paragraphs—on the principle that tasting a piece of cheese shows the quality of the whole—say to them, "Hand me a dollar, and I will order you a liberal supply of Liberal food for four months," and they hand over, as the $8.00 money order inclosed will show. This I find is the way to do it. Liberals, go and do likewise.

I belong in heart both to the Liberal League and the Secular Society. The first is sapping the foundation of a rotten fabric, and the latter will draw the legal fangs of the inmates. Yours ever,

WORTHY PUTNAM.

THE male eel is very rare. The female contains nine million eggs in its ovaries, which are nearly two feet long.

Belshazzar.

BY ALHAZA.

Come to my bosom, thou beautiful fiend,
For the terrible charm of thine eye is too sweet
For aught but a monarch its glances to meet.
No brow but mine own on thy bosom has leaned.
I'll try to speak smoothly; the grape brings no evil
To the haughtiest man who was born to be civil.

I'll drown all thy glory, thy hair I'll bedew
With the rich, purple tide of the cluster I press;
I ask in return but a sister's caress.
I'll stain thy fair arms with my love's gorgeous hue,
And the mist of thy robe and the down of thy breast;
Come, queen of the vintage, and watch by my rest.

Perhaps I am dreaming. How dreary and stark
Is the gloom of the lights, for they luridly burn!
All objects are trembling; how madly they turn!
'Mid exquisit statues I grope in the dark.
My people are starving! Hav any complained?
But you know that my coffers so often are drained.

Those golden, gemmed vases, I bought them for you.
O Baal, a Form brings a goblet to me!
I'll drink like a king, and to no one but thee.
Who art thou, white demon? The terrible hue
Of thy face has confused me with furious din.
To this grand, gloomy feast I would becken thee in.

My kingdom renounce! Wretched woman, away!
How useless this feast and this wild, noisy rout,
While the poor are all starving and weeping without!
But that rude, burning hand! No, I will not reply!
Will it tear from my brow every jewel to-day!
Oh, help me, great Baal! a king, I must die.

The Choicest Gem is Truth.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

That fabled pearl of greatest price
Is not the pearl for me;
'Tis but an ignis-fatuus
That cheats humanity.
The greatest gem there is is truth;
Though it be rough-hewn and uncouth
'Twill shine when paste is faded.
Oh that's the pearl for me.
Oh that's the pearl for me,
Oh that's the pearl for me.

The crown that Christians hope to grasp
Is not the crown for me;
For it is a delusion,
And, like a mist, will flee.
The brightest crown is human love,
That's wasted not on things above,
But twined around our brethren.
Oh that's the crown for me.
Oh that's the crown for me,
Oh that's the crown for me.

Man has slain man for love of God,
For him dealt cruelly.
This monstrous love to God above
Is not the love for me.
But there's a love that makes us free.
Which loveth poor humanity,
Givs joy instead of sorrow.
Oh that's the love for me.
Oh that's the love for me,
Oh that's the love for me.

The joys that Christians covet
Are not the joys for me;
They're but imaginary
And may not ever be.
I'll be content with present good
That is not bought with Jesus' blood;
Pure love and truth and friendship,
Oh they're the joys for me.
Oh they're the joys for me
Oh they're the joys for me.

I would not bear the cross of Christ,
I rather would be free,
Nor bound in superstition's chains
In mental slavery.
I want no cross on Calvary,
A use for it I cannot see;
Much woe to man it bringeth,
'Tis not the cross for me.
'Tis not the cross for me.
'Tis not the cross for me.

That dark old road that some pursue
Too narrow is for me,
Where use of reason is forbid,
Where by blind faith we see.
But wisdom shows a broader way,
Where knowledge shines as bright as day,
Where truth and science travel,
Oh that's the road for me.
Oh that's the road for me,
Oh that's the road for me.

That heavenly rest that's sought by saints
I do not want to see,
For it would be to those who love
A hell of misery.
No loving heart at rest could dwell
And know their loved ones were in hell,
The grave would be more welcome,
A sweeter rest for me.
A sweeter rest for me,
A sweeter rest for me.

First Love.

BY CHARLES BRADLEY.

——That all
Which Eve hath left her daughters since her fall.
—Byron.

When Adam and Eve, in Paradise,
Had little else to do
Than just to multiply their joys,
To chat and bill and coo,

Adam his beaming eyeballs turned
Full on her glorious beauty,
And at her feet in rapture knelt,
And whispered, "Love and duty."

The whisper woke love's proper blush,
The blush dawned in her eye,
E'en as Aurora's purple gush
Bathes the pale morning sky.

He kissed her lips, he kissed her brow,
He kissed her sunny hair;
From every leaf and wooing bough
Love's echoes filled the air.

The mighty hills stood up to gaze,
The pausing sun the stars restrained;
The conscious heaven veiled its face,
While in the bower love's silence reigned.

CONSULT

Your Case Is Curable! You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidncy disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, N. J.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

Purchasers of PLAIN HOME TALK are at liberty to CONSULT ITS AUTHOR, in person or by mail, FREE. Price of the new Popular Edition, by mail, postage prepaid, only $1.50. Contents table free. AGENTS WANTED. MURRAY HILL PUBLISHING COMPANY, 129 East 28th st., New York.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

"The Gods and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," "Heretics and Heresies." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

"The Ghosts and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Ghosts," "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," "Declaration of Independence," "Farming in Illinois," "Speech at Cincinnati," "The Past Rises Before Me Like a Dream." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

Both volumes bound in one, price, paper, $1.00.

"What Must We Do to be Saved?"

"Interpolations are the foundation stones of every orthodox church." Thoroughly revised and corrected by the author. Price, 25 cents.

Special Notice from Bliss' Chief's Band.

Me, Red Cloud, speak for Blackfoot, the great Medicin Chief from happy hunting grounds. He say he love white chiefs and squaws. He travel like the wind. He go to circles. Him big chief. Blackfoot want much work to do. Him want to show him healing power. Make sick people well. Where paper go, Blackfoot go. Go quick. Send right away. No wampum for three moon.

This spirit message was first published in "Mind and Matter," January 10, M. S. 32, with the announcement that magnetized paper would be sent to all who were sick in body or mind that desired to be healed, also to those that desired to be developed as spirit mediums, for three months for three three-cent stamps. The three months closed with the following result: 3,405 persons hav sent for the paper by mail, one thousand persons hav received it at the office; and the hundreds of testimonials that hav been received of its wonderful work in healing the sick and developing mediums prove that Red Cloud and Blackfoot hav faithfully kept promises. From January 10th, M. S. 32, to January 10th, M. S. 33, over 15,000 persons hav sent for this paper, and thousands hav been benefited by its use. That all may hav an opportunity to test the merits of the paper, the price for the future will be as follows: one sheet, postage paid, ten cents; twelve sheets, one dollar. Send a silver ten cent piece if you can. Address James A. Bliss, 713 Sansom street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Gems of Thought.

THE highest visible power on earth is man.
The highest visible power in the spirit world is the spirit of man.—Anon.

OH, fear not, in a world like this,
And thou shalt know ere long,
Know how sublime a thing it is
To suffer and be strong. —Longfellow.

AS for religions, it may be said that to the believer they are all equally true; to the statesman, all equally necessary; to the philosopher, all equally false.—Gibbon.

WHAT is hallowed ground? 'Tis what givs birth
To sacred thoughts in souls of worth.
Peace! independence! truth! go forth
Earth's compass round,
And your high priesthood shall make earth
All hallowed ground. —Campbell.

CONSIDER that thou also doeth many things wrong, and that thou art a man like others; and even if thou dost abstain from certain faults, still thou hast the disposition to commit them, though either through cowardice or concern about reputation, or some such mean motiv, thou dost abstain from such faults.—Antoninus.

THE Deity I serve is that of Plato and Pythagoras as well as of Jesus. To make him propitious, it is not enough to be charitable and humble. We must be great. We must cultivate the lofty faculties of the mind as well as the sweet instincts of the heart, in order to be in communion with this infinit power, this perfection itself, which preserves all things in kindness, but which reigns in justice. After thy example, O Perfection without bounds, man should make himself just; and there is no justice without knowledge.—George Sand.

To me, indeed, it appears that even those studies which are more common and in greater esteem are not without some divine energy. So that I do not consider that a poet can produce a serious and sublime poem without some divine impulse working in his mind. Nor do I think that eloquence abounding with sonorous words and fruitful sentences, can flow thus without something beyond mere human power. But as to philosophy, that is the parent of all the arts, what can we call that but, as Plato says, a gift, or, as I express it, an invention of the gods.—Cicero.

THE progress of mankind does not stop with any one generation of workers, however faithful they hav been. The advanced guard of workers, the explorers and discoverers, the fellers of forests and the climbers of mountains, those that lay the ax at the root of old superstitions and deal the first heavy blows at errors and wrongs, making the air ring with the sound of their battle-axes, and thus, perhaps, first awakening their neighbors to the fact of there being such errors and wrongs—these pioneers will be needed as long as humanity has before it any progress in truth and right still to be achieved.—W. J. Potter.

THE doctrin of the eternal burning of the wicked and the companion doctrin that the wicked were the great majority of mankind, the thronging multitudes upon the broad road leading to destruction, hav held their place too long in Christian belief to be brushed aside by a word. The ages when those doctrins were unquestioned were the ages when the Bible was believed in without reserve or qualification. The age when these doctrins are becoming a burden intolerable to be borne is one in which the question of the inspiration of the Bible givs rise to innumerable difficulties in the minds of all intelligent men who still incline to hold the doctrin in a general way.—M.D. Le Seuer.

WE might almost doubt whether the terrible doom of such millions is a divine judgment, or a proof that there is no God who cares for mortals. But we are able to liv under this cloud, and feel such fresh strength as neither the heathens nor the Christians before us could possess. It is the greatest happiness of man, and the most indestructible, to hav to look with trust on what is going on and with hope on what is to be. Amid all that is weak and perishable grows an endless fulness of new strength. The roots of our national life are sound—devotion to the family, reverence for justice and morality, diligent labor, mighty activity everywhere. That is our joy and honor in these modern times.—Freytag.

"IF heaven is our home," asked Calvin, 'what is the earth but a place of exile? Only because God has placed us in this world, and appointed us our functions therein, must it also be an endeavor to fulfil the same; it is solely the divine commandment that imparts a true value to our earthly vocations, which are in themselvs devoid of such." This is clearly a miserable compromise. If our earthly occupations are valueless in themselvs, this value cannot be imparted to them from without; but if they do possess such value, it can consist in nothing but the moral relations which are implied by them. Man's earthly existence bears its own law, its rule of guidance, its ends and aims included in itself.—Strauss.

IF Christ is not God, the man who denies him to be God is certainly prima facie [presumably and at the first look of the matter] right, though it may perhaps be possible to show that such a denial cannot be made in practice without attacking a belief in morality. We may, or it is possible to assert that we may, be under this miserable necessity, that we cannot speak undiluted truth. Truth and falsehood are, it is perhaps maintainable, so intricately blended in the world that discrimination is impossible. Still the man who argues thus is bound to assign some grounds for his melancholy skepticism, and to show further that the destruction of the figment is too dearly bought by the assertion of this truth. Therefore I might be content to say that in such cases the innocence of the plain speaker ought to be assumed until his guilt is demonstrated. If we had always waited to clear away shame till we were certain that our action would produce absolutely unmixed benefit, we should all be worshipers of Mumbo Jumbo.—Leslie Stephen.

Odds and Ends.

A CHILD died recently on Leroy street of eating matches. If walking matches only proved as serious in their effects, what a blessing it would be to a long suffering community!

"IF you are a quiet, honest citizen, how did these skeleton keys and brass knuckles happen to be in your coat-tail pockets?" "I reckon, judge, me and the policeman must hav changed coats in the scuffle. We were very much excited."

"BIDDY," said a lady to her servant, "I wish you would step over and see how old Mrs. Jones is this morning." In a few minutes Biddy returned with the information that Mrs. Jones was seventy-two years, seven months, and twenty-eight days old."

"YES," said the steward of the steamer, "I admit that the salt beef was bad, the potatoes rotten, the bread sour, and the tea poor, but the rest of the provisions were good." "What were the rest of the provisions?" "Oh, salt, pepper, and mustard."

A WICKED New Yorker perpetrates the following: "Boston recently celebrated its two hundred and fiftieth anniversary, and it is said that some of the hotels served up for the occasion spring chickens born on the identical day the city was founded."

AN Irishman, on being asked why there was no record or trace of any of his race being found in Noah's Ark, replied that all his countrymen at that time were very rich and had boats of their own. "And besides," he added, "they would not sail with beasts, anyhow, as Noah did."

"MY wife," remarked a prominent manufacturer, "never attends auctions. She went once, just before we were married, and seeing a friend on the opposit side, nodded politely, whereupon the auctioneer knocked down a patent cradle and asked her where she wished it delivered."

THE editor of a newspaper that has adopted phonetic spelling, in a measure, received a postal card from an old subscriber in the country, which read as follows; "I hev tuk your paper for leven yeres; but if you kant spel eny better than you hav ben doin fur the las to munths, you may jes stop it."

AN Illinois editor having engaged a new reporter, received the following as his first effort: "We are informed that the gentleman who stood on his feet under a pile-driver for the purpose of having a tite pair of butes druv on, shortly afterward found himself in Chiny, perfectly naked, and without a cent in his pocket."

A WESTERN minister told the trustees of his church that he must hav his money, as his family was suffering. "Money!" said one of the trustees; "you preach for money! I thought you preached for the good of souls!" The minister replied, "I can't eat souls, and if I could, it would take a thousand such as yours to make a meal."

WHEN the old sailor came home from a whaling voyage he saw at once what ailed the preaching: "The minister's smart enough, and he says a great many good things, but the sermon don't hav any harpoon in it." The farmer meant the same thing when he said of the clergyman, "He's a good man, but he will rake with the teeth up."

THE Fitchburg Sentinel remarks: "A young lady in this city, taking the advantage of leap year, decided to stick up for her rights and make a proposal, which she did by proposing to the young man who had been keeping her up nights that he clear out and giv some one else a chance. There is now a 'vacant chair' in that residence."

IN a cemetery near old Fort Hamilton, in the town of Winslow, Maine, is an ancient block gravestone, with this inscription: "Here lies the body of Richard Thomas, an inglishman by birth, a whig of '76, a cooper by trade, now food for worms. Like an old Rum puncheon whose staves are all marked, numbered, and put together again by his Maker."

A COW that wore a bell having been run over and killed on a railroad, the owner brought suit against the railroad company for damages. It was proved that the engineer rang the bell and tried to frighten the cow off the track. But the farmer's lawyer also proved that the cow rang her bell and tried to frighten the engin off the track, and so the jury decided in his favor.

A GOOD story is told of General Butler's sarcastic retort upon a Massachusetts judge whom he was teasing for a ruling favorable to a cause he was defending in court. The judge got out of patience at last, and somewhat testily exclaimed, "Mr. Butler, what do you think I sit here for?" The general quietly shrugged his shoulder and replied, "The court has got me now."

COUNSEL for a burglar at Galveston asked for an adjournment pending the arrival of material witnesses. "What do you expect to prove?" asked the court.

"That my client is quiet, sober, and hardworking."

"By whom do you expect to prove this?"

"By the officers of the penitentiary, where he spent five years."

WE hav endured with commendable patience the appalling phantom, the young man who wears two watches; with Christian resignation and patience we hav borne with the young man who wears his watch in the outside pocket of his coat, but when we meet the elegant youth who wears his silk embroidered socks outside his slippers to show the monogram on the toes, there is going to be bloodshed, and don't you forget it.—Hawkeye.

A GENTLEMAN called upon a rich friend for some charity.

"Yes, I must giv you my mite."

"Do you mean the widow's mite?"

"Certainly."

"I should be satisfied with half as much as she gave. How much are you worth?"

"Seventy thousand dollars."

"Giv me, then, your check for thirty-five thousand. That will be half as much as the widow gave, for she, you know, gave her all."

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 8. No. 5. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. | New York, Saturday, January 29, 1881. | SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. | $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

A WRITER in Lippincott's Magazine says that of the 15,000 words employed by Shakspere about 6,000 appear but once.

SOME uneasy souls in the Presbyterian church of England want a liturgy. A recent discussion of the question in the Birmingham Presbytery disclosed the fact that there was no general desire manifested for such an aid to worship.

CAMP-MEETING John Allen, the chaplain of the Maine House of Representativs, prayed that God would make the new Governor "as wise as a serpent and as harmless as a dove." The Governor thinks there was sarcasm in that prayer.

THE editor of a Western religious paper thinks better of his waste basket than ever he did before, for on New Year's day somebody put a chicken and a rabbit into that receptacle, which is generally consecrated to the reception of poetry.

HOMEOPATHY has received a severe blow in Spain. The cure of Scudoni has declared from the pulpit that any sick person belonging to his parish who has tried to cure himself by homeopathy will, in the event of death, be refused the rites of the church.

A BETROTHED couple at Fairfield, Iowa, had a quarrel and broke their engagement. Both attempted suicide the same night, but their lives were spared. On the following day, convinced that they did not desire to liv apart, they had a minister unite them.

GOV. LONG, of Massachusetts, disapproves of capital punishment, but he despairs of inducing the Legislature to abolish it, and will endeavor only to substitute some easier means of death for hanging. He thinks that morphine might be used, and will officially recommend its use in place of the noose.

THE Baptist clergymen in this city hav been discussing "What the Bible says of the future state of the wicked," and hav concluded that the wicked will inevitably go to hell. Also the righteous, which experts can scarcely detect from any superior conduct exhibited, are to shine in great and eternal glory.

A PREACHER in Rook county, Kansas, had been for weeks conducting a wonderfully successful revival. "Dear brethren and sisters," he said one day, "this is the last meeting that I shall hold It is impossible to keep up a fervor on corn bread and molasses for myself and an ear of corn a day for my horse. God bless you."

MR. HENRY GEORGE has reason to feel a just pride at the attention his great work, "Progress and Poverty," is attracting in Europe as well as in America. Already four editions hav been published by the Appletons. The work is now being got out in London, Paris, and St. Petersburg, and a beautiful edition of 10,000 copies has already appeared in Berlin.

THE Rev. Dr. Van Dyke, of Brooklyn, publicly accuses his Presbyterian brother, the Rev. Dr. Spear, of having avowed in the hearing of his fellow-presbyters a purpose to push him to the wall and to assassinate his reputation. Mr. Van Dyke further says that, so far as the Talmage affair is concerned, he has a conscience devoid of offense toward God and man.

THE Rev. Emory J. Haynes, of Brooklyn, started out in life as a Methodist preacher, but became convinced that the itinerancy didn't agree with him, re-examined the question of the proper mode of administering baptism, was immersed, and scon after accepted a call to the pastorate of a Baptist church at a salary of $5,000 a year. Now it is reported that a minority of his parishioners, old-fashioned Baptists, are dissatisfied with his preaching, which they find lacking in spiritual nutriment, want him to pull up stakes again, and hav even sent him a communication to that effect. Many and peculiar are the experiences of the sensational Brooklyn preacher. So far as yet appears, however, the Rev. Mr. Haynes has the whip-hand of the malcontent hard-shell brethren.

THE Rev. George H. Vandeusen, a member of the Troy Conference, stationed at West Amsterdam, Montgomery county, N. Y., was put on trial in the United States Court on a charge of forgery. It is claimed that the defendant in 1879 forged the signatures of five different persons to as many affidavits for the purpose of obtaining a pension for himself as a member of the Second New York Cavalry.

EXPERIMENTS by Prof. Cohn, of Breslau, with the electric light show that letters, spots, and colors are seen at a much greater distance through the medium of electric light than by day or gaslight. The sensation of yellow was increased sixtyfold as compared with daylight, of red sixfold, and blue twofold, showing that the electric light would be very useful where it is necessary to observe signals at a great disance.

AN Ohio paper proposes to number the hours of a day and night consecutivly from 1 to 24, or from midnight to midnight, thus doing away with A. M. and P. M. in railway time tables and elsewhere. The advocate of the proposed new method says that there is no more reason for having two 12 o'clocks in one day than there is for two twelve-mile posts on a twenty-four mile railroad. That is the way they still sometimes reckon time in Italy.

THE Rev. Father O'Reilly, of Carondelet, Mo., had some repairs made in his church by a German carpenter. The job was completed late on Saturday night, and on Sunday morning the workman went to take away his tools. The priest forbad him to remove them, but he paid no heed to the order, and was presently knocked down by the clergyman. A lively fight ensued, and the result was a victory for the mechanic. "Hold on," Father O'Reilly cried; "don't you know you're striking a vicar of Christ?" "All right," was the response; "I'm the devil, and I've got you now."

FRANK OSBORNE disturbed the meeting in Orange county, Ind., when Rev. Potts was preaching. Potts had been annoyed in the same manner several times before by the same crowd. Having armed himself with a club, he at length ceased preaching, took the club, and, marching to the seat occupied by the disturbers, mauled Osborne over the head till he was badly beaten, when the crowd rescued him. The preacher was arrested and heavily fined, when he left the neighborhood. It is questionable whether so zealous a soldier of Christ should be treated in that sort of way.

THERE are many persons in the West who believe in the curativ powers of the mad-stone. A man who was bittten by a mad pig near Tecumseh, Neb., traveled all the way to Savannah, Mo., to try the famous mad-stone owned by old Uncle John Nelson. The stone immediately adhered to the wound, which is said to be proof positiv that the patient's blood was poisoned, and remained clinging to the sore from early morning until sundown, when it dropped off. The patient departed feeling that he had been cured. Uncle John Nelson has owned his mad-stone since 1848, and has used it in over a hundred cases where men hav been bitten. He avers that it never failed to work a cure.

HERE and there a preacher of position and influence is beginning to wake up to the significance of the statistics showing the astonishing breakdown of the churches considered as agencies for the conversion of sinners. Thus the Rev. Dr. Cuyler, of Brooklyn, in last week's Independent, says the official statement that 5,400 American Presbyterian congregations hav only 4,200 new communicants to show for last year's work—less than one apiece—is "absolutely appalling." He avows the opinion that, if the bottom facts could be got at, it would be found that the Methodists, Baptists, Dutch and German Reformed, and Congregational churches were no more successful. If new churches are springing up in the West, old ones are dying out in the East. "The falling off in church attendance over the land is undeniable," he says. "All attempts to conceal or falsify such facts are both cowardly and criminal. The first thing for our churches to do is to face them."

WITH more than half the world the name Jew is a synonym for meanness. How many Christian landlords would do well to imitate the example of the Jew Sir Nathaniel Rothschild, who regularly turns back half the rents his agricultural tenants pay him to them, though they are by no means excessiv enough to be oppressiv! There would be many eminent names unknown to the synagog more honored if the suggestion this one of many Jews sets were followed. There would, perhaps, be no Land League in Ireland, if the owners of the soil were not such good Christians that the misery of the people they beggar for their own luxury can, in their eyes, prove no bar between them and heaven.—Truth.

THE Rev. C. C. Goss, in his last Sunday evening lecture on "Husbands and Wives," gave the following recipe for obtaining happiness within the family circle. Things far less truthful than this hav been enunciated from the pulpit. Said he: "I will show husbands and wives how to brighten the sky of domestic life. They should adapt themselvs to each other's tastes, habits, temperaments, likes, and dislikes. Neither should formally command the other to do anything, and neither should be glum and obstinate. Of all kinds of silence glum silence is the worst. What should you do, then? Why, harmonize your views. For instance, take a wife who runs after every new fashion, and finally gets on an unbecoming dress. Suppose the husband snaps out, 'Take that dress off; take it off, I tell you!' don't you think that that woman, like the Dutch justice of the peace, is swearing all over inside? But, on the other hand, suppose the husband says, 'Just step in front of the mirror, dear, and see how you look,' and he pulls it up here and there, and shows how it misbecomes her. Then she goes and takes that dress off. I tell you we can't and won't be driven any more than any other animals. I notice that husbands and wives ought to be careful in the use of their English. One of my classmates got to be a doctor of divinity; that don't amount to anything, as it is not hard for any fool to become one if he has money and influence; and this D.D. had a wife who said me for I and is for are, and her husband and she had a fuss every little while about it. The fault was hers, for she could hav stopped her blundering habit, while it was impossible for her husband's fine ear to get used to her bad use of language. The principle can be applied to all other things. Married people ought to be careful to avoid giving offense to each other's taste. Another thing: Take that well-developed young couple standing at the hymeneal altar. One develops into a solid, plump rotundity, while the other becomes lean and lank and haggard, like Pharaoh's lean kine. Each is disappointed in the way things hav turned out. But didn't they promis to take each other for better or for worse? If the husband should develop into a leviathan, the wife ought to be satisfied. People's habits change after marriage. I knew a man who became a drummer for a dry-goods house, and stayed away from home nights, while his wife got to grumbling at his absence. Finally there was a row. Who was to blame? The man was, because he should hav remained at home, business or no business, long enough to keep his wife's heart warm. I wish to God, I was going to say, that people could get out of their heads the notion that at the first little marital row that springs up after marriage they must get up and separate.

Report of a Debate

BETWEEN THE REV. A. HATCHARD AND MRS. ANNIE BESANT, AT THE HALL OF SCIENCE, LONDON.

FIRST NIGHT.—CONTINUED.

MR. HATCHARD.

I shall not for one moment contend with Mrs. Besant in her eloquence, for to-night I stand here to bear witness for the truth, and on this platform of all places in London. I stand here to vindicate the indisputable, historical, and most important facts that the world knows of. I simply tell you that, besides the heathen testimony which I hav only briefly alluded to to-night, there is a great deal of Jewish testimony which I hav not time to go into. Mrs. Besant has referred to the book entitled "Supernatural Religion." Here it is; and I tell you that that book has been dissected as an anatomist would dissect a body. Get Westcott on the "Canon of the New Testament," 4th edition, and read his preface, and see what he says. I ask, is not the author of "Supernatural Religion" shown to be untrustworthy? Mr. Cowper told me to be sure and mention here to-night that Mr. Nicholson, of the London Institution, had examined his quotations and found them to be inaccurate. We hav heard a good deal from Mrs. Besant in her last speech about Chrishna and such like, but she has made her remarks to the wrong opponent. I spent years in investigating the Indian religion, and next week I will endeavor to go at length into what Christianity has done in India, and I will introduce to your notice Chrishna—that is, Vishnu. Why, there is no dispute whatever. (Cries of "order," and "question.") I say that the whole story that Mrs. Besant has brought before you is not worth a single mention. I say distinctly about it, that you can't prove that the story of Chrishna was in existence in India at an early period. It was probably known about the sixth century. You shall hear something about Vishnu next week. You shall see him. Chrishna is identified with Vishnu, and if I were not in a public hall I would tell you some nice tales about Chrishna. In the old Jewish traditions there are so many facts of the gospels corroborated, and there is one fact which is related in the Talmud, which I will mention to you. It is there stated that about forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem the power of life and death was taken away from the Jews, and so it happened that Pilate was the person who had to put Jesus of Nazareth to death. I know all about the cross in heathen countries. I know it all. Produce me—you can't produce me—the crucified saviors besides Jesus of Nazareth. If I had followed the bent of my own inclination I should hav brought with me and quoted a whole host of German authorities, but when I went to Stonecutter street the other day, and there saw Mr. Ramsey, I found that Mr. Ramsey didn't seem to think much of German authorities.* He turned up his nose at them. Well, I thought, you are a fair specimen of the men I shall hav to meet, and I won't quote them. I could hav quoted you from a large number of German authorities, for they hav been my prophets for many years past. But I bring before you a book, by Grotius, on the "Truth of Christian Religion." I hav never seen the book answered. "Sec. II. The proof that there was such a person as Jesus.—That Jesus of Nazareth formerly lived in Judea, in the reign of Tiberius the Roman emperor, is constantly acknowledged, not only by Christians dispersed all over the world, but also by all the Jews which now are, or hav ever wrote since that time; the same is also testified by heathens, that is, such as did not write either of the Jewish or of the Christian religion, Suetonius, Tacitus, Pliny the younger, and many after these. That he died an ignominious death.—That the same Jesus was crucified by Pontius Pilate, the president of Judea, is acknowledged by all the same Christians, notwithstanding it might seem dishonorable to them who worship such a Lord. It is also acknowledged by the Jews, though they are not ignorant how much they lie under the displeasure of the Christians, under whose government they everywhere liv, upon this account, because their ancestors were the cause of Pilate's doing it. Likewise, the heathen writers we mentioned hav recorded the same to posterity; and, a long time after, the acts of Pilate were extant, to which the Christians sometimes appealed. Neither did Julian, or other opposers of Christianity, ever call it in question. So that no history can be imagined more certain than this; which is confirmed by the testimonies, I don't say of so many men, but of so many people, which differed from each other. Notwithstanding which we find him worshiped as Lord throughout the most distant countries of the world.

"Sec. III. And yet, after his death, was worshiped by wise men.—And that not only in our age, or those immediately foregoing, but also even in the first, the age next to that in which it was done, in the reign of the Emperor Nero; at which time the fore-mentioned Tacitus and others attest that very many were punished because they professed the worship of Christ." I say, I put this problem to Mrs. Besant, and I should like her to write some articles upon it, which I promis to read. If Jesus of Nazareth never rose from the dead, how comes the belief, not only of the Apostle Paul, but of the early Christians, that such was the fact?

You come down, I say, upon the fact, or believed fact, that it was Jesus and the resurrection that these early preachers of the gospels believed in, that it was believed that it was decided by abundant witnesses. How came the extraordinary change in the Apostle Peter if the resurrection never took place? Peter before and Peter after the resurrection are as opposit as light and darkness. The trembling coward who forsook his master and denied him, the man who afterward wept bitterly, was the man who stood boldly before the Jewish Sanhedrim, who told them the bitter truth right home as I hav told you here to-night; told them that it was this very Jesus who had been raised from the dead. Peter went forth into the world a bold, brave man to do his duty. Then there was St. John and Paul; but Paul was deceived, you will say. How came it that all the early disciples of Jesus Christ were deceived? How came this doctrin preached in Jerusalem immediately after the crucifixion if it was myth and fable? I simply tell Mrs. Besant that I know as much about the sun-god as she can tell me; I simply stop here to say whatever truth there may be in these myths and fables of the sun-god that immediately after the crucifixion of Jesus of Nazareth, the story of his resurrection was proclaimed in Jerusalem. (Cries of "Proof.") Yes, amongst Freethinkers and skeptics. There is an abundant amount of testimony of every imaginary kind that it was Jesus and the resurrection which was the belief of the early Christians. All through the Acts of the Apostles, all through the Epistles of St. Paul, all through the early Christian writers in the early centuries, it was the belief in this. It was preached at the city and at the time by the men in the place; and I take it such men as St. Paul, Peter, James, John, and others, were far better judges than we are here to-night whether the resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth, in whom I firmly believe, took place or not.

*It is due to Mr. Ramsey to say that he entirely denies this assertion of Mr. Hatchard.

SECOND NIGHT.

"That the influence of Christianity upon the world has been injurious."

MR. BRADLAUGH in the chair.

The chairman in opening the proceeding said: "My duty as chairman is not likely to involve any sort of need for any work on my part provided you of the audience understand two things. First, that you hav no right during the time either of the disputants is speaking to challenge any remark that either of them may make. Any cry of "Question," any cry of disapprobation, is entirely out of place. Those of you who are in favor of either of the speakers may applaud if you please; but you must remember even then that sometimes you waste their time in doing that. To call "Question," or to make any other remark, is entirely out of place, and only does an injury to the debate. I do not know that I need trouble you with anything else except to mention that the rule of the debate is that the opener shall hav 30 minutes; Mr. Hatchard 30 minutes in reply; and then five speeches of 15 minutes alternately, the opener concluding as on the last occasion. The subject for debate for this evening is the proposition, to be affirmed by Mrs. Besant, "That the influence of Christianity on the world has been injurious." I now call upon Mrs. Besant to open the debate.

MRS. BESANT.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Hatchard, and Friends: The affirmation that I make to-night is, "That the influence of Christianity upon the world has been injurious." I propose, in my first speeches, to giv you a mass of facts on which I rely for proof of this affirmation, and, even at the risk of wearying you, to giv you a condensed statement of historical occurrences which serve as foundation for the position I take to-night. In my last speech I will sum these up, but in the earlier ones I shall merely pile up my facts which you can verify for yourselvs. In order to lend clearness and vigor to the affirmation, and to render it, if false, more easy to refute, I propose not to make a general and discursiv attack, but to endeavor to prove five special propositions. I allege of Christianity: 1. That it has discouraged learning; 2. That it has supported tyranny, and has been the enemy of liberty; 3. That it has used persecution more largely than any other creed; 4. That it has upheld and aggravated slavery; 5. That it has not ensured purity of morals. If I can prove these propositions, it will be fair for me to say "that the influence of Christianity on the world has been injurious." I allege, further, that the whole of this mischief has its root in the Christian theory, and that each of the faults alleged in the propositions may be defended by Holy Writ. That, therefore, these faults are not excrescences on Christianity, due to the wickedness of man, but are portions of the creed itself, and that modern Christianity in partly escaping from them has become less Christian while becoming more civilized. I propose to show the root of each of these faults in Christian theory, and then to demonstrate its development in Christian practice. 1. That Christianity has discouraged learning. Throughout the Bible knowledge is an accursed thing. For eating of the tree of knowledge man was expelled from Paradise. Solomon, said to be the wisest of men, givs his judgment as follows: "Lo, I am come to great estate, and hav gotten more wisdom than all they that were before me in Jerusalem; yea, my heart had great experience of wisdom and knowledge. And I gave my heart to know wisdom, and to know madness and folly: I perceived that this also is vexation of spirit. For in much wisdom is much grief; and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow" (Eccles. i, 16–18). Isaiah prophesied against Babylon, "Thy wisdom and thy knowledge it hath perverted thee" (Isa. xlvii, 10). Jesus proclaimed, "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent and hast revealed them unto babes" (Matt. xi, 25). Paul wrote, "For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called: but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise" (1 Cor. i, 26, 27). Again: "Let no man deceive himself. If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool that he may be wise" (ibid ii, 18). Again, "Knowledge puffeth us, but charity edifieth" (ibid. viii, 1). There are many more of the same type which time forbids me to quote. This beatitude of nescience was very acceptable to the classes among which Christianity first spread, and the natural result of canonizing ignorance and anathematizing knowledge was very soon seen.

Mosheim tells us of even the great lights of the second century, that "they are worthy of little admiration on account of the accuracy or depth of their reasonings. The most of them appear to hav been destitute of penetration, learning, order, application, and force" (Ecclesiastical History, ed. 1847, p. 53). As the centuries went on the darkness grew deeper and deeper. Hallam tells us that schools were "confined to cathedrals and monasteries," and were "exclusivly designed for the purposes of religion;" that Charlemagne and Alfred were the greatest scholars of their time, but that Charlemagne could not read, and Alfred had but an imperfect knowledge of Latin. Of the "prevailing ignorance," he says, "it is easy to produce abundant testimony. Contracts were made verbally, for want of notaries capable of drawing up charters; and these, when written, were frequently barbarous and ungrammatical to an incredible degree. For some considerable intervals scarcely any monument of literature has been preserved, except a few jejune chronicles, the vilest legends of saints, or verses equally destitute of spirit and meter. In almost every council the ignorance of the clergy forms a subject for reproach. It is asserted by one held in 992 that scarcely a single person was to be found in Rome itself who knew the first element of letters. Not one priest of a thousand in Spain, about the age of Charlemagne, could address a common letter of salutation to another. In England Alfred declares that he could not recollect a single priest south of the Thames (the most civilized part of England) at the time of his accession who understood the ordinary prayers, or could translate Latin into his mother-tongue. Nor was this better in the time of Dunstan, when it is said none of the clergy knew how to write or translate a Latin letter. The homilies which they preached were compiled for their use by some bishops from former works of the same kind or the writings of the Christian Fathers" (Europe During the Middle Ages, ed. 1869, pp. 595, 596).

In the tenth century a little light struggled to penetrate from Moorish Spain into Christendom, but for a long time with small success, for wherever a mind struggled to think, Christianity promptly shut it up; in Spain itself 119 men were imprisoned by the Inquisition, not for heresy but for science: Roger Bacon, a monk of the thirteenth century, bears witness to the prevailing ignorance, "Without mathematical instruments no science can be mastered," he complains sadly, "and these instruments are not to be found among the Latins, and could not be made for two or three hundred pounds. . . . The admirable books of Cicero de Republica are not to be found anywhere so far as I can hear, though I hav made anxious inquiry for them in different parts of the world and by various messengers. I could never find the works of Seneca, though I made diligent search for them during twenty years and more. And so it is with many more most useful books connected with the science of morals" (Green's Short History of the English People, ed. 1878, pp. 133, 134). His own studies were rewarded with bread and water and a dungeon, and pen and paper were taken from him. He died in the prison of his monastery. In the same spirit Torquemada burned six thousand priceless Oriental books. Not a single great discovery lightens Christendom from the time whereat Christianity destroyed pagan science until the stir of mental life brought about by heresy. Calvin, among reformers, hated knowledge as Torquemada among Romanists. Calvinists hunted Bruno from Geneva if Catholics burned him at Rome. Later, Buckle givs a long list of learned men imprisoned merely for their science. (See "History of Civilization," vol. ii, pp. 230–242, ed. 1869.)

To-day all the chief leaders of thought are outside the pale of the churches. Mill, Darwin, Spencer, Bain, Huxley, Tyndall, Clifford—these, the molders of this century's thought, are alien to the Christian creed, and hated by the Christian churches. I affirm, therefore, that "Christianity has discouraged learning." 2. That Christianity has supported tyranny and has been the enemy of liberty. Passiv submission has ever been the political doctrin of the church. Paul commanded: "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever, therefore, resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God, and they that resist shall receive to themselvs damnation" (Romans xii, 1, 2). Peter, in the same spirit, taught: "Submit yourself to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake; whether it be to the king as supreme, or unto governors. . . . Honor the king" (1 Peter ii, 13, 14, 17). Kings hav granted huge wealth to priests, and priests, in return, hav taught absolute submission to kings. Mosheim thinks that Constantine turned Christian because he saw "the admirable tendency of the Christian doctrin and precepts to promote the stability of government by preserving the citizens in their obedience to the reigning powers" (ibid, p 87). According to the same historian, Charlemagne converted the Saxons to Christianity for the same reason, hoping that the gospel would "induce them to submit more tamely to the government of the Franks" (ibid, p. 170). It is noticeable that dissent, which is always a step toward Freethought, is, in civil struggles, on the side of freedom, while the orthodox creed is always on the side of passiv obedience. Thus Cromwell, the independent, Milton, the Socinian, and Martin, the Atheist, fought side by side for liberty against Charles and his bishops. In the same spirit, during the struggle under James II., the church taught the duty of passiv obedience and preached that resistance to the king was a sin against God. I affirm, therefore, "that Christianity has supported tyranny." 3. That it has used persecution more largely than any other creed. The duty of persecution is taught both in the Old and New Testaments. The passages in Deuteronomy are well known. It is commanded touching the heretic: "Thou shalt not consent unto him, nor hearken unto him; neither shall thine eye pity him, neither shalt thou spare, neither shalt thou conceal him; but thou shalt surely kill him; thine hand shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterward the hand of all the people" (Deut. xiii, 8, 9). Touching a city of heretics: "Thou shalt surely smite the inhabitants of that city with the edge of the sword, destroying it utterly, and all that is therein, and the cattle thereof, with the edge of the sword" (ibid, 15). This, we are assured, "is right in the eyes of the Lord thy Ged" (ibid, 18). Many other passages of like spirit are familiar to you. In the New Testament the Christians are weak, and the vengeance against heretics is partly delayed till the next world. In fact, as they could not burn in this world, they were comforted with the hope that their enemies should burn on the other side of the grave.

Jesus promised: "Whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, when ye depart out of that house or city, shake off the dust of your feet. Verily, I say unto you, it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for that city" (Matthew x, 14, 15). The same spirit is shown in Luke xix, 27: "But those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me."

Nay, persecution was to enter into social life. John writes to the "elect lady:" "If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrin, receive him not into your house" (2 John, 10).

The power of the sword passed into the hands of Christianity when Constantine ascended the throne, A.D. 324. In 380–394 fifteen statutes were passed by which pagans and heretics were forbidden to meet, were made incapable of making wills, or of receiving legacies, and so on. In fact, you hav some of the same wicked enactments that still disgrace your English statute book in the nineteenth century. At this same date the first heretic was burned in Spain. In 1784, in the same country, the last human sacrifice by fire was offered up to Christ. Between these two stakes, who can measure the misery wrought by Christian hands? I giv you a few instances; you can fill in more from your own reading. The Empress Theodora, in Armenia, in the ninth century, put 100,000 Paulician heretics to death; in the twelfth 60,000 Albigenses were massacred in one town alone; in the fifteenth 3,000 persons were burned alive, and 17,000 fined or imprisoned for life in Andalusia during one year; during another 950 persons were burned alive in the town of Ville Reale; in another the Jews were expelled and died by thousands, while in 1502 the number of the expelled was raised to 3,000,000, the Moors being driven out, and a vast number perished on the way. Torquemada has the following record: "Burnt at the stake alive, 10,220; burnt in effigy, the persons having died in prison or fled the country, 6,860; punished with infamy, confiscation, perpetual imprisonment, or loss of civil rights, 97,321; total, 114,401" (Freethinker's Text-Book, part II., p. 472). Cardinal Ximenes has 52,855 victims. In Spain alone 31,912 persons were burned alive, and 291,450 more perished for heresy; in the Netherlands Alva put 18,000 heretics to death, by his own confession, and 50,000 were put to death in the year 1566 only; in 1572, 14,000 Huguenots were slain in Paris, and tens of thousands more throughout France; Henry VIII. of England slew 500 heretics who rejected his "Six Articles;" Mary killed 277 Protestants; Elizabeth a large number of Roman Catholics; in Ireland Roman Catholics were under the most cruel laws; the misery there to-day is largely due to Christianity, Orange fanaticism and popish bigotry being equally blood-thirsty, and Ireland will never be at peace until heresy has cured the brutality generated by Christianity; in Scotland Dissenters were killed and tortured.

Christian leaders proclaimed the duty of persecution: "In Germany, Luther cried: 'Why, if men hang the thief upon the gallows, or if they put the rogue to death, why should not we, with all our strength, attack these popes and cardinals, these dregs of the Roman Sodom? Why not wash our hands in their blood?' Sandys, bishop of London, wrote in defense of persecution. Archbishop Usher, in an address signed by eleven other bishops, said, 'Any toleration to the papists is a grievous sin.' Knox said: 'The people are bound in conscience to put to death the queen, along with all her priests.' The English Parliament said, 'Persecution was necessary to advance the glory of God.' The Scotch Parliament decreed death against Catholics as idolators, saying 'it was a religious obligation to execute them'" (Freethinker's Text-Book, Part II., p. 474).

I admit that most religions persecute more or less, but let my opponent, if he can, produce the record of any superstition drenched in blood as is this Christianity. Until such a record is produced, I affirm "that Christianity has used persecution more largely than any other creed." 4. That it has upheld and aggravated slavery. Slavery is admittedly taught in the Old Testament (Lev. xxv, 44); it is nowhere denounced in the New. On the contrary, slaves, euphemistically translated servants in our Bible, are exhorted to be obedient and submissiv, and Paul sent back to his master a fugitiv slave, recognizing his rights of property.

Let me say at once that slavery was universal in the old world. But it was surely the duty of Christianity to strive against this universal curse. Instead of so doing it was silent respecting the wrong, and even aggravated the bad condition of the slave.

A very remarkable testimony is given in a most unexpected quarter to the supreme vileness of Christian slavery. Charles Dickens was admittedly a Christian, yet here in his own journal we hav the following: "Indeed one of the most horrible features in this most horrible traffic is the fact that fathers sell their children, and brothers their brothers, without thought or care; that fathers and brothers do worse than sell to another master their daughters and sisters; that all natural duties are violated and all natural boundaries overpassed. In no other country, and under no other condition of slavery, hav such things been done before. In Mohammedan slavery natural ties are respected as sacredly as the most perfectly legal ties, and the moralities of society are regarded and enforced from bond as well as from free. . . . Slave-owners would as soon think of preserving conjugal fidelity among their sheep and horses as among their slaves. The farmer who sells his calf, and the planter who sells the suckling from the mother's breast, act with exactly the same feeling and from the same motiv. . . . This has never been in any age of the world's history before. Judaism, in the Greek and Roman times, Mohammedanism, all recognized the rights of nature in their slaves. Christianity is the only faith whose professors hav violated and destroyed these rights" (Household Words, vol. xiv, p. 137).

What Objections to Christianity?

"2. Revelation from the Divine Being to the human race."

"3. Profuse sacred scriptures"—the latter including the idea of the former. Number 2 is true again. God did reveal himself to men, as the Bible (and, if you please, the Vedas) asserts. Still I do not see that the necessary conclusion is that the Bible copied from the Vedas because they both assert this; do you? The argument that the latter was the original of the former because they both claim to be the word of God is too abstruse for me. I should think the rational thing to do would be to test which, if either, was correct.

"4. A divine and inspired lawgiver who instructed the people in what God required of them." I suppose you refer to Moses as the biblical lawgiver. He was not divine. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the Vedas to know how far the parallelism extends, but I cannot see what proof this is that the writers of the Bible committed plagiarism. While truth carries undoubtedly to those who are of the truth its own credentials, Moses proved also his divine legation to his contemporaries by the miracles he performed, besides the personal attestation which the Almighty gave on burning Sinai; and miracles, prophecies, and inherent truth and life alike confirm it to us. It is probable, however, that you regard Moses as a mythical person; if so, you are opposing your speculation to the historical proof of Manetho, Artapamis, Tacitus, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Longinus, and many other ancient historians.

The four objections thus far considered, urged against the originality of scriptural religion from Brahmanism, will be more fully seen in their real character when we further reflect that the facts to which you object are all absolutely necessary to any revelation from God. I take it as an axiom of nature that there is a personal Creator, and, from the state of man, there is a necessity for revelation. We have but to reflect a moment to perceive this. As Paley graphically puts it, "I deem it unnecessary to prove that mankind stood in need of a revelation, because I have met with no serious person who thinks that, even under the Christian revelation, we have too much light or any degree of assurance which is superfluous." I regard it also conclusively self-evident that if there is a revelation from God it must be in written form, otherwise it never could be preserved and handed down with any degree of accuracy. This necessity and the consequences of not being committed to writing are seen in heathen mythology, which is, I have no doubt, in many cases traditions of many events that have really occurred, but which, by the lapse of ages and the different and imperfect channels of communications, have become distorted and transformed into what now is no more reliable than the wildest fiction. And I think it equally evident to every reasoning mind that if God has made a revelation, he must have employed a man specially fitted, as Moses was, before he could prepare a people to keep his truth until the time came for such fuller revelation of himself as he should afterward choose to make when the people—trained beforehand by separation from surrounding nations and a burdensome but typical ritual, such as the Jews were, to become the missionaries of the world—would be ready. This argument is so clearly and irresistibly traced out by Dr. Walker in his "Philosophy of the Plan of Salvation" that I cannot but again refer any real truth-seeker to it. However, I return again to the fifth alleged plagiarism of the scriptures from Brahmanism.

"5. The doctrine of the trinity—three gods united in one." I have already referred to this and proved its dissimilarity to the Christian faith.

"6. The sacrifice of animals to appease an angry God."

The Bible goes back to Adam for its derivation of animal sacrifices for sin. This practice has been universal ever since the fall of man. The scriptures alone, of all books of traditions, gives a rational account of its origin. Its universal practice is a universal confession of sin and the need of a Savior, which, with the attestation which every man's conscience gives to him of this truth, is more cogent in favor of Christianity than all the arguments Infidelity can produce. When once a soul realizes its lost condition, neither unbelief nor good works can give it ease. It is then that "the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin." Judge how much your objection favors your cause. Brahmanism undoubtedly borrowed sacrifice from previous religions, and so retracing, if proof external, one way or the other, could be produced, the fact would be seen that the revelation of Jehovah to our first parents originated the custom. Brahmanism thus borrowed from Jehovah's appointments, and the Bible is Jehovah's book.

"7. The efficacy and importance of prayer in affecting God."

It is human nature to pray, and because the Bible teaches men to pray—which reason also does—is to my mind no proof of its Hindoo origin. Perhaps Mr. Howe—who, in the Hornellsville Convention, according to Mr. Chainey, "prefaced his address with an invocation to a conscious power outside of him"—is unaware that he borrowed his idea of prayer from Brahmanism, yet such is the case if your argument is sound.

"8. The doctrine of incarnation—God visible to mortals."

Vishnu, according to Hindoo mythology, had nine avatars, or descents. The first was in the form of a fish, the second a tortoise, then a boar, a man-lion, a dwarf, then a hero, then Rama-Chandra, then Chrishna, and lastly Buddha—a tenth is yet to come. The above enumeration I deem ample refutation to every reasonable mind of your charge of plagiarism. The Vedas, however, do not teach the doctrine of incarnation.

"9. God cohabiting with a virgin, producing an offspring half God and half man."

There is no such thought in the Bible.

"10. God's son coming into the world to save it."

This statement is offered without the slightest proof. I deny any parallelism, or that the Vedas so teach.

"11. The conflict between God's son and devils and evil demons. 12. A belief in a holy breath or the Holy Ghost."

As far as I know, Brahmanism has no such teachings. In fact, with two or three exceptions, I might deny them all, for the assertions are unsupported by any proof.

"13. A belief in animals bearing away sin and its effects."

The teaching of scripture is, "For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sin;" but that the whole dispensation during which this was commanded was typical of the true sacrifice, who should in very deed "bear away sin and its effects." When you instance a religion that was in existence before Christianity which has any similarity in this respect, viz., ordaining sacrifices which are professedly imperfect and typical, there may be some show of reason in claiming a plagiarism.

"14. A belief in immortality."

You believe in immortality, therefore you borrowed it from Brahmanism. Will you abide by your own logic?

"15. Places of happiness and misery in a future life."

If there are such places, and the Bible is a revelation, it must of necessity teach of them. At the same time it alone gives a rational account of them; and if the Brahmanistic heaven and hell are similar to the Buddhist, which my present reading is too limited to allow me to positively affirm, a simple description of the Vedic conception would show the falsity of the alleged parallelism. As I have remarked before, your accusations would cause it to be necessary to be above reproach to prefer untruth to truth. Originality, or rather dissimilarity, would be with you the alone test of inspiration, and preferable to it.

"16. Expiation—one person atoning for another. 17. A mediator, Redeemer, and Savior."

These are kindred ideas, advanced, like all the others, without the slightest substantiation. If you think it worth while attempting proof, I will then criticise.

"19. The altar used in worship, also the rosary."

Neither of these are used in the New Testament.

"20. Baptism, both by water and fire."

I should be obliged for some substantiation.

"21. The extraordinary qualities of holy water. 22. The confession of sins."

I suppose you refer to the confessional.

"23. Going on pilgrimages to holy places; and, 24. Celibacy and chastity to be observed by priests."

There are no such teachings in Christianity. Holy water is a popish superstition and unscriptural. Chastity is undoubtedly demanded of all true worshipers of Jehovah, but celibacy is not commanded on any Christian, and there is no earthly priesthood under the present dispensation.

"25. Belief in miracles and their great efficacy."

I am at a loss to determine what is meant by the "great efficacy" of miracles. It seems rather droll to say that any Christian believes the miracles related in the scriptures because the Brahman puts faith in the miracles of his system, or that Christianity borrowed from Brahmanism because Christ performed miracles.

In every parallelism in which the succeeding religions adduced agree with Brahmanism the argument militates against itself. For instance, the doctrine of expiation is alleged to be common to most of them. Now the scriptures, if they borrowed it from Brahmanism, did not take it from Zoroaster nor from Egypt.

But it is too tedious to minutely examine the other alleged plagiarisms. They refute themselves. I will merely take space to deny that the following have any place in New Testament teachings:

"14. Both systems have monasteries and monks.
"15. Both have nunneries and nuns.
"16. Both have images of virgin and child (?).
"17. Both revere the cross as a symbol (?).
"18. Both have confessions of sins.*
"19. Both use the miter in priestly paraphernalia.
"20. Both use the dalmatica and cope.
"21. Both use . . . double choirs.
"24. Both have the censor with five chains.
"27. Both use chaplets in religious ceremonies.
"29. Both worship departed saints.
"30. Both have images representing saints.
"32. Both have religious processions.
"33. Both use litanies in worship.
"34. Both think much of holy water.
"36. Both believe in God and earthly females begetting a hybrid offspring.
"40. Both use altars and temples.
"41. Both believe in holy pilgrimages."

*I suppose you refer to the popish usage of the confessional.

Buddhism does not (No. 37) "believe in expiation and atonement," and it is rather ironical to call that "a future life" (No. 38) whose highest fruition is annihilation. The alleged parallelisms that I have not considered, while, perhaps, somewhat exaggerated, I see no reason to criticise.

I will now return to your denial of the genuineness of the historical passages I quoted from Tacitus. It is amusing to observe with what determined ignorance and effrontery Infidels assert all ancient historical references to Christianity to be interpolations. I know not at which to be most astonished, the gross ignorance or the assuming impudence of the English writer who asserts in the Edinburgh Review his ability to prove the entire "annals of Tacitus" a forgery, supported in his claim, as I see he is, by the writer who signs himself "Antichrist" in a later issue of your paper. I had intended to prove at some length the existence and crucifixion of Jesus Christ by quotations from ancient pagan historians, with substantiation of the genuineness of the passages quoted; but as the subject will more properly present itself before us in a future thesis, I will abandon my design until then. In the meantime I will oppose the judgment of the Infidel Gibbon to your assertion that "a proof to show that the passage in the 'Annals' is a forgery is that the punishment of the Christians by Nero is plagiarized from Sulpicius Severus, an elegant Christian writer, about the year 400." On the passage to which you refer, that elegant but bitter enemy of the Bible says: "The most skeptical criticism is obliged to respect the truth of this extraordinary fact (the persecution by Nero) and the integrity of this celebrated passage of Tacitus. The former is confirmed by the diligent and accurate Suetonius, who mentions the punishment which Nero inflicted upon the Christians. The latter may be proved by the consent of the most ancient manuscripts, by the inimitable character of Tacitus, by his reputation, which guarded his text from the interpolations of pious fraud, and by the purport of his narration" (Gibbon, vol. ii, pp. 407, 408).

A cause resting its case upon such flagrant misrepresentations and wilful ignorance, which, though repeatedly exposed, are yet as repeatedly and unblushingly reiterated, may well excite contempt. But there are many to whom research is well nigh impossible who depend upon leaders who, proud of the applause of their followers, are either too dishonest or too bigoted to confess their disingenuousness. It is of such that I would ask whether an argument in which so many misrepresentations are contained is not to be viewed with suspicion, and would put the personal request to each reader to carefully and honestly test the grounds of his own skepticism.

Thomas Paine vs. Thomas Jefferson.

AN ANSWER TO DAVID BRUCE.

To-day, January 20th, is my birthday. I am seventy-six years old, and I profess to know something of the history of my country.

Why did William Templeton Franklin, the grandson of Dr. Benjamin Franklin, publish at so late a date as 1809, after the death of Thomas Paine, that Thomas Jefferson was the author of the Declaration of Independence, 1776?

Jefferson was only the chairman of a committee of three to present the paper to a committee of five—himself being one—for their consideration, and not the author, which has given rise to the story of his drafting the document.

Jefferson, at the time, was a young man, thirty-three years of age, while Paine was thirty-nine years old and of experience in the governments of both countries. We find no writings of Jefferson's to compare with the Declaration of Independence before it was published to the world, while all the writings of Paine abound in the same style of language as the Declaration.

Let us compare the writings of Paine. He says in the "Rights of Man," page 162: "At an early period, little more than sixteen years of age, raw and adventurous, and heated with the false heroism of a master who had served in a man-of-war, I began the carver of my own fortune, and entered on board the privateer Terrible, Captain Death. From this adventure I was happily prevented by the affectionate and moral remonstrance of a good father, who, from his own habits of life, being of the Quaker profession, must hav begun to look upon me as lost. But the impression, much as it effected at the time, began to wear away, and I entered afterward in the privateer, King of Prussia, Captain Mendez, and went in her to sea. Yet from such a beginning, and with all the inconveniences of early life against me, I am proud to say that with a perseverance undismayed by difficulties, a disinterestedness that compels respect, I hav not only contributed to raise a new empire in the world, founded on a new system of government, but I hav arrived at an eminence in political literature, the most difficult of all lines to succeed and excel in."

Let us go back awhile. After Paine left the man-of-war, or privateer, he kept a small retail grocery store for some time, and was sold out. Not succeeding in that, he, through the influence of his father-in-law, an exciseman, procured a position in that office, where he remained several years at a nominal salary of fifty pounds a year. In the mean time, between hours, Paine wrote many articles for papers and such like, which were published by the proprietors, and not by Paine, he being then too poor, under so small a salary in the excise office. This accounts for Paine's writing, "I never troubled others with my notions till very lately, nor ever published a syllable in England in my life."

Writing for others to publish is very different from being a publisher of the manuscript. He says: "What I write is pure nature, and my pen and my soul hav ever gone together. My writings I hav always given away, reserving only the expense of printing and paper, and sometimes not even that. I never courted either fame or interest, and my manner of life to those who know it will justify what I say. My study is to be useful; and if your lordship [Lord Howe] loves mankind as well as I do, you would, seeing you cannot conquer us, cast about and lend your hand toward accomplishing a peace" (Crisis, page 25).

Paine, in "Crisis" No. I, writes in that number, page 8, December 23, 1776: "The heart that feels not now is dead. The blood of his children will curse his cowardice who shrinks back at a time when a little might hav saved the whole and made them happy. I love the man that can smile in trouble, that can gather strength from distress, and grow brave by reflection. 'Tis the business of little minds to shrink, but he whose heart is firm and whose conscience approves his conduct will pursue his principles unto death. . . . Not all the treasures of the world, so far as I believe, could hav induced me to support an offensiv war, for I think it murder; but if a thief breaks into my house, burns and destroys my property, and kills or threatens to kill me or those that are in it, and to bind me in all cases whatsoever to his absolute will, am I to suffer it? What signifies it to me whether he who does it is a king or common man, my countryman or not my countryman, whether it be done by an individual villain or an army of them? . . . Let them call me rebel and welcome. I feel no concern from it. . . . There are cases which cannot be overdone by language, and this is one. . . . It is the madness of folly to expect mercy from those who hav refused to do justice, and even mercy where conquest is the object is only a trick of war."

I leave off here the part that Paine took in the struggle to make this a free country, and now I copy from Junius' Letter No. 7 to Sir William Draper, a member of the British Parliament in London, March 3, 1769, four years before Paine leaves for America:

"Sir: An academical education has given you an unlimited command over the most beautiful figures of speech. Masks, hatchets, racks, and vipers dance through your letters in all the mazes of metaphorical confusion. These are the gloomy companions of a disturbed imagination, the melancholy madness of poetry without the inspiration.

"I will not contend with you in point of composition. You are a scholar, Sir William, and, if I am truly informed, you write Latin with almost as much purity as English. Suffer me then, for I am a plain, unlettered man, to continue that style of interrogation which suits my capacity and to which, considering the readiness of your answers, you ought to hav no objection. . . . Do you then really think that if I were to ask a most virtuous man whether he ever committed theft or murder it would disturb his peace of mind. Such a question might perhaps discompose the gravity of his muscles, but I believe it would little affect the tranquillity of his conscience.

"Examin your own breast, Sir William, and you will discover that reproaches and inquiries hav no power to affect either the man of unblemished integrity or the abandoned profligate. It is the middle compound character which alone is vulnerable, the man who, without firmness enough to avoid a dishonorable action, has feeling enough to be ashamed of it."

There are fifty-two of these letters in all. The last one was published in 1772 or 1773, a short time before Paine left England for America. In his last words the writer promised that "if Junius livs you shall often be reminded of him," which promis was fulfilled in America during the Revolution in that "Crisis."

If you connect the writings of Paine together by a careful examination in the language he used all through you will be able to come to the conclusion who drafted the paper. Jefferson, as the chairman of the committee of three, placed it before the committee of five for their consideration.

Philadelphia, Jan. 20, 1881. E. HASKELL.

W. F. JAMIESON is engaged at present in a hand-to-hand conflict with Moses Hull at Hartford, Conn. The people are much interested in the debates. At the close of the Hartford debate Mr. Jamieson goes to Vineland, N. J., to discuss with Hull (Jan. 23–27). Jan. 29th and 30th will help Linesville Station, Crawford county, Pa., celebrate Thomas Paine's birthday, to be followed by a debate with Hull.

Christianity and Buddhism.

The writer of the article, "Christianity and Buddhism," in the Sun of January 9th, after pointing out many remarkable coincidences in the two ethical systems, maintains that the former is not borrowed or plagiarized from the latter, because, says he, "it is not until toward the end of the second century after Christ that Buddhism comes clearly and specifically into view." Admitting the last statement to be true, I aver that it is not until toward the end of the second century that the ethics of the gospels, or even the gospel history itself, comes clearly into view. (See Supernatural Religion.)

What part of the gospel ethics or history do you find in the New Testament epistles, or even the apocalypse, which were written before the end of the first century? There is a single allusion to the crucifixion under Pontius Pilate in 1 Timothy vi, 13; but I find no evidence of the existence of that epistle before A.D. 130, or later, and it certainly was not written by Paul. (See Dav. Int., N. Y.)

Gnosticism, which worshiped an ideal Jesus, antedated the Christian era, and it seems to hav adopted some of the features of Buddhism, such, for example, as the abhorrence of beastly sacrifice and aversion to the slaughter of animals. Buddhist ethics, perhaps, did not come clearly into view till toward the end of the second century; but that was just the time that real Christianity began to prevail as opposed to the then everywhere prevalent Gnosticism; and in the course of a century or two, in the desperate struggle for ascendancy, real Christianity, called Catholicism, overcame the ideal, or Gnostic, system.

W. H. B.

The Friends.

The fact is plain, to me at least, that the Friends, as Friends or Quakers, can progress no further. They are the same to-day that they were in the days of Fox and Penn. If they desire to advance, they must step right out of Christianity into Infidelity, for there is but one step, and thousands hav taken, or are about taking, that step. I do know from personal observation the Society is honeycombed with unbelief in Christianity and the Bible; and it is admitted that the Society of Friends turn out more Infidels—that is, more disbelievers in Christianity and the Bible—than any other denomination, according to their numbers; and this is the logical and legitimate result of the Hicksite branch, at least. It is admitted, too, I think, that the Society is on the decrease, but this is probably true of all other societies, for we see it frequently stated in the papers that there is of late a great falling off of attendance at the churches.

This is an age of reason and science, and the more the people think and reason the less they will be bound by narrow creeds, rules, and dogmas. If knowledge and science continue to advance as they hav for the last fifty years, it will only be a matter of time when this old barbarian book called Bible—the so-called inspired word of God—will be of very little account; in fact, it is now of no account in the scientific world; it is only reverenced by the ignorant, the credulous, and the superstitious, which, unfortunately, has been the most numerous class. As the people advance in true science and knowledge there is a corresponding decrease in the supernatural and all kinds of superstition, and consequently a decrease in inspired prophets and preachers that pretend to teach their ignorant and credulous fellow-creatures a kind of heavenly supernatural knowledge that the Almighty, in his infinit wisdom, has not taught them.

In this age of reason and science it is hardly likely there will be many more Christs, Mohammeds, Peters, Pauls, and Joe Smiths, and a host of other inspired drones and saintly humbugs that hav infested this world with a worse than Egyptian darkness. It is not at all likely a Luther, a Calvin, a Wesley, a Fox, or even a Hicks, can rise again; but it is now becoming in order for a Bradlaugh, an Underwood, and an Ingersoll to rise and giv their fellow-creatures solid and wholesome food.

I hav been reading the New Testament some of late, and am amazed how intelligent people believe and venerate such unmitigated stuff and ridiculous nonsense as it contains. Early in life I was led to reverence the character of Christ; but the more I read of him, and the older I grew, the less reverence and respect I hav for him. If there ever was such a person as Jesus, and he was to appear on earth, he would now be treated as a vagabond and a tramp, and would honestly deserve the title. According to the book itself, he had no home or visible means of support, but led a sort of vagabond life, performing miracles and living from hand to mouth off the fruits of others. Like all such inspired impostors, or so-called reformers, his business was not of this world, or his business was to talk, not to work.

I believe Friends don't believe much in miracles, and also don't believe Jesus was God; but how are they going to account for the many miracles that he performed, such as turning water into wine, feeding four or five thousand men, besides women and children, with six or seven loaves of bread and a few little fishes, raising the dead, curing the deaf, the blind, and casting out devils by wholesale and retail. Surely no mere man could do all this. We must either believe he was a God or an impostor, for if he really performed so many miracles he was more than man; but if he performed these wonders by jugglery, he was a great deceiver and impostor. The probability is very strong that there never was such a being, either God or man, but, like all the gods of heathen mythology, was purely a mythological character. [See Taylor's "Diegesis," "Revelations of Antichrist," "Sixteen Crucified Saviors," and "The Gods of Ancient and Modern Times."]

Friends hav always borne strong testimony against hireling clergy and priestcraft, yet venerate and reverence the Bible, the corner-stone and stock in trade of priestcraft. Christ himself, though he affected to oppose priestcraft, was a self-constituted priest, and held in veneration the high-priests, such as Moses and David and the prophets of the Old Testament. It is true he did not take money for his services as a priest, but made out to get his living, and was unscrupulous about the manner of getting it. He sends his disciples out and says: "Behold, I send you as lambs among wolves. Carry neither purse nor scrip nor shoes." He tells them how they are to proceed, that the laborer is worthy of his hire, and the house or city that won't receive them is worse than Sodom, and he curses all such.

Whenever a man gets a notion firmly fixed in his head that he is highly favored and inspired by the Almighty to preach the gospel, there is nothing too absurd or monstrous for him to say or do. Charles Freeman got the notion firmly fixed in his head—and got it from that barbarious old book, the holy Bible—that God required him to sacrifice his little daughter, Abraham-like, and he and his wife actually did the horrible deed, and they stoutly maintain that it was the will of God, and was no crime. But we are told that Freeman is crazy. Perhaps so, but not a bit more so than all the rest of the holy, so-called, and inspired prophets and preachers from Jesus down to Freeman. George Fox was honest, conscientious, upright, and a man of ability, yet he would walk into a church in time of service and contradict and denounce the preacher in the pulpit, although he well knew he would be kicked out and get a severe beating for it. He literally fulfilled the requirement of Jesus to resist not evil, and was terribly and outrageously abused for it.

Lorenzo Dow, the great preacher, would ride till his horse gave out, would then trade him off for a fresh one, or, if he was unable to do that, would abandon him and finish his journey on foot to meet his engagements. Thousands of people attended his preaching, and such was his zeal and energy in the Lord's work that after delivering a sermon he could not take time to pass through the crowd to the door but would spring out of the nearest window and be off like a race-horse to meet his next engagement.

One would suppose that the Almighty, when he inspired men to preach the gospel, should hav inspired the people with the faith to believe what these holy, inspired servants taught them. This, it seems, he has sadly neglected to do, for a good many of his inspired servants hav had a hard road to travel. Jesus himself, the so-called founder of Christianity, had very little luck in making proselytes, and was put to death. John the Baptist was beheaded, and Paul, it is said, suffered martyrdom. Hundreds, perhaps thousands, of inspired servants of the Lord, if we are to believe they were such, suffered death without making proselytes. George Fox suffered terrible persecutions, and he was undoubtedly one of the very best of his tribe, and made but a few proselytes comparativly. Joe Smith, the Mormon prophet, had pretty good luck for an ignorant vagabond in making proselytes; but he had to suffer martyrdom. And Brigham Young, his successor, had splendid luck in the inspired business of catching gudgeons, and lived in clover and died a natural death.

The time is not far off, it is to be hoped, when a man who undertakes to palm himself off as a prophet, a go-between, an imaginary something called God, that he knows no more about than the ox or the horse, and his fellow-man, pretending that he is inspired to tell the will of this imaginary being to his fellows, who know quite as much about this God as he does, will be regarded as knaves, hypocrits, or fools, or a happy mixture of all three, and treated accordingly. This army of holy evangelical tramps and saintly deadheads that anually sweep over the country like a pestilence and are worse than the grasshoppers, the Hessian fly, and potato bug all combined—these saintly and sanctimonious tramps and howling dervishes won't take money for their heavenly services, oh, no; but somehow they manage to dress well and liv at the head of the pile off the fat of the land. They are the sworn enemy of the devil, yet the devil, Jesus, and the Bible are their sole stock in trade, which if they were deprived of their occupation would be gone, and they would then hav to go to work.

Ignorance is the mother of all supernaturalism and superstition. The only way to remedy this stupendous evil is to treat it liberally with strong doses of knowledge and science. If this could be generally done it would stop the manufacture of inspired prophets and Christs, and Mohammeds, Smiths, and Freemans cease to be.

J. M. KING.

Don't Overload.

Not to speak of other worlds, the world which we occupy is said to contain some fifteen hundred millions of inhabitants who are said to be God's children. And it is supposed that there is nothing in the world that would so please God as to hav each one of his children load himself with a long prayer and fire it at him once or twice a day. Consequently about one hundred million "soldiers of the cross" volunteer their services, join the "army of the Lord," and day after day, and year after year, they load and fire. There are big guns and little guns. Big guns with a big bore, that make a big noise, and small guns that make little or no noise at all. And it is hard to tell which of the two, big or little, makes the best shot. They usually get on their knees, shut their eyes, take sight, and fire at God's ear.

Now let us make due allowance for poor powder, blank cartridges, and bad guns, that hav become a little breech-burned owing to long and constant use, and say that one shot in ten hits the mark. And, then, notwithstanding the great waste of ammunition, the prayers would hav to enter God's ear thicker and faster than a charge of shot ever entered the ear of a rabbit from an old musket.

Now if, as it is supposed, God is able to separate and properly answer each prayer without getting things a little mixed, we must confess that he is possessed of a very extraordinary business capacity. Some of these prayers are for rain, some for dry weather, and some for the souls of their neighbors. They pray for the sick and then show their lack of faith by going for the doctor.

A butcher buys an old bull and sells it to his customers. Every soldier of the cross at the table asks God to bless the food set before them. So that God is asked to bless the old bull in pieces, when as a matter of business economy, if there is any efficacy in prayer, the butcher should hav had God bless the old bull before he was disposed of. But men love to practice, so they load, shut their eyes, and fire, load and fire, and unless there is a great waste of ammunition, God is the worst-peppered target that we can think of at just this present time.

With so great a press of business on hand it would not be surprising that God should make some mistakes. Let me state a case. Two years since I was invited to deliver an address at the memorial meeting of Thos. Paine, at Saranac, and whilst I was talking, just over the way there were some of God's soldiers doing some pretty tall shooting. There was one fellow who rather overloaded, as some thought, and when he fired himself off the report was truly a-w-f-u-l! He prayed that my tongue might be paralyzed. And, strange as it may appear, he was deprived of his speech that very day, whilst my tongue still continues to wag just a few. Now, did God make a mistake and go for the wrong man? The doctors said that his trouble was the result of natural causes, as he had over-exerted the muscles of his throat, which, when interpreted, means that when a gun is overloaded, either the breech or muzzle must suffer. Well, after about three months the soldier recovered, and probably will load lighter hereafter.

Lost Sheep Returning.

It will be remembered that the League at Angola, Ind., went off after Green fields and pastures new. The secession was accomplished in an underhand way and by the regulation vote of 8 to 7; but the minority, determined not to be put down, went to work and reorganized, added more members and applied for a new charter. The League at Angola, therefore, is again in the field, loyally attached to the National Liberal League, with forty members, and Thos. Tasker as President; H. Freygang, Secretary, and Thos. R. Moffat, Treasurer.

I hav also to report a new League at Deadwood, Dakota. The No. given to it is 23, to take the place of one of the seceders at Syracuse, in 1878. It starts with 29 members, all first-class citizens of that place. The organization of this League is due to the enterprise of Mr. D. P. Wilcox, who is its temporary secretary.

I hear that the prosecution, under the Comstock law, of Mr. H. L. Barter, late editor of the Pilot at LeClaire, Iowa, will be compromised by the payment of a light fine—$100 and costs. His offense was the publication from week to week, in the Pilot, of a story called "Libra Dawn," by Mrs. Maria L. Follett, of LeClaire. This ends the last of the Comstock cases which the Defense Association has on hand to defend.

Communications.

"Slade's Mediumship."

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In a late issue of your paper, under the above caption, is an account of a spiritual seance with Dr. Slade, in which the editor of the Rockland Advertiser took part, he having visited the medium by appointment for purposes of investigation. A statement by Moses Hull is also appended in corroboration.

The writer givs, apparently, a very candid account of the remarkable phenomena which took place in his presence, and asks, "Who will present the true hypothesis upon which these marvels can be explained?"

Mr. Hull givs an account of an alleged slate communication which was received at the sitting with Dr. Slade from one Charles Frost, deceased, who gave date of demise, age, etc., and requested the recipient to call at a certain street and number in New York to convince his (deceased's) friends that "we liv after what is called death."

Now, with much deference and respect for the honesty and sincerity of many Spiritualists and some so-called mediums, being a hard-headed Materialist, I will, with your permission, Mr. Editor, giv my hypothesis of these alleged spiritual manifestations.

In the city of Toronto, some eighteen or twenty years ago, I attended a magical performance in the Mechanics' Institute, given by the late "Prof. Anderson, the great Wizard of the North." The professor did many wonderful things, produced phenomena some of which I was then quite unable to understand, but he made no claim to any assistance from supernatural agencies. Among other things he announced that his daughter, a young lady who accompanied him, would, with her back to the audience and blindfolded, tell any one the time his watch indicated, or what he held in his hand, etc. Of this asseveration I felt skeptical, and took out pencil and paper and wrote upon it, asking the young lady what I was writing. Although a distance of thirty or forty feet away, with her eyes carefully bandaged and her back to us, she was able promptly to tell me every word I was writing. This puzzled me. The other tricks were magic, but there was evidently no magic about this. Though I was not able at the time to discover the modus operandi of all the other tricks of legerdemain, I was satisfied they could all be readily explained by the magician himself. But here was something outside the province of magic, and utterly inexplicable on any sleight-of-hand data. What, then, was the explanation? what the hypothesis? How did she read the writing without the use of the natural medium of vision? Here animal magnetism comes to our rescue. In the science of psychology, though yet in its infancy, we find the solution. She read the writing in one of two ways. She was either clairvoyant, in which condition she could see the words independently of the natural organs of vision, or she was able as a "mind-reader" to get in rapport with my mind, and thus get the impressions. But, it may be queried, does science giv any account of such conditions? If not, the facts—incontrovertible ones—are present, awaiting generalization and explanation. What is clairvoyance? The nascent science of psychology may not yet be able to giv a full and conclusiv answer to this question. It is nevertheless a well-established fact that the clairvoyant subject can see through opaque bodies, even at a distance, and without the use of the eyes at all. The psychological explanation of this phenomenon which seems most plausible is this: It is well known that electricity permeates almost all substances, and exists in the surrounding atmosphere. In clairvoyance the brain becomes surcharged with electricity, so that it becomes in equilibrium magnetically with the circumambient air. In this condition opaque bodies become transparent to the brain, even the skull becoming transparent, so that the subject can see without the aid of the natural organs of vision. This explanation seems reasonable and not in contravention of science so far as ascertained in that direction.

Some occurrences in my own personal experience may be related here as pertinent to the subject under consideration. During one or two years of my school-days, subsequent to the experience at Prof. Anderson's performance, and while in rather delicate health, I was a somnambulist, and was betimes in a clairvoyant condition. Sometimes when I would get up in my sleep my elder brother would turn out too, to hav a little fun, as he called it. He would get our school books, and put questions to me in the different branches we were studying, and I would answer them all correctly. I would readily work problems which I found myself unable to solve in my waking state, and would be wholly oblivious in the morning of everything that had passed. One day while out shooting I lost my powder-flask, and hunted in vain for it in every place where I supposed it might be. That night in my sleep, while in a clairvoyant state, I saw the flask very distinctly a mile away under a balsam tree, on the east side. So vivid was the impression on my mind in the morning that I started and went straight to the spot indicated in my sleep, and found the flask just where I saw it, and in a place where in my waking state I had no expectation of finding it; for as it turned out, I had lost it some time before I supposed, and consequently had not looked there at all the day before.

But what has all this to do with the spiritual phenomena? our Spiritualistic friends will ask. Considerable. It is a species of the same genus of psychological manifestations which spreads its psychic wings over all the varied phenomena of Spiritualism. The gradually-developing science of psychology will, I think, without a doubt, ultimately explain all. The manifestations attested by the editor of the Rockland Advertiser and Mr. Hull, as noted above, will come within the range of natural principles and their rationale be made clear without any reference to supermundane agencies. Indeed the communication purporting to hav come from the deceased Frost to Messrs. Slade and Hull, assuming its entire authenticity, is, I venture to think, resolvable now on natural principles with the light we already hav in this direction. I would suggest as a very probable hypothesis that the medium had the facts as to name, age, date of demise, etc., of the late Frost all in his mind previous to the communication, and through the potency of will and personal magnetism was able, in conjunction with Mr. Hull and by his co-operation, to produce the writing upon the slate without the use of his hands. This theory is strengthened by the fact noticed by the editor, viz., that the moment he broke his contact with the table the writing ceased! The other physical manifestations noted by the editor, assuming their reliability, could also hav been produced by the same agencies.

It is true there are some eminent scientists who accept the doctrins of modern Spiritualism. It is also true that some respectable scholars and scientists still accept the doctrins of Christianity and the Mosaic account of creation—Prof. Dawson, for instance, of Montreal, a man of extensiv erudition and deeply read in science. It is also true that many learned and intelligent men hav fully believed in witchcraft. Almost every system, good or bad, wise or otherwise, since the world began, has drawn unto itself disciples from the high and low, the learned and the unlearned. I therefore think, with these facts in view, that our friends the Spiritualists lay entirely too much stress upon the fact that their system has been espoused by a Wallace, a Crookes, and a few other learned and able men.

The case of modern Spiritualism, fairly put, stands thus: Under the mass of very questionable "manifestations" is a substratum of genuin phenomena requiring explanation. Science is not as yet able to explain all these phenomena. It is, therefore, not at all surprising, considering the proneness of human nature to hav a theory of some sort for everything, numbers of people adopt the Spiritualistic theory to account for phenomena they cannot in any other way explain, especially as the theory is a pleasant one, and one with which the highest feelings of many excellent people are strongly in sympathy.

"The Beginning of Wisdom."

The great, wise King Solomon has the reputation of saying, "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom."

That may be the right end for some to begin at, but it's rather low down.

As humanity ascends from the barbarous to the civilized and enlightened, fear is left behind.

Thought is parent of Feel and grand-parent of Act. Standing upright before the burning throne of God in our own souls, squaring our every thought by our divinest ideal of the true dignity of manhood and womanhood, what use hav we for fear?

Man, as he is, is not the most delightful theme for meditation. When manufactured up into the likeness of the sublime architect, he may be worth looking at. We think he will. In my three-score and twenty-three excursions round the sun I hav occasionally come in contact with man as he is; couldn't well get by it.

So far as the feminins are concerned, I've dealt only with the ideal—hav known them as angels only. At this respectful distance they appear pretty nice. How well they would bear the test of near approach I'm not able to say; hav no disposition to try it. It might dispel a comfortable delusion. This may be one of the cases where ignorance is bliss.

Men, so far as I am acquainted, are in some of their characteristics not wholly unlike hornets.

On a warm summer's day, some years ago, I had occasion to board up the south side of a building. Two powerful tribes of hornets were deeply, earnestly, engaged erecting habitations under the eaves.

I built a scaffold about six feet below the eaves, and mounted with my traps, bringing my head in close proximity with the two rapidly growing structures.

The little folks did not regard my presence with indifference. A strong delegation came forthwith, and warned me to "get."

I said to the delegation: "Gentlemen, I come with no hostil intentions. I hav duties to attend to here as well as you. Here is room enough for both you and me. We hav only to be a little careful and not tread on each other's toes. I confide in your magnanimity; you may in mine.

They didn't leave me till they read my character. Finding no element of fight nor fear, they went quietly about their work, I about mine. We worked all day in good neighborly sociability, the proverb, "Two of a trade can't agree," to the contrary notwithstanding.

Freethought Libraries.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Now that the long wintry evenings and stormy, blustry days are upon us, affording the most leisure—to many at least—of any part of the year, I would like to urge upon Liberals all over the United States the propriety of supplying themselvs with Liberal papers and books. It will be both pleasant and profitable to the individual, and to the cause at large the benefit will be almost incalculable. "But," says one, "we are not able to purchase one-tenth the books we could read during the winter." All right. You can do as we hav done. Let some one in each city, village, or country neighborhood talk the matter up with his or her Liberal friends, call a meeting at some private house, and ascertain how much each one is willing and able to devote to the purchase of books. One may giv fifty cents. Very good. Invest it in a book that will cost fifty cents. That shall be his share in a library. Another, more able, may giv ten dollars. Now select four or five or six volumes, sufficient to exhaust the ten dollars, and these shall be his share in the library. And so on with the next, and the next, until all hav given what they can.

Now elect your officers and giv your association a name, and order your books in the name of your association. Almost all dealers will discount to you if you hav an order of ten dollars or more. Now if you hav raised fifteen dollars you can purchase as many books as you can read well this winter. Each member will hav the benefit of his own investment as well as of that of all the other members.

Then I would suggest that you prepare for your next purchase of books by saving the money which you hav been in the habit of giving to the church, and placing it in your treasurer's hands, and by the first of next December you will probably hav plenty of cash on hand to purchase more books than you will be able to read during the following year. With these books in your hands you will be able to "larrup" the Christian "till he can't rest." Besides, you will occasionally find a lukewarm brother who is willing or a little anxious to search into Freethought principles, and unto him you should lend your books even though you had to do without for a while yourself. If he will read, in nine cases out of ten the truth will make him free.

Another advantage that is derived from the possession of Liberal books is that many a Christian will read them and think over the matter who would not discuss it orally with you for a moment.

Some of our leading Liberals hav thought it best to form a new political party, unfurl a new banner to the breeze, and "fight it out on that line if it takes all summer." But we must remember that our army is yet comparativly weak, that we hav to contend with the best-organized power the world has ever known, and that we are living in an age and country whose people hav not entirely forgotten the old principle that "might makes right." Under these circumstances it behooves us, as liberty-loving people, to mass such an army as will be invincible by any force that the enemy can call together. In order to do this we should open recruiting offices—free Liberal libraries—in every school district in the United States. From Maine to California, from Lake Superior to the Gulf of Mexico, let every man, woman, and child hav a chance to read Liberal literature.

One dollar from each Liberal in almost any neighborhood in the land will he sufficient to start the ball rolling, and as it goes down the hill of time it will gather, as the proverbial snowball, until it sweeps everything before it. For twenty long and weary years the Abolitionists toiled continually to free the slaves of Great Britain, and for an equal length of time did a few brave, heroic souls plead for universal liberty in the great North American republic; but not until they had raised an army from the cradle were they enabled to strike the shackles from four million slaves. So it will largely be with us. The army of progress must be mostly recruited from the growing youth. The youth of to-day is the man of to-morrow. "As the twig is bent the tree's inclined." Upon the next generation which steps upon the stage of action depends the perpetuation of political and religious liberty in this republic. Already is the coil of the anaconda felt about the tender form of liberty. Already is the cold, slimy form of the snake finding its way about the throats of American freemen. Through the influence of the church, legal enactments hav robbed us of one-seventh of our time, forced us to support a paid chaplaincy in our army and navy and prisons, and in our congressional and legislativ halls, and taxed us to pay for the reading of their Bible and singing of their psalms and hymns in our public schools.

Christianity has forced American industry to feed and clothe, in good style, an idle population of sixty thousand priests, who "toil not, neither do they spin," except long yarns about Moses and the Lamb. It has, on one day in each week, shut every door in the land except the church door, and that it has thrown open that we might come together and giv up the few pennies which we may hav been able to save from the last week's toil. It has used all the means at command to ostracise us in all the relations of life, and then shouted itself hoarse in slandering us after death. It has filled our land with prisons, prostitutes, and paupers, murderers, thieves, and defaulters.

What is the remedy for this great and terrible wrong? Where is the silver lining to this blackest of clouds that is lowering over American freemen? By what means are we to tear away the bony fingers of the fiend that is every moment clutching at the white throat of liberty? Through the slow but sure process of intellectual development is the only peaceful and permanent road to success. By the more general diffusion of absolute knowledge and scientific truth is the crown of victory to be placed on the Liberal brow. Once let a man become possessed of a reasonable amount of knowledge of the why's and wherefore's of the phenomena with which he is surrounded, and the superstitious creeds and doctrins of a dark and ignorant past vanish from the mind like fog before the morning sun.

Then let us see to it, and see to it now, that something is done toward shedding a ray of intellectual light upon every hearth-stone in our land. Let every Liberal be personally urged to take at least one Freethought paper and buy one Liberal book. Let Liberal tracts, lectures, papers, and books be profusely scattered in every school district in the United States. Let every Liberal assert his individuality, and work continually for universal mental liberty. A continued, tireless, and united effort is sure of success. Let us work without ceasing.

Pléase Help Elmina to Keep Her Irons Moving.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: I feel as if I must talk a little to you every week or so, just to keep you near to my heart, and to enthuse you up to a good working point. And now I wish to tell all of you who hav not plenty to do that I shall be glad for you to help me.

First in order is to get all the subscribers you can for our darling TRUTH SEEKER. One paper will do the work of an army of men, and we must help ours to do its work in all possible ways. Never destroy or lay away a copy of it. Keep them moving; lend, mail off, and circulate every one. I often make a single paper go eight ways, by taking each leaf to wrap up eight separate packages to go to eight different families, and who knows what may be the mission of those little seeds thus sown broadcast?

Second, all who possibly can should send in $5.00 promises for Bennett's trip around the world. This will pay you a big interest, and the good cause a still larger one. His "Infidel Abroad" is his most valuable contribution to Liberal literature.

The trip round the world will of necessity immensely surpass even this grand and unique volume. Hasten, then, and send in the means. If I were able I would contribute fifty dollars, and think it well given in a grand cause. The world seen through Infidel eyes will be a book that ought to sell everywhere. Even the pious will want it, out of curiosity if from no higher motiv. It will be invaluable for all our Liberal League libraries, and indeed I can hardly anticipate what it will not be or wait for it to be begun.

Third, start libraries. As S. D. Moore in a recent number of this paper says, order books, and thus you will help Bennett to funds, and your leagues, families, and selvs to the very best of good reading.

Fourth, help all the Liberal papers as far as you can, especially those in your own locality. Many are asking me which are the best papers to subscribe for. I tell them first and foremost THE TRUTH SEEKER, which I consider the broadest, fairest, and boldest of all the Freethought papers. And next on my list is our Physiologist, telling of right generation, right living, and how to make happy homes. And thirdly the good old Boston Investigator, the pioneer paper in the field of Infidel literature, and one that has breasted the storms of Christian hatred and malignity for over fifty years, and has built the first memorial hall ever raised in honor of the good and brave Thomas Paine. Then comes the unique, sharp, and spicy Seymour Times; the pure, high-toned, regenerativ Alpha, and a long list of others, each having its own special claims to our attention.

These are a few of the irons Elmina wishes her friends to help care for. Then there are our honored aged friends who paved the way for us in the times when to be a heretic was to walk the fiery furnace of hatred, persecution, wrong, and oppression. Jeremiah Hacker, who walked miles through storm and tempest to deliver free lectures to the poor and oppressed long before you and I saw the light, and while Abner Kneeland was publishing sectarian papers, made it possible for Ingersoll to speak in palatial halls to the tune of five hundred dollars a night to the rich, cultured, and favored of the land. He now livs, old, crippled, and forsaken, in his lonely home in Berlin, Camden county, New Jersey. And that other war-horse of ancient renown, D. Tuttle, the once doughty editor of the Divinity Physician, of Poplar, Crawford county, Ohio, who was another of the old pioneers who paved the way for us and owned his

> "Grottoes and fountains and orange tree groves,
> And all that enchantment has told,"

He, too, and his aged wife are needing our aid for the bare necessaries of life. He as well as Mr. Hacker became poor because he could not hoard up while he saw others needed. So for these I bespeak your occasional aid and kindly words.

With so much to do how can any of us be idle? The hours are all too short, and, strive as we may, much must be left undone. Day by day I find more and more to work for, and yet twenty-four hours never lengthen into forty-eight, and so I call upon you, my beloved friends, to join hands in the good cause and good works.

Yours hopefully and earnestly, ELMINA.

An Entirely New and Original Demonstration on Soul or Spirit, and Its Certain Materiality and Mortality.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mind without body is like shadow without substance. There are in the world two subjects too hard and too heavy for any Deistical Christian or Spiritual philosopher to solve. The Deist, Free Religionist, and Spiritualist are all sensible, good, keen, quite lively, and sharp on the great Bible religion, Christ, devil, God, and on all the gods of all the people; but on these two subjects, viz., soul and necessity, they are all nothing; they know nothing; they never did know anything; and never will know anything as long as they retain their present prejudices and organizations, and believe in Spiritualism, or possess one thought belonging to any system of religion on earth.

Not one Deist, Religionist, or Spiritualist in five hundred ever had one positiv, natural, and clear idea on soul or spirit, and but a very small number of them ever had any adequate idea of philosophical necessity.

These two subjects are only left for such men, such mighty geniuses, such intellectual giants, as Hobbes, Helvetius, D'Holbach, Hume, Collins, Shaftesbury, Voltaire, D'Alembert, Spinoza, and Cooper, of the last two centuries; and Lewes, Mills, Reade, Greg, Huxley, Tyndall, Maudsley, Ingersoll, Underwood, and some others, of the present century to solve. That is in every way splendidly satisfactory in the highest degree, historically, analogically, experimentally, physiologically, and physically probable to most of scientific men; falling short only of entire logical, scientific, and the same as mathematical demonstration of the non-existence and mortality of the human soul after death. And they, each of them, giv positiv, complete, logical, scientific, and physical demonstration of the truth of philosophical necessity. To what these greatest, wisest, and best of all men hav written about the materiality of the soul during life, and its non-existence and mortality after death, I will, ere I conclude, add the positiv, physical, and scientific demonstration of the non-entity of the soul or spirit and its mortality. And the only argument yet used against the said scientific demonstration has been given by the brother of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, Chase, and Eccles, as follows: "Man's soul or spirit thought throughout all eternity, though he was never conscious of it." (And the same kind of false allegation and argument about man's pre-existence has been alleged and used by the same kind of dreamers for the last three thousand years.) To which I answer in the words of the great and wise Locke, "That kind of thinking I did through all eternity, that I knew not of then and know nothing of now, amounts to me to just no thinking at all." Why cannot nature, so lavish in her resources, afford to annihilate souls of men (and she does every time man sleeps or dies) as she annihilates souls of insects? Would it not almost enhance her glory, consistency, and harmony to believe it?

That, dreamers and religionists, is the question, and nature has no reply. "The fearful secret of five thousand centuries has not yet found a voice. The whole evidence lies before us. We know what the greatest and wisest hav had to say, who hav written on the affirmativ of this question, in favor of and about an immortality; and we know how after eagerly devouring all their arguments, our hearts hav sunk back in cold disappointment; and to every proof as we read our lips hav replied mournfully, That will not stand." Search through tradition, history, all science, and all philosophy, the world within you and the world without, and as Hume, Voltaire, Watson, and Robertson said (except in Christ, which is no proof of anything), "there is not the shadow of a shade of proof that man survives the grave."

The young intellectual giant, as Lord Bacon termed the immortal Thomas Hobbes, said that "this subject is the kingdom of darkness." "That religion is a superstition in fashion, and superstition is a religion out of fashion." Never was there so great an utterance. The soul or spirit is the mere shade, appearance, and shadow of the body acting and moving in one or more places in space. Like sound, color, flavor, odor, and motion, or any one of the senses, a mere fleeting, perishable appurtenance or manifestation of organized matter. Therefore the immortality of the human soul, or any soul or spirit, is a positiv physical impossibility. And it may be demonstrated in this way: We will take for example two beings, A and B, who know each other. A knows that B exists. And this knowledge in A is what we call intellect, soul, or spirit, but not a real third being or entity separate from both A and B. B knows that A exists, and this knowledge in B is intellect, soul, or spirit, but not a real fourth being or entity separate from both A and B. Knowledge separate from body is like a shadow, a mere non-entity. Would you expect to resurrect a shadow or a non-entity? Would you expect either to be immortal and survive the body beyond the grave?

When a Deist, Spiritualist, or even a Materialist undertakes to determin what matter cannot do, he only proves his own destitution of knowledge in pretending or presupposing he is acquainted with most or all the properties of matter, when in reality he knows but a very limited number of them. It is maintained in the schools by the old Spiritualists that inertia is a property of matter. This is false and maintained by no scientist of this age. That matter cannot think in man. This is an error, because the brain is the organ of thought, and matter thinks in all other animals, then why not in man, a superior beast, or more properly, a more lively and intellectual animal? But the new Spiritualists say that matter can and does think in all animals, therefore they infer (and the conclusion is drawn logically) that man and all other animals hav but one and a like spiritual substance to think with, differing only in degree of intelligence.

Let us inquire into the meaning of the word thought, knowledge, spirit, or soul. What is it? Why, the answer is plain. It is simply the action of the brain, called thinking. But is there either inside or outside of the brain a real entity or actual being called thinking, knowledge, soul, or spirit, material or immaterial?

All beings are born and die, but is there a real being called birth or death? All beings digest food and circulate blood, but is there a real being called digestion or circulation? All beings liv and breathe, but is there a real being called life or breath? Dogs and other animals hav instinct, and vegetables grow, but is there a real being called instinct or growth? One body impels another, but is there a real being called power or force? Vibrations of the air cause the quality called sound, and all bodies move, but is there a real entity or actual being called sound or motion? And bodies produce sound and motion, but did you ever hear of sound and motion producing body or even sound and motion?

Thought or knowledge is always a mere mechanical product of body or matter, as all these facts demonstrate. Thought, knowledge, or soul is a bare property, relation, condition, or mode of matter or body. Now to say that this property of matter, or action of substance, or mode of body is not matter, substance, body, or a real being, nothing can be more plain. But to make of this property of matter, manner of substance, or mode of being a real entity or actual being, or even a spiritual being, nothing can be more false or preposterous. Whatever has a beginning must hav an end. Whatever has been created must be destroyed. All individuality, self-consciousness, and personal identity commenced to be, therefore they must all cease to be.

Next, I lay it down as a position that no future science or wisdom can shake or move, first, that all reason, logic, and science prove that there can be no creation of any real being or actual entity. Second, that reason and science prove that there can be no annihilation of any real being or actual entity. Third, that all consciousness, identity, and individuality had a beginning at birth, and are annihilated during sleep, then why not end at death? All through life consciousness, thought, knowledge, soul, and spirit are created and annihilated during waking and sleeping, then why not annihilated forever at death? We had no knowledge before our birth, or during sleep, then how or why hav any after death?

Then from the foregoing scientific principles this conclusion is unavoidable, that every thought or spirit or soul created at birth and annihilated during sleep, created again on waking, and all through life created at one time and annihilated at another, is not a real entity or actual being, but merely the quality of an entity or property of a being, therefore exists not forever.

These are a few and only a few of the many natural difficulties and appalling objections and demonstrations attending on ancient and modern Spiritualism and immortality. JOHN S. WALKER.

Corporations, Consolidations, and Monopolies.

It is to be regretted that however useful are the institutions among us, they tend to consolidation and monopoly. Thus from being a blessing to the people they become almost a curse. Railroads hav done great good to the country. They hav opened up and caused the settlement of remote parts of the country, placing their products within the best markets, thereby bringing into profitable tillage millions of acres that otherwise would still hav remained in wilderness or unbroken prairie. By the aid of railroads cities of large size hav been built up and states hav been made populous. By the facilities which railroads afford, our country has been practically widened, and the empire, so far as population, agriculture, and wealth are concerned, immensely enlarged.

But with these mammoth blessings, with all that said railroads hav done for our country, they hav afforded the occasion or excuse for the greed of men and corporations to aggrandize themselvs and to oppress the masses. Railroads hav built up a soulless monopoly more oppressiv to the people than would be a king or an emperor. The railroad interests hav even consolidated into a power which seriously threatens to take away the liberties of the people by overriding their legislatures, by buying franchises, by corrupting the fountain-heads of law and justice, yes, by controling our law-making bodies and corrupting our courts of justice.

So great has this evil become, so great is the magnitude which these corporations and monopolies hav reached, so powerful hav they become in the hands of designing men, that we now see that one man has the control of hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of property, and governs by his own will thousands of miles of road, built with the people's money and patronized by the people's labor and wealth.

This evil of consolidation and monopoly has reached such a fearful extent that the over fifty thousand miles of railroad in our country are under the control of three or four corporations, in fact three or four men, who not only rule with an iron will the roads and all that pertains to them, but buy up our legislatures, causing the members to vote as the railroad masters desire. They coerce as they please the election of United States senators, and in that way absolutely control the highest legislativ body in our country. It has got so that the money and the will of Vanderbilt, Jay Gould, and Tom Scott, who are the three railroad millionaires and magnates of this country, are more potent in the control of legislatures and Congress than any influence that can be brought to oppose them. When they wish legislation to further their wishes they wield the power that proves more potent than anything that can be brought to oppose them. They can do just about as they please. Their immense wealth and the tremendous power with which their consolidated railroad system invests them are fearful indeed. Well may the watchful observers of the country stand aghast when they view the immense tyranny now saddled upon the people. This consolidated railroad monopoly has become so strong that a United States senator can scarcely be elected who is not a tool of this power, or who is not well known to be susceptible to their potent influence.

Year by year this monopolized power is becoming stronger, and very soon nothing will be able to stand before it. It will not only control the entire legislation of the country, but no governor nor president can be placed in office not acceptable to it. This power of consolidation and monopoly is rapidly becoming the most alarming tyranny a people ever had to contend with, and which threatens to make the entire country subservient to it. Vanderbilt and Gould are adding from ten to twenty-five millions of dollars to their wealth every year. Hundreds of miles of railroads are annually coming into their power, and well may justly alarmed people ask where all this is going to end. What is to be the result of this rapid rush into the power of wealth and the tyranny of railroad consolidation? It is a most appaling state of things, a tyranny that has not before been known in the world.

Akin to this railroad consolidated monopoly is the consolidation of the telegraph companies. There are some three companies in the country, and they hav recently united their power to make another gigantic consolidated monopoly which must inevitably be inimical to the welfare of the people by another power not amenable to them and over which they can hav no control. While the telegraph consolidation cann become so powerful as that of the railroads, can nevertheless be most oppressiv, breaking down healthy and legitimate opposition and spreading a baleful influence over the country.

The national bank organizations and the consolidated monopoly which has grown up upon the power conceded to this privileged class are also fearful tyrannies most injurious to the interests of the masses. We hav seen this power grow year by year since its incipiency some eighteen years ago until it has become a monster of frightful mein. Its power also ramifies our legislativ halls and our courts of justice. It has brought men and money within its toils, and has become a tyranny upon the necks of the people fearful to contemplate. We hav seen it controling legislation, shaping the finances of the country, influencing panics and depression, and placing most onerous burdens upon the backs of the people. It becomes the duty of the public to check this moneyed tyranny if they would not become the veriest slaves to one of the worst forms of oppression in the world.

In the same category with other consolidations and monopolies is that of the express companies. We hav seen them consolidate their forces and unite for the express purpose of making their power more supreme and fastening their power more closely upon the people. These companies possess much utility, and hav served a good purpose among us, but they are also rapidly becoming a wealthy monopoly, which will brook no rival, which will allow no healthy competition, and which do all in their power to make the public tributary to their avarice. Every such act of consolidation of capital and power increases the monopoly and places them farther and farther from the people and makes it more and more impossible for rival establishments to compete with them. No matter how useful the business pursued, how necessary the articles manufactured and sold, the consolidation of a few large corporations or firms into one compact monopoly strong enough to break down opposition and to make the public feel the weight of their power—if it is the purchase of wheat, the making of flour, the manufacturing of clothing or shoes, it is all the same, monopolies and consolidations of several establishments into one mammoth establishment with mammoth powers for oppression is a mammoth evil of which the people ought to be aware, and ought to look upon with the keenest jealousy.

But so far has this mania for consolidation and monopoly been carried that it is seen in very many directions. Even the match-makers of the country, as the papers inform us, hav consolidated and formed a gigantic monopoly in the manufacture of this useful little article. Thus the tendency of the times is manifested. Capital seems inclined to aggregate itself and to form powerful monopolies which bode no good to the masses.

All these instances of consolidation are mere exemplifications of the irresistible conflict between capital and labor. Capital in this long contest so far has been victorious. Capital has been powerful enough to disregard and override the rights and interests of labor. This avariciousness on the part of capital will doubtless continue, making further and further aggressions, bringing greater and more onerous wrongs upon the people, until a reaction takes place and the evil cures itself. As long suffering as the people are, they will eventually tire of the yoke and will make a resolute effort to throw it off. In that day it is possible that money will not be the tyrant that rules the people; it may be shorn of some of its powers and be again reduced to the ranks and be compelled to submit to the latent power of justice and right. The money power appears now to be rushing on to its destruction with headlong speed, and will probably continue to rush on in its work of aggrandizement and grinding oppression until the sufferers will endure it no longer; when they will hav spirit enough to arise in self-defense and vigorously strike their tyrants to the earth. With the celerity with which the monopolists are now progressing in their mad career it cannot be many years before the wrong will be so far consummated that the people will arise and hurl their oppressors from their golden thrones.

Thomas Paine's Birthday.

Let it be remembered that this, the 29th day of January, is the 143d anniversary of the birthday of one of the world's noted men, a man who gave many years of his life to secure freedom to his fellow-beings struggling under the load of oppression which tyrants had placed upon their shoulders. His powerful pen aroused the energies of the American colonists one hundred and five years ago, and kindled in their hearts such an ardent love of liberty as nerved them to prosecute to a successful result one of the most momentous struggles for liberty the world has known. But for the important aid rendered by Paine in that eventful period it is unlikely that that glorious victory would hav been achieved. Truly was it said by those who well weighed the truthfulness of their words, that the pen of Paine did quite as much toward achieving American liberty as did the sword of Washington.

That great work accomplished, he returned for several years to Europe, and both in England and France his brain and his pen were almost incessantly employed in the service of his fellow-men. In England he wrote the "Rights of Man;" in France he was a deputy in the national legislature. Here he wrote the "Age of Reason," which has undoubtedly done more toward breaking down the errors of theological teachings than any work written before or since. What his "Common Sense" and his "Crisis" did to free the people of this country from the bondage of a king, the "Age of Reason" has done toward freeing the world from the mental bondage of priestcraft, superstition, and bigotry. Few men hav been more shamefully traduced than this man who dared to expose the hypocrisy of those who for centuries hav led their fellow-men astray. He showed up the falsehoods which hav cursed the world as they were never exhibited before. There hav been few greater men.

A meeting of those who delight to honor the memory of Thomas Paine will be held this evening at 8 o'clock in Science Hall, 141 Eighth street. Speeches will be made by several persons; original poems will be recited, and it is hoped an enjoyable time will be experienced by those who honor the deeds of Thomas Paine. Let there be a full attendance of the friends of the Author-Hero in the city and vicinity. While similar meetings are held in various parts of the country let us not be remiss in our duty. Admission free. Let those who see this notice be in attendance.

Death of an Old and Dear Friend.

Dr. Charles Winterburn was found dead in his bed last Sunday morning, having died of heart disease. He had not been feeling well for about a week, but was not believed to be in immediate danger. He was a man of good constitution, and enjoyed fine health. He was born in 1815, and was consequently sixty-six years of age.

He was an old and good friend of ours, our acquaintance having been intimate for twenty years. We became acquainted while living in Cincinnati and while attending the Radical lectures of Moncure D. Conway, now of London. We compared notes, exchanged views, and mutually enlightened each other. He removed to this city a few years before ourselvs, but upon our taking up our residence here our warm acquaintance was renewed and continued till his death.

He was, take him all in all, a very remarkable man. He was born and reared in England, and in early life was a mechanic, being both a carpenter and wire worker. After this he became a clergyman, and for many years was a preacher in the Methodist church. He preached in this city after removing to America. But ultimately he lost faith in the dogmas of theology, and gave up preaching, thinking it better to be an honest man than to preach what he no longer believed. He returned to his former mechanical pursuits.

While living in England he had had opportunity of frequenting one of the hospitals of the country, and learned much of the practice of surgery and the treatment of diseases. In Cincinnati he turned his attention to the study of medicin, and became proficient in all that pertains to diseases and the remedies used in their cure. He possessed a remarkable memory, never forgetting what he once had learned.

After practicing a few years in Cincinnati he returned to this city, and succeeded in building up an extensiv practice. Although he often playfully boasted of having "shoved the jack-plane," he possessed an unusual amount of medical knowledge, not one physician in a hundred being his equal in facts and ideas. He graduated in this city, and was a devotee of the homeopathic system. His efforts in this line were attended with great success.

He entirely outgrew the effects of his early theological educatiou, and was an earnest Freethinker, though he had a steadfast faith in existence beyond the grave. He often expressed himself as having no doubt of the reality of spirit life, affirming that he had received proofs strong enough to place the matter beyond a question in his mind.

He was also an ardent believer in the ancient science of astrology, if science it may be called, believing the stars and planets hav a marked influence upon the lives and fortunes of human beings, and that these influences can be calculated with scientific precision. His reputation as an astrologist became quite wide-spread, and many resorted to him to consult the aspects and portents of the stars in their various interests. It was deemed remarkable by many who visited him how he could so accurately describe their past life as well as their present condition, and from which they inferred his predictions of the future were likely to prove true. That they did thus prove, many hav borne strong testimony.

He regarded astrology as an accurate science, which requires as close study as any other science. The influence of the several planets being conceded, their position at particular times, and the ever varying power which they exert, owing to this change of position, constitutes the work and study of the astrologist. Dr. Winterburn was consulted by persons in nearly all positions in life, including physicians, lawyers, bankers, brokers, merchants, speculators, etc., and many hav spoken in the strongest terms of his remarkable ability.

In his medical practice he also made use of his astrological science. When called to see a new patient, if the case was at all serious, he learned, if possible, the time of birth of the patient, and consulted his chances of recovery from an astral standpoint, and prescribed his remedies with direct reference to the planetary positions and the patient's nativity. It is only necessary to add that his success in the treatment of disease was not surpassed by any physician in the city.

He was a very kindly, genial, tender-hearted man; an excellent companion, and trusty friend. He was very generous to those in impecunious circumstances, and in his medical practice gave away many thousands of dollars to those unable to pay. We, in common with the great numbers who knew him, will deeply feel that we hav lost a true friend, who cannot easily be replaced, and that his equal in all respects will not soon again be seen in the world.

Spies and Informers.

It is gratifying that at least a portion of the community are becoming able to see the true character of spies, inveiglers, and informers, and that the liberties of the people should not be at the mercy and disposal of that detestable class of persons. Assemblyman Murphy of our state Legislature has made a direct hit at the great wrong which for some years has been practiced upon the victims of these spies and informers by introducing a bill to prevent the evidence of the principal spies of the societies for the suppression of vice and crime from sending any person to prison. Like a certain judge in the West, who expressly said that the oath of a professional spy and detectiv should not be used in his court to deprive a person of his liberty, and that it was unworthy of belief, Assemblyman Murphy thinks it is about time some protection should be afforded to the victims of this class of men. These victims, in numerous cases, hav been prosecuted and hav been sent to prison, ruining their reputation for life. The proposed bill is as follows:

"An act in respect to the testimony or the offering of testimony of certain persons who serve as agents, informers, or spies.

"Sec. 1. In all the courts of this state whenever it shall appear on the trial of a person charged with having violated a penal statute that he was assisted in the alleged violation, or induced or inveigled to violate such penal statute by some person acting or claiming to act in the capacity of agent, informer, or spy for any society or association, or for any individual who is not a prosecuting officer under the laws of this state, the testimony of such person so acting or claiming to act as agent, informer, or spy, and also that of every other person acting in conjunction with him, shall not be received in evidence."

If this bill passes it will put an end to the class of prosecutions instituted by such men as Comstock and Whitney of Colgate's and Crosby's societies, and they will no longer hav it in their power to send to an ignominious prison, to deprivation and disgrace, people far better than themselvs. Many an unfortunate person has been imprisoned and ruined for life by the unsupported testimony of these intriguers, spies, and informers, who set themselvs at work to put up a case against the victims of their malice, and it is high time this injustice was stopped. A writer in Albany to one of our dailies uses the following language:

"There hav sprung up within a few years certain chartered organizations or societies which make a specialty of prosecuting the infraction of some particular law. Their system of employing detectivs or spies is often hateful, especially to an American citizen. The average man is predisposed to obey the law. A bad or useless law which infringes on his personal rights, when offensivly enforced by intermeddling persons, his sense of being a freeman pushes him either to evasion or resistance. The temperance fanatics and the Comstock and Crosby specialists each hav their hired spies employed to entrap unsuspecting persons into the violation of one of their pet laws. A statute which will exclude the testimony of informers of the class spoken of, when offered in our courts, would be an advance in the rules of evidence every way in harmony with the principles of American republicanism."

It is to be hoped the Legislature will hav the good sense and justice to pass the bill.

We ask the pardon of our numerous friends for the delay we hav been compelled to exercise in answering letters and in filling orders. The details of office work hav been rather heavy of late, and our force being weak we hav not been able to attend to our friends as promptly as we could desire. We trust the delay will be of short continuance.

A Liberal Present of a Lot in Liberal.

The following kind letter has been received from Bro. and Sister Walser:

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: We hav laid out the town of Liberal for the benefit of Liberals, where they can congregate in a good country, build homes, and feast on the fulness of mental liberty, untrammeled by the jealousy of the green-eyed church. And we know of no better way to serve them than by donating one of the lots to aid you in making your trip around the world, the account of which as will be given by your pen will do more good in giving the people a true insight into the manners, customs, and religions of other nations than a like trip by any other citizen of our country. For that purpose, and as a slight token of esteem which we entertain for you as an exponent of Freethought, we beg you to accept of the inclosed deed duly executed and recorded for an eligible lot, situated on a beautiful street, one hundred feet wide, in the town of Liberal, Barton county, Mo.

We hope our Liberal friends will contribute to its further value by fencing and ornamenting it with trees and shrubs.

With the best wishes for your happiness and success, we remain your friends, G. H. Walser.
Harriet P. Walser.

WARRANTY DEED.

This Identure, made on the tenth day of January, A.D., one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one, by and between G. H. Walser and Harriet P. Walser, his wife, of Barton, parties of the first part, and D. M. Bennett, of the city of New York, in the state of New York, party of the second part;

Witnesseth: That the said parties of the first part, in consideration of the esteem we entertain for him as a reformer and defender of true mental liberty, and one dollar to us paid by the said party of the second part, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, do, by the presents, grant, bargain, and sell, convey and confirm, unto the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, the following described lots, tracts, or parcels of land, lying, being, and situate in the county of Barton, and state of Missouri, to wit: All lot No. three (3), in block No. seven (7) in Liberal.

To hav and to hold the premises aforesaid, with all and singular the rights, privileges, appurtenances, and immunities thereto belonging, or in anywise appertaining, unto the said party of the second part, and unto his heirs and assigns, forever; the said G. H. Walser hereby covenanting that he is lawfully seized of an indefeasible estate in fee in the premises herein conveyed; that he has good right to convey the same; that the said premises are free and clear of any incumbrances done or suffered by him or those under whom he claims; and that he will warrant and defend the title to the said premises unto the said party of the second part, and unto his heirs and assigns forever, against the lawful claims and demands of all persons whomsoever.

In witness thereof, the said parties of the first part, hav hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written. G. H. Walser,
Harriet P. Walser.

We return our most sincere thanks to our generous brother and sister, and as a part appreciation of their kind gift, we will send them an assortment of our publications to present to the public library of the town of Liberal. We trust the town will grow apace and become noted for its numbers, prosperity, and happiness. This hope does not spring from the fact that we now hav a lot in the town, but because we wish well to everything pertaining to the welfare of Liberalism.

That our readers may know something more of this interesting town in which we now own a lot, we herewith transfer from the columns of the Liberal of the 13th inst. what brother Walser says of it:

"Liberal is growing every day, and mind this remark, in five years we will hav a city of several thousand people, and what is better, all Liberal at that.

"Our offside friends hav many predictions about our success. Many of them gave us six months from the time we struck the key note of Liberalism in Barton county, to sink forever into oblivion with our Liberal coadjutors. Two years hav about rolled around and we are still here. When we spoke about our colonial enterprise they sang, 'Castles in the air,' and indeed it has proved to be so from the appearance of the new houses already up and going up in Liberal. Now they console themselvs by saying that we will soon lose our identity as a Liberal community, that orthodoxy will supplant us. That is in the future, but we will beg leave to say that we hav made many converts from Christianity to Liberalism, but we hav yet to learn of one conversion from Liberalism to Christianity. We are gathering around us a class of the best people in the whole land, and to say that they can be converted to the dogmas of the Bible is a slander on intelligence.

"Our highest ambition is to get up at Liberal a good institution of learning, where our young can be taught the true elements of knowledge without the trammels of sectarianism in any of its forms; and we know that our efforts in that direction will meet with the hearty support of Liberals all over the land."

Scientific Curativ.

The attention of our readers is called to the advertisments of Wm. C. Wilson on pages 78 and 79 in reference to the cure of diseases by magnetic belts, corsets, and appliances. From the most reliable information we are convinced that these appliances possess remarkable virtue, and that without the use of a particle of medicin the most astonishing cures are being performed. Paralysis, loss of nervous energy, rheumatism, and stiffened joints seem to yield to this gentle influence. Many of the cures performed, of which we hav the strongest proof, are indeed remarkable.

The cure is in this wise: In the belts and corsets are numerous small magnetic pieces of rolled steel and brass riveted together and quilted in the goods. The effluvia of the body acting upon the metal plates generates a gentle but steady current of magnetism. This, imparted to the system, supplies the loss of that most essential fluid, the absence of which is very often the cause of disease. The cures performed are in direct conformity to the laws of nature, and are not based on charlatanism or fraud. The thing is well worthy of investigation.

The Elements of Social Science.

The following is the continuation of the opinions of the European press with regard to this excellent work:

"This is one of those books of which little is spoken, but which nevertheless are wont to produce a quiet, lasting effect, while finding their readers at length in this way that under the influence of peculiar circumstances one person confidentially tells another that in such and such a work there is something to be found. . . . The author is, as a natural inquirer, what one must, perhaps, still call a Materialist and a Darwinian. As a political economist—and he is by no means an insignificant political economist—he belongs to the left wing of the free trade school, to which, in spite of some differences of opinion, he lends on the whole a great impulse, anticipating with confidence its ultimate and complete victory throughout the whole cultured world." —Vierteljahrsschrift fur Volkswirthschaft und Culturgeschichte.

"One must first accustom himself to the openness with which the author treats his themes. But the work is unquestionably most instructiv and interesting, and is written with great knowledge of the subject."—Hessische Morgenzeitung, December 24, 1871.

"No one who has turned his thoughts to the solution of the most burning of all questions of the day, the social question, and who wishes to devote to it his mental and practical energies, will be able to leave unread this book, whose anonymous author, basing himself on the Malthusian essay 'On the Principle of Population,' deduces from it with keen logic a peculiar and most striking theory on the cure of the three primary social evils—poverty, prostitution, and celibacy. . . . Whatever may be said against this fearless laying bare of the most intimate relations of social life and against his whole theory, purely and undisguisedly Materialistic as it is, even the opponent of the daring Socialist will be unable to deny him the merit of scientific closeness of reasoning, and, what is quite as important, of warm and zealous philantropy; he will rather honor the moral courage and mental energy which the author must hav had to work his way out of the bewildering maze of hitherto unsolved problems and conflicts to a conviction so logically consistent, so luminous, and yet so opposed to established institutions and to the moral sentiments in which men hav been brought up."—Konigsberger Hartungsche Zeitung, December 4, 1871.

The North Ameriean Review for February is the literary phenomenon of the month. First we hav an earnest and patriotic article by Gen. Grant, advocating the Nicaragua canal project. The genial "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," Oliver Wendell Holmes, follows with an essay entitled "The Pulpit and the Pew," written in the best spirit of the Christian philosopher, in which he endeavors to show the need that he believes to exist for a revision of the prevalent theological creeds. Under the quaint title of "Aaron's Rod in Politics," Judge A. W. Tourgee emphasizes the obligation imposed upon the Republican party by the Chicago platform, of making provision for educating illiterate voters. James Freeman Clarke makes a valuable contribution to the discussion of the authorship of Shakspere's plays. The grave evils that may result from the partisan character of the United States Supreme Court are pointed out by Senator John T. Morgan. The sixth of Mr. Charney's papers on the "Ruins of Central America" is devoted to a description of the Pyramids of Comalcalco, which must rank among the most stupendous monuments ever erected by man. Finally, Walt Whitman writes of "The Poetry of the Future." The Review is sold by booksellers generally.

Miscellaneous.

Prof. Henry Appleton at the Liberal Club.

Friday evening, the 14th, the subject of the lecture announced by the Vice-President was, "Ireland as Discussed by a Nativ Irishman." Mr. Appleton was introduced to the audience by the Vice-President, Thaddeus B. Wakeman.

Ireland, said the lecturer, is a country rich in land and in minerals, whose mines hav as yet not been worked, nor hav her people been given an opportunity, without restraint, to work the soil. Independence in any such degree as is enjoyed in this country has never been enjoyed by the people of Ireland. Land is owned by the few, some being possessors of as many as 170,000 acres, and many individuals or estates owning from 15,000 to 100,000 acres of land; so that, by unquestionable statistics, 750 people own four-fifths of the soil.

British brutality has made Ireland what she is. The soil of a country belongs to the people of the country by right; but the soil of Ireland belongs to England, and the tillers of the soil and natives of the land hav become tenants. The Green Isle was confiscated twice in one century, and was acquired by England by fraud and conquest, and the nation held at the point of the bayonet ever since.

Gladstone, as well as every statesman in Great Britain, has agitated in Parliament the subject of the land question in Ireland, but the subject of individual ownership in the soil has never been approached. Individual ownership of the soil is the negation in liberty, and where individual ownership does not exist slavery will exist.

Upon the conclusion of the lecture the discussion was opened by Professor Langerfeldt, who attacked the lecture in all its most vulnerable points. The fact of Professor Langerfeldt being a German, and the subject of Ireland lectured upon by an Irishman who had his heart there, accounted for the bitterness of his speech.

The nativ of Deutschland was followed by Mr. Henry George of California, who declared that the internal troubles of Ireland would never be corrected until it was torn up root and branch, reformed and reconstructed.

Vice-President Stephen Pearl Andrews discussed the lecture in a liberal manner, as became a vice-president of the Liberal Club, but permeated his speech with socialism, collectivness, individuality, materiality, and the positiv socialistic theory, declaring himself unqualifiedly a socialist and an individualist.

Dr. Gunn followed in a most elaborate speech. Mrs. Dunleavy then presented the library of the Club a valuable work upon the Irish question in a motherly speech. Mr. King was then announced, and said that since Stephen Pearl Andrews took hold of this world people hav found out that there are more problems in it than were ever dreamed of before.

The walls of the audience room were freely decorated with banners bearing the inscriptions, "The Nation the Banker of the People," "No More Bonds," "Justice to Labor," "A Vote for Principle is Never Lost," and "No Land Monopoly," and whenever the question of labor and its reward was touched upon in the liberal manner of the members of the Liberal Club the sympathy and applause of the audience was with the speaker in proportion to his liberality of expression.

Christianity in the United States.

IS IT DYING OUT?—FIGURES THAT SHOULD SET THE PREACHERS THINKING.

I hav collected here a few statistics bearing on the great question lately raised in your columns, whether Christianity is declining in America. They are fuller than any I hav seen yet, and all from good Christian authority—especially from an article in the Princeton Review for September, 1879, entitled "Progress of Christianity in the United States," by Dr. Philip Schaff.

In 1850 the United States contained 38,061 churches, valued at $87,328,801, and estimated to hold 1,234,825 people. In 1860 they contained 54,009 churches, worth $171,397,932, and holding 19,128,751 people. In 1870 the number was 63,082, valuation $354,483,581, capacity 21,665,062. So that the increase in the number of churches from 1850 to 1860 was more than from 1860 to 1870 by 6,875. During the same period the increase in capacity fell off 2,357,615. But the value of church property increased $99,016,510 more between 1860 and 1870 than between 1850 and 1860. Between 1860 and 1870 the increase of churches fell off more than 43 per cent, the increase in capacity fell off nearly 48 per cent, but the increase in values gained 117 per cent! The absolute gain in the number of churches during the first decade was more than 41 per cent, and during the second less than 16 per cent; that of capacity was over 34 per cent during the first decade, and under 14 during the second. But valuation increased 99 per cent during the first decade, and 107 during the second! The increase of population from 1850 to 1860 was 36 per cent less than the increase in the number of churches, but more than the increase in their capacity. From 1860 to 1870 it was 22 per cent—much more than the increase of the churches in either numbers or capacity. In 1850 the churches could seat 61 per cent of the people, in 1860 they could seat 60 per cent, in 1870 only 56 per cent.

How it is in 1880 probably no one knows yet. In my own town, a steadily but not rapidly growing western city of 10,000 inhabitants (by this year's census), there are twelve churches, viz., three Norwegian Lutheran, one German Lutheran, two Catholic, two Methodist, one Baptist, one Presbyterian, one Congregational, and one Episcopal. They certainly could not seat four thousand people, or forty per cent of the population.

Dr. Schaff states that in 1776 the number of churches in America was 2,972, while in 1876 it was 88,867. To suppose these figures correct is supposing a great deal, for those of 1776 are only given as rough estimates, and those of 1876 abound in such round numbers as "Methodist, 40,000." Such as they are, however, they show a centennial increase of numbers (not capacity) greatly exceeding the increase of population. The falling off since 1860 is therefore a new phenomenon. This becomes especially significant when we remember that during this recent period the relativ increase of population has been growing less, and that the decade from 1860 to 1870 was in the North a period of great activity, while in the South it witnessed the abolition of slavery and pretty much all the mission work that has been done among the negroes since. I hav tried to get the statistics of membership in the different churches, but with the exception of the Presbyterian I find them too shaky.

The following are the estimates of communicant membership presented by the various churches in 1878:

Moravians	9,407
Baptists	2,656,221
Congregationalists	375,624
Presbyterians	897,598
Episcopalians	314,367
Quakers	70,000
Lutherans	808,828
Methodists	3,428,050
Reformed Episcopalians	7,000
Reformed Dutch	79,000
Reformed German	124,596
Roman Catholics (this includes all Catholics)	6,375,630
Adventists	10,000
Swedenborgians	5,000
Universalists (organized)	37,965
Total	15,129,286

Dr. Schaff tells us that the number of communicants in New York city in 1878 was 80,000, or about one in eight of the adults. Assuming this proportion throughout the country, the actual number of communicants would hav been 5,501,000. But according to the table of claims given above, one person in every three throughout America, taking in men, women, and children, negroes, Chinese, and "Indians not taxed," must be a regular communicant! Such ridiculous figures are not worth comparing. They teach, however, one moral—that ecclesiastical estimates are not likely to be too small.

The candid and careful Presbyterians confess that they hav lost ground in the alarming ratio which the Sun lately published. Their increase (without mentioning deaths which are not reported) from 1878 to 1880 was only about 3.6 per cent, or 18 per cent in ten years. But, of course, they must hav lost a great many members by death in ten years; certainly enough, one would think, to reduce the increase to a much lower percentage than that of either numbers or capacity of churches built between 1860 and 1870.

So that the only trustworthy church statistics obtainable converge on the conclusion that Christianity is declining in an increasing ratio. If the capacity of the churches continues to fall off in the same absolute ratio as between 1860 and 1870, it has come down in the decade just out to 5.7 per cent; but if in the same ratio to the increase of population, there should be a positiv loss of about 20 per cent, which, at the same rate, would soon extinguish the dominant religion.

Incredible as such conclusions may appear, the data are far from the most unfavorable possible. They say nothing of the increase within the churches of Universalism, neology, and general skepticism; nothing of the secession of whole congregations, under the ablest preachers of the times, from everything which has ever passed for Christianity; nothing of the increase of new religions bitterly opposed to Christianity—of Spiritualism, for instance, or Mormonism; nothing of the growth of organized Infidelity, from nought in 1870, to two hundred united Liberal Leagues, besides seceding bodies in 1880; nothing of the mortgaged and insolvent condition of most churches; nothing of the number which hav actually been abandoned, sold under the hammer, and turned into theaters, factories, and even (in California) into Buddhist temples; nothing of the thousand times repeated confession that Christianity cannot hold its own against Buddhism and Mormonism in America; but that both these gross systems of superstition are gaining ground from it. Two things, however, they do show: That the only reliable statistics prove Christianity to hav lost much ground, and that the chief reason more like them are not attainable lies in the fathomless capacity for falsehood exhibited by the compilers of church figures. I asked a minister who has assisted me to the above statistics why exact and reliable figures were so seldom to be had, and received the significant reply, "The churches are afraid to publish them." No wonder. C. L. JAMES.

On Aids to Hearing.

Until within a few years the old-fashioned ear trumpet was the sole reliance of deaf persons as an aid to hearing, but since the invention of the telephone much more attention has been given to the subject of sound, its production, and distribution. Especially after the public announcement of the misnamed microphone and its ability to enable a person to hear a fly walk at a distance of a mile or more, was the attention directed to devices for the benefit of deaf persons, and there at once arose a crop of various species of phones, such as the audiphone, the dentiphone, and so forth.

They hav one and all failed in their purpose, being quite inefficient compared with the ear trumpet. The reasons for the failures will be plain to one who considers what the physical conditions must necessarily be.

Whenever a sound is produced in free air, the latter immediately diffuses it in every direction, the sound wave assuming a spherical form and traveling outward with a velocity generally upward of eleven hundred feet in a second.

Now the strength of the sound, or in other words its energy, is proportional to the square of the amplitude of vibration, and as diffusion goes on, the energy is proportionally spread, so that at double distance the intensity is but one-fourth the original intensity. Secondly, whenever a sound wave strikes upon any surface whatever it is reflected in part in an echo and in part is absorbed; that is, the body presenting the surface is itself made to vibrate, and generally the loss by reflection is as much as one-half of the energy.

Now, what is specially wanted is to bring the vibrations with their utmost energy into the ear so as to shake the appropriate bones there. In a normal ear there is energy enough in the small part of the spherical sound wave that reaches the membrana tympani to make hearing easy; but if for some such reason as a thickened membrane more energy is required to make it vibrate properly, the way to do it is either to bring the source of the sound nearer to the ear, so that it shall receive the largest possible part of the spherical wave, which will be when the source of sound, say the mouth, is immediately at the conch of the ear—nothing will likely surpass that for intensity—or else, by some special device, prevent the sound from spreading in the air, and directing the wave with all its intensity into the ear, as though the mouth were at the ear.

In the light of these principles how is it with the audiphone? A more or less elastic surface is held by its edges between the teeth and hand, and some tension given to it by curvature. Of sound vibrations made in its neighborhood it receives its proportionate part of the spherical wave, of which certainly half will be reflected, another part will be received by the hand and lost, while the remainder will be distributed, first to the teeth, and from them to the whole skeleton, the ear getting but a small part. Still, as the ear, even a defectiv one, is a marvelously sensitiv organ, there may be energy enough in the vibrations that are made in this abnormal and roundabout way to enable one to hear what is said.

Any device for getting sound vibrations to the ear by the way of the bones must necessarily hav these diffusiv defects. None of them can bring to the ear the sound vibrations with their maximum amplitude. The ear trumpet comes nearer to the necessary conditions than anything that can be proposed; for, first, if the bell be spoken into there is no appreciable loss by reflection nor from scattering, that is, the spherical wave is not formed as it is in free air; and, second, the tube opens near to the membrana tympani, and the whole energy of the sound is spent on that.

If, however, the passage to the tympanic membrane be nearly or quite closed by the thickening of the mucus membrane, then the ear trumpet will be nearly or quite useless, as it would also be in the case of a tympanic membrane that was either too thick to respond or too flabby. In the former case nothing would be heard, and in the latter articulation would be very defectiv; but in general, when these abnormal conditions are not present and one cannot hear with an ear trumpet, other devices will be of no service, for the trouble is with the auditory nerve, and the judgment of a skilful aurist should be obtained in any case. When the nerve is unimpared and the passage to the tympanic membrane is closed, it is possible for one to get some help from some form of the dentiphone; but for the reason already given one must hope but for small service from any of them. In most cases of deafness the ear trumpet is much the most efficient.

Many persons, however, are only slightly deaf, who need some aid, to whom an ear trumpet would be highly objectionable, and who would be glad of some substitute. For such persons it is well to know that the common string telephone answers well.

Theoretically it fulfils the conditions. The transmitter prevents the formation of the spherical wave to any extent, the string prevents the scattering, while the receiver fits close to the ear, and it may hav an appropriate tube to enter the tympanum, in which case there is really but a very little loss. The common ones of the market costing but ten cents a pair answer every purpose. The thread need not be but two or three feet long, and the whole may be carried in the pocket. I hav personally experimented with these upon deaf persons, and am assured by them that they are much helped by their use. One may talk with such a deaf person with ordinary loudness and be easily understood, when, without it, what is said must be said so loud as to be heard in distant parts of the house. A year or two ago I tried to induce a manufacturer in Boston to make for the market some of these instruments specially adapted to the wants of deaf persons, but the reply was that if made so small they could ask but a small price for them, and the demand was not enough to make it a profitable investment; but larger ones (for a show of cost) were made for business purposes, and five dollars a pair was asked. But, as said before, cheap ones are just as efficient and much more portable.

Old Jupiter.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

What will the weather be? The best answer to this question may be found in Prof. J. H. Tice's "Weather Forecasts, or American Almanac." These weather predictions are based upon astronomical facts and are as positiv and certain as the revolution of planets, and can be calculated with as much accuracy. It is one of the most important facts in nature, and Prof. Tice is the discoverer. How valuable to farmers, especially during harvest and haying. The weather is calculated for every day in the year. Millions of dollars may be saved annually by a foreknowledge of the weather. Superintendents of lines of ocean steamers, of steamboats, of state and county fairs, etc., can prevent immense loss, vexation, and labor by predetermining the times of heavy storms, tornadoes, cyclones, etc. This is not mere hypothesis, but stubborn fact, and throws a flood of light upon many of the unknown and mysterious operations of nature.

I hav tested these forecasts for the last three years and declare them wonderfully accurate. They are calculated for the latitude of the United States. This knowledge can be easily and cheaply acquired. The basic laws are these: The solar system is a group of electric bodies having the sun for its center and fountain of electric force or electric waves. Every planet receives a special charge of this force or energy, at 80°, 170°, 260°, and 350° heliocentric longitude in obedience to an electric law,-viz., "If one member of an electric group receive a change every other member is similarly and simultaneously affected." Vulcan, the recently-discovered planet, nearest to the sun, Mercury next, Venus next, earth next, are the ones that giv us our frequent atmospheric changes, storms, etc., and they are always proportionate to the number and magnitude of the planets that reach these storm points on the same day. Old Jupiter being 1,500 times larger than the earth, when he comes around, once in about twelve years, and at each storm point in little less than three years, he throws off such tremendous broadsides that other and inferior planets fairly dance in their orbits. He is strongly affecting our earth and atmosphere now, and is 46,-000,000 miles nearer the sun than ordinarily.

Pike's Peak and Mt. Walker hav recently burst forth in volcanic flames, and "Old Vesuve," in Italy, is well stirred up, and tremendous storms, floods, etc., in various parts of the world denote his intense electric energy.

Let me ask every person who may see this imperfect sketch to send twenty cents to Prof. J. H. Tice & Co., 520 Pine street, St. Louis, Mo., and get his Almanac. It will throw new light upon every Truth Seeker scientist and lover of nature's stupendous operations. Most respectfully,

D. Higbee, M.D.

Burton, Mich., Jan. 8, 1881.

The leading religious a d fashionable society of Cairo has been much di turbed by an atrocious series of crimes just brou ht to light. There was a certain sheik, much estee ed by the aristocracy of the Egyptian capital for i is sanctity as well as for general wisdom and his edical skill. Whenever any one of the ladies mov ng in the highest society was out of sorts, mentally r physically, it was usual to hav recourse to this per on, as a species of cross between a father confesso and a medical adviser. The holy man was skilledi the courses of the stars, and was renowned for the efficacy of his prayers. Not only did the ladies of Cairo seek his good offices, but from the neighboring towns and suburbs thousands used to flock to him for advice. It now comes out that he was in the habit of murdering a large percentage of his visitors. The effect which this discovery had upon society can be imagined. It appears that the wife of a high Egyptian official visited the saint and did not return. The husband became alarmed, and made the authorities search the house of the saint. The good man was found upon his small strip of carpet deep in his devotions, and rocking himself backward and forward upon his knees. The officials did not dare to disturb him, but as soon as he had finished he was asked whither his fair penitent had gone. At first he denied all knowledge of her whereabouts. But the officers insisted upon searching the house, and soon discovered her clothes. Further search brought her jewels to light, and in the garden was found a well filled with corpses; uppermost floated that of the latest victim. The murder being thus brought home, the sheik confessed a series of crimes which, for cool wickedness, exceeds almost anything on record. He was in the habit of calmly taking stock of the jewelry which each of his visitors wore, and then, when he found that the amount was worth while, of choking them with a scarf, and concealing their bodies in the well in his garden. The explanation of the possibility of carrying on such a nefarious trade is quite curious. In most instances the husbands of the missing women took it for granted that they had eloped with some favored lover, and never thought of accusing the holy man.

The Higher Education for Women in France.

The discussion in the French legislature of the bill to promote the higher education of women offers many significant signs of the ferment that is working in French society. The bill was introduced in the Chambers by M. Camille See and in the Senate by M. Henri Martin. Its object is to afford girls every advantage which the government high schools giv to boys, and to strengthen the national unity by withdrawing the girlhood of France from ultramontanist direction. It aims to democratize instruction so as to bring it within the reach of girls who hav often to liv by handicrafts. The curriculum is carefully elaborated, and not overcharged. The course laid down embraces twelve heads, viz., moral instruction, French and at least one other modern tongue, ancient and modern literature, geography, national history, and a glimpse at universal history, mathematics, physical and natural sciences, hygienics, domestic economy, needlework, notions in droit usuel, or every-day life law, drawing and modeling, music, and gymnastics. Religious instruction is to be given, if the parents wish, in the lecture-room of the Lyceum, by the ministers of their respectiv cults authorized to teach by the minister of public instruction, but who are in no case to be resident in the school. The bill also makes provision for a large number of scholarships to be won at open examinations. This is done to stimulate the girls in the primary schools. The author of the bill is a member of a Jewish family which has never been engaged in finance, but has long been in the van of scientific, social, and industrial progress, and he is the son-in-law and nephew of the illustrious Dr. Germain. The bill was opposed at great length, with some ability, by M. Desbassys de Richemont. He was attentivly listened to, but here and there the Left gave marks of dissent, which were loudest when he stated that the advocates of the measure insulted Frenchwomen in declaring them behind the Americans and Swiss, and even less well-instructed than the Turkish and Japanese girls. M. de Richemont feared that if the science of the high schools killed Christianity, there would be, as in Russia, a mob of well-instructed, discontented, feminin paupers, disabled, by being kept too long in lecture rooms, from working at trades, and ready to join hands with the Nihilists. M. Ferrouillat, the senator for Lyons and a Protestant, warmly defended the bill, which would sweep away the disabilities under which theologians had placed women. He gave the author of the bill his heartiest co-operation—firstly, because he wished the nation to be united in heart and intellect; secondly, because he wished to cut at the root of conjugal discord which the unequal education of the sexes was engendering; and, thirdly, because the state, in justice, ought to do as much for girls as for boys.

M. Ferrouillat thought the great remedy for matrimonial broils would be the establishment of equal rights to intellectual light. He maintained that girls had as fine minds as boys, but that they had, owing to theological prejudice, been kept down. By granting justice to them, they would be rendered apt to hereafter associate themselvs with the thoughts, sentiments, pursuits, and moral and intellectual aspirations of their husbands. The bill was not merely to benefit the daughters of the bourgeois but the daughters of that democracy which the republic is bound to arm and prepare for the duties and difficulties of life. The children of that democracy, boys and girls, should be flooded with scientific truth, and serious, practical, positiv knowledge. He thought nothing could be more liberal than the provisions of the bill for religious instruction.

M. Henri Martin defended the principles of the bill, clause by clause, and was aided by M. Jules Ferry, who mounted the tribune several times. M. Gavardie opposed the schools, arguing that neither Joan of Arc nor Joan Hachet graduated in such objectionable places, which under the domination of municipal councils would be nests of Infidelity. M. Chesnelong, when the curriculum was under deliberation, proposed to substitute religious for moral instruction. If, he said, God was banished from the program of studies, the collegiate young ladies would grow up Materialists and Atheists. The noblest work of Christianity was the Christian woman. M. Jules Simon proposed the entire suppression of the paragraph relating to moral instruction, which M. Batbie said could not be independent of religion; but they were beaten. The bill passed its first reading in the Senate by a majority of eleven votes. On the whole, we may reflect with a certain amount of patriotic pride that the opponents of women's education talk even greater nonsense on the other side of the ocean than they do here.

The Terrors of that Dreadful Hell.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

"There is a dreadful hell,
And everlasting pains,
Where sinners must with devils dwell
In darkness, fire, and chains."

The foregoing is one of the little verses which my Presbyterian mother (long since laid in the grave) taught me as soon as my infant tongue could lisp imperfectly those impressiv words. All through the period of my childhood days, through buoyant youth and mature manhood, even down to hoary age, the terrors of that "dreadful hell" hav hung over the pathway of life, often embittering my entire existence. How dreadful to my young imagination was the thought that there was a possibility of my being doomed to spend a long and never-ending eternity in such a pit of remediless woe tormented in fire and brimstone forever and forever with the fell fiends of perdition.

To escape that dreadful place was the first thought, the first purpose, and the all-controling object of my life for more than forty years. The terrors of that dreadful hell so overwhelmed me that every other object in life was secondary, or of no account in comparison with the effort put forth to escape that miserable place. The Creator was always represented to me as being holy, just, and good; and yet so tyrannical that I could not persuade myself of the possibility of gaining heaven by striving to be good and to liv right. A vast, deep pit, miles in circumference and miles in depth, ever yawned before me, the bottom of which was covered with rolling billows of liquid fire and brimstone, in which wicked boys and girls and naughty thieves and murderers were cast alive; and their terrible wail was always ascending up to the surface of the earth, "Lost forever! Lost forever!"

Oh, is it not a burning shame that intelligent people in this nineteenth century should teach their children such damaging falsehoods? And then, if the youngsters refuse to believe the incredible representation they must be denounced as Infidels. Ten thousand thanks to high heaven that within a few years past I hav broken off that hellish yoke of sacerdotal oppression and am now soaring in the broad fields of truth and investigation, where the terrors of that dreadful hell giv me no concern. I hav been priest-ridden during a large portion of my life, but for a few years past I hav seen things in their proper light. The terrors of an endless hell no longer make me afraid, for the reason that there is no such place and never was. The creed of the church is founded on palpable falsehoods. I feel within no promptings to gain that heaven of joy and love which my good mother represented to me as reserved beyond the sky for holy children after death, for there is no such place in all the broad realm of the Creator.

The controling purpose of my life now is to do right, to deal honestly and humanely with my neighbors, to exercise myself as a good and estimable citizen, and to take care of myself first and extend aid to the needy and destitute afterward. Since I broke off that miserable yoke of a deceitful priesthood and hav exercised myself to take a truthful, a philosophical, a correct, and scientific view of mortal life, I hav taken more satisfaction and real comfort than I experienced during all the fifty years of my existence.

Another Debate.

Arrangements are being made by the Liberals and Christians of Independence, Kansas, for a joint discussion between O. A. Phelps and the Rev. C. W. Pool, to be held some time in March. A deep interest is being manifested. Mr. Pool is said to be an able defender of the Bible, and the Liberals are looking forward to the debate with great hope that it will advance the cause of mental freedom.

Letters from Friends.

DOVER, ARK, Jan. 12, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: I am also in for $5.00 for the trip round the world. The money is ready at any time.

Yours truly, E. M. JENNINGS, M.D.

DOVER, ARK., Jan. 12, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I wish to invest $5.00 in your proposed trip around the world. I will send the money as soon as it is decided that you will go.

Respectfully, H. L. BAILEY.

HARLEM, N. Y., Jan., 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am glad to know that I am not the only one who on reading your very interesting letters from Europe wished you to go, like Grant, around the world. Yet I did not for one moment think such an event would ever be consummated, but on opening my TRUTH SEEKER, I am fairly dazed with the flood of requests, each subscribing $5.00 for that purpose. Please put me down for another $5, to be paid when called for.

I trust your wife will pardon us all for our selfishness in not expressing our sympathy for her and asking her to make the sacrifice for our benefit. I wish she could accompany you. Yours,

E. BELL WHITNEY.

JAMESPORT, Mo., Dec. 13, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: To say that it was a great pleasure to read your letters from Europe searcely expresses my ideas, for I could almost imagin that I was traveling with you while reading them. I see in your issue of January 1st many encouraging letters for the round the world trip. Now, that has the ring of pure metal. I say let us hear from the heathen through an Infidel. We hav had missionary lies peddled to us long enough; let us now hear some Infidel truths. So count me $5.00 on the Round the World Fund on the terms you offer. Yours hopefully,

W. D. SHULER.

FRANKLIN, IND., Jan. 16, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: I see by the paper of last week that your expenses to Brussels were not paid by three hundred dollars. I think that is a shame. Inclosed find another dollar to be applied on my part of the debt. If there are not three hundred more Liberals that will respond to that amount, I shall hav to conclude that our party is not made up of as good materials as I had thought it was.

If you conclude to go around the world, put me down for $2.00. Yours for liberty, L. R. WEBB.

NEW HAVEN, CONN., Jan. 13, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find $5.00 advance payment for my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I hav been exceedingly interested in your travels in Europe, and if you conclude to circumnavigate the globe count me in for another $5 for that purpose.

Yours most faithfully, L. F. JOHNSON.

OGDEN, UTAH, Jan. 12, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: I received the two copies of No. 1 of your paper for 1881, which is all that can be expected, indeed all that can be borne by the dimmed eyes of the dupes of theological deception, blinded by the ignorance and superstition of priestcraft. Glorious thought! The growing light of truth is by degrees piercing the dark shadows of past ignorance. As THE TRUTH SEEKER is gaining admission into the chambers of reason, when it has been long standing on the outside and persistently knocking at the door, may its light continue to shine and increase in brightness till the fogs of superstition are cleared away, and all the dark deceptions of theology are laid bare and open to the light of reason.

I want the Hindoo Bible, if it can be got without paying extra price or giving you extra trouble.

You may put me down for five dollars for a record of further travels. The chief trouble is we cannot well spare you from your post as chief guardian of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Will send you money for late books shortly.

With highest regards and best wishes for undisturbed progression in your good work, I am

Yours truly, JOHN A. JOST.

Similar letters hav been received from numerous other friends, some of which will appear hereafter. Among the names of those who hav sent in pledges to the Asiatic fund are the following: G. Levor, E. B. Stimpson, Israel Palmer, Harrison Keeley, James E. Bishop, D. Neilson, John Clem, B. Thorp, C. W. Hall, Samuel Bass, L. R. Webb, Fletcher Blodgett, A. W. Goodnow, Robert Helm, W. B. Ford, John Bulmer, S. Young's brother, Charles Knorr, Silvester Brown, P. C. Johnson, Wm. Rowe, M.D., Philip Brinkerhoff, J. Hoke, M.D., Henry Smith, E. B. Southwick, M.D., Sam. Webber, Max Deere, W. H. Jordan, O. B. Brown, John Cosgrove, James Shiner, W. J. Burns, Joseph Manhart, E. Livezey, Freeman Parker, Wm. Trumble, John Durant, C. D. Morse.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA, Jan. 12, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I notice it is a common thing for your subscribers and patrons to advise you as to what you had better do to employ your time. For one, I protest against this "round the world" business. Going to Brussels in the common interests of all Liberals was all right, but this pleasure trip is out of all reason. I think, and I know others who believe, that it will be best for you to stick close to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I sincerely hope the voyage around the world as proposed will be abandoned. Let those who hav money to giv so freely answer the many calls already set forth in THE TRUTH SEEKER. There is work to be done at home, and it is not necessary to go abroad to find a deceitful, covetous, designing clergy and priesthood who are ever on the alert to destroy the welfare and happiness of all men who oppose them in their humbuggery and fraud.

There is hard work here at home, and you seem to be a capable leader and an honest, faithful worker; and the Liberals of America need your services here at home, and those having money to giv, let them giv it in aid of those who are battling for liberty in America. There is hard work to be done here, and I hope to see you stay by it.

The clergy of this country would, I hav no doubt, unite in sending you on a voyage around the moon, but we cannot spare you yet. I am opposed to the "round the world business."

Yours kindly, T. J. B.

YREKA, CAL., Jan. 8, I. U. S. 105.

MR. EDITOR: Why dost thou date from Anno Domini? I believe thou admittest it is extremely doubtful whether such personage ever lived. And to use it because it is common is truckling a little too much to fashion, is it not? Why not date from some epoch that we hav an objectiv or ejectiv consciousness of?

Thy friend, T. M. KELLY.

[It being the universal custom of this and European countries in counting years to recognize the fabulous starting-point of the Christian era, it is far more convenient to follow suit in this case rather than to establish another point of reckoning. We would like to see a change made in this respect, but the dates recognized by a larger share of the civilized world hav still to be recognized. When the mythical system is effectually discarded, the system of dates will probably go with it.—ED. T. S.]

CHARLES CITY, IOWA, Jan. 17, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: Let me congratulate you on the appearance of THE TRUTH SEEKER in its new dress. It is an honor to the cause of Liberalism. The type in the heading is now in proportion to the size of the page. Success to you! May yours ever be a free paper! E. C. WALKER.

BERRIEN SPRINGS, MICH., Jan. 18, 1880.

MY DEAR BENNETT: Your card of the 14th inst. and "An Infidel Abroad" are received, for which I thank you most kindly and cordially—in fact, severely.

I had read the matter of the book in the paper, but in looking into the work I find I had taken only a portion of it down. It is mostly new to me and wife, and we are reading it anew. It contains most valuable information—in fact, "valuable information oozes out of you," my dear Bennett. There are books I hav read twice, and even thrice, and with renewed interest. "An Infidel Abroad" is one such.

Yours cordially, WORTHY PUTNAM.

P. S.—An orthodox lady wishes to read the book. It will be good for her complaint. W. P.

IRVING, MINN., Jan. 12, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Your gentlemanly reply is at hand. Allow me to reciprocate your kind expressions and to extend to you my sincere wishes for your abundant contentment and long and prosperous and illustrious career as a vigorous leader of Freethought, an honored and fearless champion of popular liberty, and a most effectiv destroyer of the superstitious abominations of the masses.

I inclose the $20.00 for those seven volumes. They will assist me in opening the eyes of the blind.

Truly yours, WM. G. JEBB.

PERKINSVILLE, IND., Dec. 11, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed please find three dollars to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Times are hard and money scarce, but while orthodoxy is putting forth every exertion to bolster up its soul-dwarfing, civilization-retarding, and misery and insanity-producing doctrin I deem it my duty as one of the small factors in the great army of progress to contribute my mite toward supporting THE TRUTH SEEKER in its noble fight in the cause of human enfranchisement from the intolerable burdens of fear, superstition, and tithes which orthodoxy has fastened upon struggling humanity.

Go on with the good work of enthroning reason, science, and progress in the place of Christianity, ignorance, and stagnation, and in the glorious future millions will rise up and call you blessed.

J. M. FARLOW.

MEDICINE LODGE, KAN., Jan. 7, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just received the books I sent for, and am highly pleased with them. I was a little disappointed, however, upon not receiving New Year paper. I think my ten dollars were well spent. I would not be deprived of your good paper for that amount.

I would ever so much like to contribute toward the journey around the world, but am not able to do so at present. In my other letter I told you of the shameful manner in which God's peculiar people had treated Mr. Phelps. Since then J. D. Cotton, of this town, was sentenced to imprisonment for improper conduct with some of the little girls of his school. He wasn't an Infidel either. No sir; he was brought right up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, was an expounder of God's holy word, and when Mr. Phelps applied for their building he made the biggest howl. The strangest thing of all is that Abraham's bosom is filled up with such characters, while the best men and women in our land are hellward bound and without the comfort of an occasional drop from the godly finger of the blest. I can only say that it is very strange. Yours very respectfully,

S. V. MULKEY.

NORVELL, MICH., Jan. 9, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: It is with a feeling of unfeigned esteem and gratitude that I write to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 3d, and also the copy of the testimonial of sympathy and fraternal feeling accorded you on the eve of your return home from a trip fraught with so many incidents worthy of remembrance and record, as your excellent letters indicate. Would that I could say that I too could add $5.00 to those already proffered to assist you in a journey round the world, helping to spread the wreath of laurel so finely represented on Miss Churchill's beautiful little badge until the leaves of learning meet and intertwine at the bottom, and universal mental liberty is felt and acknowledged by the whole brotherhood and sisterhood of the globe.

My extra number of Jan. 1st has gone on its mission, hoping it will add a subscriber to you list.

R. S. LUCE.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Jan. 9, 1881.

VERY DEAR BROTHER: I am excused from the happy family circle to drop a few lines to you, and not the least to send on my practical approval and indorsement of THE TRUTH SEEKER by inclosed check for subscription and $2.00 for brother Leland. It is the only true way of praying for truth to succeed is to find the sinews of war, for the brave soldier both needs to hav ammunition, arms, and supplies, and without money the supplies will be scanty, and a weak campaign will be the result. We must meet the enemy equally well provided for as they are to hav victory.

I hav believed Liberal meetings would be better attended to make them more prefaced by musical and other entertainments previous to a lecture. Thousands of young people care nothing for what is preached, but go to hear the sweet music and see each other. They are a sort of sacred entertainments which cost as much as a stock company's performance. But it is necessary to attract. They want amusement and to meet one another.

Next, I believe if a beneficiary fund was connected with the Leagues it would keep many a League from going down. To know that at the death of a brother Liberal or his wife they should have $1,000 or $2,000 would induce many to join who now join other beneficiary societies and hav to take an oath that they believe the holy Bible is the word of God when they do not believe anything of the kind. Little is said on that point when asking a man to join, but good reason is shown why when you die we pay in $1 each. If the man dies the widow gets $2,000, and if the wife dies the man gets $1,000. With this feature to the Liberal Leagues, all dormant Leagues would be awakened to labor, and thousands who wish to avoid discussions would quietly unite and encourage the spread of Liberal reading where it cannot enter now.

I would like to hear opinions expressed on the formation of a beneficiary in connection with the League. Those lovely verses by Mary Tillotson in No. 1, Vol. VIII, of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I find adapted to the music "Speed Away, Speed Away." And, Bro. Bennett, you omitted to send us a copy of "The Truth Seeker Collection of Forms, Hymns," etc., and we want it. Put mé down for "An Infidel Abroad," with steel plate. It is comforting to hear of those arches and colonnades where sleep the great Voltaire and Rousseau. Hoping to yet shake your hand, believe me, Yours truly, S. B. BANCROFT.

EMBREVILLE, PA., Dec., 12, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: Within you will find three dollars for the current volume of your paper.

I try to keep myself and family liberally supplied with reading matter. For the greater part of the last year we hav been in receipt of one county daily, five weeklies, including THE TRUTH SEEKER, and four monthlies. The county or home papers cannot be readily dispensed with; the Greenback or financial reform papers are the most lively and courageous of any publications received, and every week they come bristling full of points of the greatest interest to every American citizen, and readily digested by all not wholly stultified by party prejudice.

Now, Mr. Editor, if you would divide your time a little between priestcraft and moneycraft—for they are closely connected, and the latter is just as false and rotten as the former—you will wield a two-edged sword which would be as dangerous to the money power as the sword that hung over the head of Damocles. You hav done a great work in exposing the errors of popular theology and Christian superstition; but there is need, and I think a greater need, of a thorough ventilation of the specie-basis fallacy and the national banking system, including the funding policy and the retirement of the greenbacks and the recoining of 75,000,000 Bland dollars into dollars of 250 grains each.

Whatever you may think about it, I would be glad to hear your opinion.

What has become of the numerous Greenback correspondents of your paper since the election? We want to hear from them often. The cause is not exhausted, nor has it suffered in the least from the vote cast for Gen. Weaver, the gallant standard bearer. On the other hand, the future is bright with hope, and the skies are uncoluded. While our arguments stand unrefuted we shall labor on with zeal in behalf of poor, depressed humanity.

W. I. HARVEY.

LOWELL, NEB., Dec. 31, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: About the third of December I sent you a letter in answer to Mr. C. L. Morgan, which appeared in the issue of the previous week, and which was supposed to be an answer to one that I had previously written. I also inclosed two dollars in said letter in answer to your appeal. Please say if you received the same. And C. L. Morgan's letter was very far from truth, making me to say that wine was so cheap in England that it was cheaper than tea or coffee, and that I argued that as a reason why it should be drank.

Now, the whole of that statement is untrue. I did not say anything of the kind. I did not argue why it should be drank. I did not say it was cheap nor that it was dear. My letter appeared Oct. 9th. The part referring to drink was as follows: I trust I shall find Mr. Morgan a better Liberal than he appears to be. Mr. Bennett has gone to Europe to represent him as well as all other subscribers to Freethought. I suppose the gentleman don't expect him to imitate Dr. Tanner, and that he will allow him a little tea or coffee. If so, I wish to tell him that tea and coffee drinking in England is dearer than ale, for in many places from fourpence to sixpence is charged for one cup of tea. On the other hand, you can go into the finest public houses and get a good glass of ale or stout for threepence, sit in a well furnished room where a good supply of daily newspapers are kept. So you see one can buy four glasses of ale or stout for the price of one cup of tea.

I am glad to find that the people of England are coming to appreciate the great powers of that noble, honest, and undaunted man, Charles Bradlaugh. I bacame acquainted with him about fifteen years ago when I was living in London, and hail, rain, blow, or snow, I always attended his lectures. Once I was traveling in the west of England, and while stopping in the town of Plymouth I noticed a bill stating Mr. Bradlaugh would address a meeting. I, in company with three other commercial travelers, attended. The hall was full. Mr. Bradlaugh appeared on the large stage, and though he had many friends in the hall not one would show their face on the stage with that noble man, not even a chairman. Was he daunted? No; he was as bold as a lion. Seeing the state of affairs, I said to my three friends —one of them as well as myself being an Infidel— this will never do; our place is on the stage; he may want our help. And the next minute we were seated by the side of one of the best men the world has ever produced. And I believe the day is not far distant when he will be in the cabinet; and, further, I believe the day will come when many of the monuments that are now standing in London will be broken up and made into concrete to lay the foundation for a noble piece of work to the memory of that great man.

Would it not be a good plan to send a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER to each clerk and treasurer of every county? Yours for truth and liberty, though it may grieve a few,

G. GRAY.

LOCUST VALLEY, N. Y., Jan. 15, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: THE TRUTH SEEKER becomes more interesting in its discussions of abstruse philosophy of mind and matter, as generally apprehended, and its other erudite subjects; in fact, is the most instructiv periodical we hav. Thanks to your wide liberality in free discussion of most important matters to all, thus eliciting public thought and expression, of which more anon. Yours truly,

CHARLES E. TOWNSEND.

INGALLS, KAN., Jan. 5, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I want to say we are going to hav a Liberal League here, to be called the "Orange Township League." I lectured in our schoolhouse twice last winter. The first time the Methodists tried to break the meeting up; the next time they succeeded by throwing gravel and dirt in at the door. I then sent for all of Ingersoll's lectures, the "A of Reason," your paper, the Investigator, one dollar's worth of your tracts and other books, and those that would read I let hav them, and of course I made lots of converts. But with all the pleadings of the church it did not get one added to it this winter at the revival here, which was largely attended on account of the preacher being Boston Corbett, the man that shot Booth.

I lectured here some three weeks ago, and forthwith the church got out a warrant for my arrest, but when they found out they could not scare me into silence, and they were told to arrest and be d——d, and that I could stand six months in jail for the Liberal cause, they gave it up, never served the warrant, and settled all costs. I gave out notice for another Liber l meeting, and the schoolhouse was forbid us; but we held our meeting, as the house was not locked. They then got a lock and closed it, but we still hold our meetings in private houses until we can open the schoolhouse, and we will hav it done before long. Your friend, A. BUTTERFIELD.

FRACKVILLE, PA., Jan. 13, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND: Rev. W——n, of Frackville, Pa., on Sunday, the 9th inst., uttered the following from his pulpit: "Dear Brethren: I thank God that there is a devil, because if we had no devil we would hav no one to fight with; no light, no victory, no crown, and no heaven to wear it." To which the brethren responded "Amen."

Allow me to make one remark: This sort of porridge, along with other porridges, forced the writer to seek better food among Liberals. Is it any wonder? Yours truly, THOMAS PHILLIP.

MEMPHIS, MO., Jan. 10, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Edward Butler, of this vicinity, a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, recently lost his only children, two bright and promising sons. They died of diphtheria. Roy, aged 11 years, died on the 23d of November, and Otto, 13 years, 5 days after, on the 28th.

Roy was skeptical in regard to Spiritualism, while Otto was a firm believer. When it became evident that Otto could survive but a short time his parents apprised him of their fears, and asked him how he felt about going. He replied that for their sake he would rather get well and stay, but if he could not he could be company for Roy. He remarked to his mother that they could no longer help her work, but that she would not hav so much to wash after they were gone.

He inquired of Mr. Baker, a kind and sympathetic neighbor, whether he had ever lost any children. Mr. Baker replied that he had lost a little girl. "What was her name?" asked Otto. On being told he said he would try to find her and send word to him if he could.

Having often visited at Mr. Butler's, and become warmly attached to these boys, I attended a seance at Mr. Mott's (this being his home) on the evening of the second day after Otto's death, hoping to meet them for my own satisfaction, as well as to be able to report to their bereaved parents.

My wife greeted me as usual (and several others), and I inquired after them. She informed me that she had seen them since they entered spirit life, and that they were then at home with their parents, adding, "Tell Mr. and Mrs. Butler not to mourn for them as they will be with them most of the time." Here I remarked that I had hoped to see them. (But did not expect to after that, as they were three miles away.) I was called to the aperture several times during the evening, and on going the last time I saw some one far back in the cabinet but so indistinctly that I did not recognize him, and inquired, "Who is it?" Without replying, he came forward, and I soon saw it to be Otto, and exclaimed, "It is Otto." He bowed twice, but could not speak. He then reached through the aperture, patted me on the forehead, and retired. I saw his parents next day, and of course what I had witnessed was a satisfaction to them. They had intended from the first to visit Mott's as soon as Mrs. Butler's strength and circumstances would permit. They hav now done so, and relate with joy their meeting with their darling boys.

At their first appearance they were unable to speak plainly. After they had retired, Dr. Reed, one of Mr. Mott's band, parted the curtain , thrust his arm, shoulder, and face quite into the circle room and beckoned Mr. and Mrs. Butler to come to him, and informed them that their sons would appear again, and that he would do all in his power to enable them to speak. They soon materialized again and were able to make themselvs understood.

Otto assured them that it was he whom I saw, and that Mrs. Young came for him and accompanied him to the seance. He requested his parents to giv his respects to his teacher and Mr. Baker, and tell him that he had seen his little daughter, that she is happy, and sent her love to him, etc. He also spoke of myself, and as the boys well knew my frugivorous proclivities, as I had often reveled in their orchard of delicious apples, they requested their father to present me with a peck of apples in behalf of each as presents. Roy assured his father that he believes in spirits now. Mr. and Mrs. Butler assure us that Otto and Roy used the same familiar terms and peculiar phrases that they used to in their private home circle while in their earthly forms, which made it seem, and which it really was, a family reunion, and for the time made them almost forget their bereavement. Yours, STEPHEN YOUNG.

LACROSSE, Jan. 17, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Mr. Chapman has been in THE TRUTH SEEKER several times lately with long articles on the subject of mind, and made a good many assertions, but to my idea has demonstrated nothing.

Now, I want Mr. Chapman to prove to me the reality of mind, for he fails to do so, though it runs through all his long article as a reality or real substance. I will ask Mr. Chapman to make good sense of the following quotations from his article in THE TRUTH SEEKER for January 8th. Here mark you his expressions, "Spirit matter." Now I want you to prove that spirit is matter. Now I want you to prove that spirit is matter of any kind. "Mind, you say, is that which thinks." I deny that mind thinks, and also deny the existence of spirit, and it is for you to prove it as you hav asserted it. I want to know also what you know about "mysterious substance." Did you ever disclose a mystery? I do not wonder at your adding, "I am getting out into water so deep that I cannot touch the bottom."

Now, Bro. Chapman, I want you to make this mind and spirit as clear as the "leg dangling from the clouds" you speak of, or, better still, hav them brought upon the dissecting table and examined, and I want it distinctly understood that nothing but occular and demonstrativ proof or real facts will satisfy. No hearsay, no beliefs, no I think, or I say it is so and so. Nor yet a long string of nonsense on paper that would reach from New York to LaCrosse.

I want to find out if you are tarnation cute as the "Yankee who slapped his hand out of the window every morning just to see whether it was light." I am with all due respect your well-wisher.

J. PETTEY.

BURR OAK, MICH., Jan. 18, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: As long as I breathe the vital air of heaven, or any of my posterity (which are not few already), that know their right hand from their left, and retain reason enough to know good from evil, or black from white, and the general tenor of THE TRUTH SEEKER continues to be so audacious and irreverent to Mrs. Grundy and the cherished faiths and issues of our fathers to the unhallowed extent of even denying that there could hav been three evenings and three mornings before the sun was made, and that the world is the shape of a pancake, and has foundations, and that one can see all the kingdoms of the earth on the top of a high mountain, and that three is one, and one is three, and that the world stands still and the sun goes round it every twenty-four hours except once when Joshua stopped it nearly a whole day so God could kill a few thousand more men, women, and babes by throwing down great stones from heaven upon their devoted heads while it was yet daylight (of course he couldn't see where to direct this heavenly artillery after dark), I shall take the paper. The trouble with you, Bro. Bennett, is that you don't reckon by the godly rule of mathematics. That's what's the matter. You see with your natural eye and undertand with your human and fleshy heart and brains. You must be born again, and then you would see that three is one and one is three just as plain as you can see that a boy can be as old as his father!

Well, now really, after a little reflection since writing the above, I hav come to the conclusion that you will plead mental inability to receive and retain saving faith in the divine revelations of God's blessed word in Holy Writ that would make you wise unto salvation. Therefore, as I am prone to forgiv the sin of ignorance, and love mercy, you may imagin I forgot the little word doubt, to start out with as the first word of this epistle. I think it would suit us both much better. I make it a rule every time I write to a Liberal publisher to send a little of the one thing needful, therefore you will find inclosed money order for five dollars, for which please send the books herein named. And now, dear brother, as myself and seven full-fledged and stalwart Infidel sons partially owe our clear sunlight of truth and reason to the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER and other words from your own and Eugene's powerful pen, I bid you God speed and would say,

Roll forward, dear brothers, roll forward the day
When all will rejoice and believe in thy way;
When reason and truth shall be more shed abroad,
And knowledge and manhood dispense with the God;
Thus as down-coming time in fancy I stood,
And grappled with truth and belief in a God,
The voices of science enchantingly said,
Oh, man, trust in thyself and not in a God.

Yours in love of truth though it slays old church dogmas on the right hand and on the left, and makes the vipers squirm. M. P. THURSTON.

LAY your sons in early coffins, aye! and your daughters too, with tears of joy, rather than that they should come up and drift aimlessly out into the world, without a fixed aim or purpose in life, or be forced into an uncongenial occupation which they hate and despise.—Susan H. Wixon in Apples of Gold.

OSCAR P. FOAL writes: "Please send me two more copies of 'John's Way.' Plain argument, unspiced with ridicule, has very little effect on the average Christian. Now 'John's Way' is most neatly spiced with this effectiv commodity of ridicule, and its shafts hit straight home. 'Uncle Tom's Cabin,' as a thorn in the flesh of many an advocate of slavery, had no small part in effecting the emancipation of slaves; and if Infidels would run 'John's Way' into the Christian camp it would probably emancipate a great majority of the slaves of Christendom. The several copies of this book sent me are all out busily skirmishing, and I need recruits.

No Sect in Heaven.

[The following poem is reprinted by request.]

Talking of sects 'til late one eve,
And the various doctrins that saints believe,
That night I stood, in a troubled dream,
By the side of a darkly flowing stream.

And a churchman down to the river came,
When I heard a strange voice call his name,
"Good father, stop; ere you cross this tide,
You must leave your robes on the other side."

But the aged father did not mind,
And his long gown floated out behind,
As down to the stream his way he took,
His pale hands clasping a gilt-edged book.

"I'm bound for heaven, and when I'm there
I shall want my book of common prayer;
And though I put on a starry crown,
I shall feel quite lost without my gown."

Then he fixed his eyes on the shining track,
But his gown was heavy and held him back,
And the poor old father tried in vain
A single step in the flood to gain.

I saw him on the other side,
But his silk gown floated on the tide,
And no one asked in that blissful spot,
Whether he belonged to the church or not.

Then down to the river a Quaker strayed,
His dress of sober hue was made:
"My coat and hat must be all of gray,
I cannot go any other way."

Then he buttoned his coat up close to the chin,
And staidly, solemnly, waded in,
And his broad-brimmed hat he pulled down tight
Over his forehead so cold and white.

But a strong wind carried away his hat—
A moment he silently sighed over that—
And then as he gazed on the further shore
His coat slipped off and was seen no more.

As he went into heaven his suit of gray
Went quietly sailing away, away,
And none of the angels questioned him
About the width of his beaver's brim.

Next came Watts, with a bundle of psalms,
Tied nicely up, in his aged arms,
And hymns as many, a very wise thing,
That the people in heaven all around might sing.

But I thought he heaved an anxious sigh
As he saw the river ran broad and high,
And looked rather surprised, as one by one
His psalms and hymns in the waves went down.

And after him with his MSS,
Came Wesley, the pattern of godliness,
But he cried, "Dear me, what shall I do?
The water has soaked me through and through."

And there on the river, far and wide,
Away they went down the swollen tide;
And the saint, astonished, passed through alone,
Without his manuscripts, up to the throne.

Then, gravely walking, two saints, by name,
Down to the stream together they came,
But as they stopped at the river's brink
I saw one saint from the other shrink.

"Sprinkled or plunged, may I ask you, friend,
How you attained to life's great end?"
"Thus, with a few drops on my brow."
"But I've been dipped as you see me now."

"And I really think it will hardly do,
As I'm close communion, to cross with you;
You are bound, I know, for the realms of bliss,
But you must go that way and I'll go this."

Then straightway plunging with all his might,
Away to the left, his friend to the right,
Apart they went from this world of sin,
But at last together they entered in.

And now, as the river went rolling on
A Presbyterian church came down,
Of women there seemed an innumerable throng,
But the men I could count as they passed along.

And concerning the road, they could never agree,
The old or the new way, which it could be;
Nor ever a moment paused to think
That both would lead to the river's brink.

And a sound of mourning, long and loud,
Ever arose from the moving crowd—
"You're in the old way, and I'm in the new,
That is the false, and this is the true."
Or, "I'm in the old way, and you're in the new,
That is the false, and this is the true."

But the brethren only seemed to speak,
Modest the sisters walked, and meek,
And if one of them chanced to say
What trials she met with on the way,
How she longed to cross to the other side,
Nor feared to pass over the swollen tide,

A voice arose from the brethren then,
"Let no one speak but the holy men,
For hav you not heard the words of Paul,
Oh, let the women keep silence all?"

I watched them long in my curious dream,
'Till they all stood on the bank of the stream,
And just as I thought the two ways met,
But all the brethren were talking yet,

And would talk on till the heaving tide
Carried them over side by side;
Side by side, for the way was one,
The toilsome journey of life was done,
And priest, and Quaker, and all who died
Came through alike on the other side.

No forms, no crosses, no books had they,
No gowns of silk, nor suits of gray,
No creeds to guide them nor MSS,
For all had put on Christ's righteousness.

THE Standard Cure Company, No. 114 Nassau street, New York city, will send to any address a box of Emery's Standard Cure (Purely Vegetable Cream-Coated Pills), a never-failing remedy for Ague, Billiousness, and all Malarial Diseases. Standard Cure is pleasant to take, contains no quinine, mercury, or poisons of any kind.

Invalids are Respectfully Requested to Read the following Open Letter:

TO THE PHYSICIANS AND THE COMMISSIONERS OF CHARITIES OF THE CITY OF BROOKLYN,

Gentlemen: Two years ago in Europe I invented and patented a magnetic appliance for the relief and cure of disease. My system is one that was never before attempted, but the simplicity places it among the many great improvements in the history of science which, after its inception, has caused thousands to wonder why so valuable an addition to the necessities of our race should hav been so long overlooked.

The success of my appliances in the cure of disease in England was such that over thirty thousand persons were clothed in them, and not one case of failure when the proper appliances were worn as recommended. In the face of such success in Europe, I determined that the people of America should be made acquainted with the fact. I arrived in Brooklyn only a few months ago, and commenced the sale of my goods at 465 Fulton st., since which time I hav, in Brooklyn and neighborhood, over a thousand persons wearing my appliances for the diseases mentioned in my advertisement—all of whom came to me only as a last resort, having failed to get relief from any of their physicians, and these persons were as readily relieved as were those in Europe—ninety-nine per cent of whom will tell you to-day, on appliccttion to them, that my appliances gave them all the relief promised. A printed list of my clients is at your disposal, so that you may satisfy yourselvs of the truth of the above statement. My proposition, therefore, is that I hand over to the medical men of Brooklyn, as a body, five thousand dollars' worth of my appliances, to be used on the persons of the sick poor now and likely to be in your charitable institutions. The only condition I make is this, that I myself clothe the patients according to my own judgment, and be allowed to retain watchers, at my own expense, that the patients do not receive any medicin of any kind during the wearing of my appliances, and that a proper report be supplied from time to time, so that I, at my own expense, can publish the record of the cured by my appliances. I further wish that every medical man in Brooklyn should call at my manufactory and examin for himself the process of manufacture, and make himself thoroughly acquainted with my system. My factory is open for inspection at all hours to any physician, chemist, or scientist, and in close proximity to my own business premises the same physicians may see for themselvs the patients who hav been relieved by my appliances. Every physician and chemist who has examined my goods hav availed themselvs of my invention and are to-day wearing my appliances and recommending the same to their patients with marked success.

The aforesaid gift of FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS' worth of goods will be delivered from time to time, as agreed upon by a committee of yourselvs, on application to me a few days in advance, stating the diseases for which they are required, so that I can apply the best possible form of my invention. Hoping that you will avail yourselvs of my offer, I remain, gentlemen,

Your obedient servant,
WILLIAM WILSON,
No. 465 Fulton street, Brooklyn.

Wilsonia magnetic appliances, invented and patented by William Wilson, lecturer on Electrical Therapeutics, author of "The Trial of Medicin," "The Language of Disease," "Medical Fallacies," etc., etc., 465 Fulton street. Wilsonia magnetic appliances may be obtained at the above address. They will relieve and cure every possible disease, less a totally rotten lung; are as comfortable to wear as any undergarment; they fit all parts of the body, and the infant just born, or the octogenarian, can wear them without the slightest danger. They produce no shoks, cause no sores, and the horrors of medicin can be entirely dispensed with. Price list and pamphlet containing the names of thousands of persons sent on application.

The physicians, scientists, and electricians of America are completely nonplussed at the marvelous results following the introduction of my invention. It is now a recognized fact that to wear the Wilson garments is to attain to perfect health.

Invalids living at a distance may rely on a cure, no matter what their malady. The above open letter to the physicians of Brooklyn speaks for itself to the value of my goods.

N. B.—In writing to me, do not use the prefix "doctor," that being a title the most unenviable to myself, as every advertising quack and brainless licentiate of our colleges too proudly parades it before the thoughtless public. In ordering goods from the distance, all I want to know is the nature of the disease and size of waist.

Special Notice from Bliss' Chief's Band.

Me, Red Cloud, speak for Blackfoot, the great Medicin Chief from happy hunting grounds. He say he love white chiefs and squaws. He travel like the wind. He go to circles. Him big chief. Blackfoot want much work to do. Him want to show him healing power. Make sick people well. Where paper go, Blackfoot go. Go quick. Send right away. No wampum for three moon.

This spirit message was first published in "Mind and Matter," January 10, M. S. 32, with the announcement that magnetized paper would be sent to all who were sick in body or mind that desired to be healed, also to those that desired to be developed as spirit mediums, for three months for three three-cent stamps. The three months closed with the following result: 3,405 persons hav sent for the paper by mail, one thousand persons hav received it at the office; and the hundreds of testimonials that hav been received of its wonderful work in healing the sick and developing mediums prove that Red Cloud and Blackfoot hav faithfully kept promises. From January 10th, M. S. 32, to January 10th, M. S. 33, over 15,000 persons hav sent for this paper, and thousands hav been benefited by its use. That all may hav an opportunity to test th merits of the paper, the price for the future will be as follows: one sheet, postage paid, ten cents; twelve sheets, one dollar. Send a silver ten cent piece if you can. Address James A. Bliss, 713 Sansom street, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE SEYMOUR, IND., TIMES

Is one of the most widely known and best heeled papers in the great Mississippi Valley. It will complete its 25th year in March, 1881, if the day of judgment doesn't come prior to that date; and it isn't at all likely that even Gabriel's toot horn can set it back much.

The Seymour Times has but few principles. Most papers are bothered and hampered with principles; but the Times having but few of 'em, and not one solitary politic to its name, is free to slip in a word for Truth, Justice, Mercy, and Humanity whenever it can get a chance.

The Seymour Times is for light and for useful knowledge, and it has no faith in humbuggery and superstition. It is the only paper in the great West that is able to run without a god or devil or ghost.

The Seymour Times is paying $4,000,000 (four million dollars) a head for ghosts, though, and it wants all it can get. It is also paying the same figure for virgins who are mothers, or sons who are their own fathers, or fathers who are their own sons.

The Times makes it a business to defend the holy ministers of the Lord from the slanders of the wicked. Those ood men, full of the love of God, can do no sin. They are constantly tempted, however, of the women and of Satan, and according to the wicked they fall often and hard. This the Seymour Times denies on the general principle that the love of God shed abroad in the heart leaves no room for sin and none can get in or could stay there a minute if it did.

The Seymour Times is a large six-column quarto, beautifully printed in bold type.

If you are a Freethinker, you want it; if you ain't, you want it.

Price, $2.15 a year; 6 months, $1.10; 3 months, 60 cents. Stamps received for change. At least send two red stamps for sample copy. Address J. R. MONROE, M.D.,
Seymour, Ind.

SUPERSTITION IN ALL AGES.

BY JOHN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

TO MISS ANNA KNOOP, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

Bliss' Magnetized Planchette.

This little instrument is designed especially to develop writing mediumship, also to be a reliable means of communication with the spirit world. The advantages claimed over other Planchettes now in the market are as follows: First, the pasteboard top, instead of varnished or oiled wood. Second, Each instrument is separately magnetized in the cabinet of the noted Bliss mediums, of Philadelphia, and carries with it a developing influence from Mr. Bliss and his spirit guides to the purchaser. Price, 50 cents each, or $6.00 per dozen. Address JAS. A. BLISS,

CONSULT

Your Case Is Curable!

You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

NOTE.—In reference to the few persons named above, I have taken them as they occur in my books, feeling assured that each person will give their experience and the effects of my appliances in their respective cases. But being only a few months from Europe, "where thirty thousand people are wearing my goods," it cannot be expected that absolute cures have been effected in so short a time "in all cases," but in every instance it will be found that decided improvement set in even where all medicines had failed to give the slightest relief, yet given time "even in the worst cases" a cure is certain, but some persons will get worn out by drugging and poisoning, and then expect a magical cure. That is impossible and our common sense must be appealed to in such instances.

Gems of Thought.

GIV man and woman the right to life, liberty, land, and home, then God will reign on earth and the devil will be unknown.—F. M. Smith.

YOU may pave heaven with gold and embellish its canopy with the choicest gems, but don't ask honest labor to foot the bill.—F. M. Smith.

KEEP the laws of life in spirit and letter,
Keep the mind free and without a fetter,
This life's but a school to prepare for a better.
—Anon.

THE time is coming when we shall say as little of God as possible, never dispute about him, force no one to pray to him, but leave worship to the sanctuary of private conscience, and this we shall do when we are truly religious.—George Sand.

EVERY soul, the philosopher says, is involuntarily deprived of truth. Consequently, in the same way, it is deprived of justice, temperance, benevolence, and everything of the kind. It is most necessary to bear this constantly in mind, for thus thou wilt be more gentle toward all.—Antoninus.

IT is a satisfaction to a man to do the proper works of a man. Now it is the proper work of a man to be benevolent to his own kind, to despise the movements of the senses, to form a just judgment of plausible appearances, and to take a survey of the nature of the universe and of the things which happen in it.—Antoninus.

LET it make no difference to thee whether thou art cold or warm if thou art doing thy duty; and whether thou art drowsy or satisfied with sleep; and whether ill spoken of or praised; and whether dying or doing something else, for it is one of the acts of life, this act by which we die. It is sufficient, then, in this act also to do well what we hav in hand.—Antoninus.

LORD SHAFTESBURY, the author of the "Characteristics," conferring one day with Mayor Wildman about the many sects of religion in the world, they came to this conclusion at last: That notwithstanding these infinit divisions, caused by the interest of the priest and the ignorance of the people, all wise men are of the same religion. Whereupon a lady in the room, who seemed to mind her needle more than their discourse, demanded, with some concern, what that religion was. To which his Lordship replied, "Madam, wise men never tell."—John Toland.

THE belief in satanic agency had a fearfully tragic side, in the contemplation of which one shudders at the awful and uncontrolable power of the religious ideas over unenlightened human nature. The long delusion of witchcraft, with the thence resulting persecutions which desolated Christendom with ghastliest horrors and countless deaths, was the natural outcome of this belief. Those terrors which darkened and perplexed the life of former generations hav passed away. Like specters begotten of nightmare and the dark, with the dawn of a new intellectual day,

The flocking shadows pale
Troop to the infernal jail.

Satan, the head and sovereign of this spectral jail, is passing from the fear and faith of mankind, and a load, whose agonizing pressure we but faintly conceive, has been lifted from the mind.—Hedge.

To the scientist and cultured thinker there is no sort of impropriety in discussing this subject of "fewer and better children" in our public papers or public meetings. To the true lover of his kind, and the real seeker after the highest and best truths, no question that concerns man's health, welfare, or happiness can be impure or undebatable, either publicly or privately. It is custom, fashion, and Mrs. Grundy who create public sentiment in this respect, and we therefore desire to educate this trinity in a broader and purer Liberalism, and show them that "to the good all things are good." We wish to create a reign of common sense, where no subject that is proper for private discussion may not be talked of in public, and finally prove to them that true morality is of the heart, and to be pure we must think pure thoughts as well as speak them. This covering up or even half-veiling a thing is only another means of suggesting or increasing prurient and improper thoughts, while a frank, clear, and candid discussion lays all open to the gaze and makes all rights proper and correct.—Elmina D. Slenker.

SOME time ago I remember reading in the Rochester Democrat a story to the following effect: Recently the officer in waiting at the table of his holiness had the misfortune to spill the salt. Leo jumped up to see if any of the precious grains had fallen on the floor, being persuaded that if it had been so he would soon hav been a dead man. On satisfying himself that none of the salt had reached the floor, but had fallen on the table, he comforted himself with the reflection that it only indicated the death of a cardinal. Accordingly, a cardinal died a few days after. Such is the story. Now Mr. On Dit, as everybody knows, is a great fabricator, as well as a great propagator, of lies. But if there is any truth in the above story, in what a deplorable position does it show the pope to be? If an Irish bog-trotter betrayed such weakness and aberration of mind, would not Biddy say to him, "Get along with you; me grandmother would hav been ashamed of such a childish superstition?" From the gospel according to St. Matthew we learn that Christ said to his followers, "Ye are the salt of the earth," etc. (verse 13); and if his holiness spoke and asked as is alleged, he is "certainly good for nothing but to be cast out and trodden under foot of men." Instead of being a leader of men and the chief pastor of some millions of two-legged rational creatures, he is not fit to be placed in charge of a herd of swine. Let no one tell the story to Sitting Bull or the Zulu Cetawayo, for they would certainly split their sides with laughter. If this report is true, we may well say, "Such puerility is scarcely fit for the schoolroom, but rather for the nursery, and comes very near the cradle."

Odds and Ends.

AN observer says the handsomest girls marry homely men. That spoils our chances of marrying a handsome girl.—Ex.

"WHY, Polly," said her mother, "what a time you've been. Where's the cotton I sent you for?" Polly, who has lost the money: "You shouldn't send little things like me to buy tottun."

A SMALL boy went to see his grandmother. After looking eagerly round the handsomely furnished room where she sat, he said, "Oh, grandmamma, where is the miserable table papa says you keep?"

YOU should never sleep with anybody stronger than yourself in cold weather. He will wind himself up in two-thirds of the blanket and leave you shivering on the comfortless sheet every time you turn over.

"I UNDERSTAND that Dr. Jones is abroad," said Brown. "Is he traveling for his health?" "I suspect," said Fogg, "that he is traveling for his patients' health. I know one of them who has improved on his traveling."

A SCHOOL-TEACHER in Iowa had the debt of the world all nicely figured up to a cent, when a Chicago man went and got trusted for a codfish and forgot whether it came to seventeen or twenty-seven cents. It was awful mean on the schoolmaster.

A LITLLE girl once said that she would be very glad to go to heaven, because they had plenty of preserves there. On being cross-examined, she took down her catechism and triumphantly read: "Why ought the saints to love God? Because he makes, preserves, and keeps them."

ITALIAN universities are now open to women, and the young female pioneers of co-education are learning English in order to shriek with effect to the young gentlemen on the other side of the room: "Go 'way, now, you awful thing! I think you're real mean, whoever threw that spit-ball."

A CHICKEN lived, a chicken died,
His drumsticks and his wings were fried,
His feathers by a dealer dried,
And very shortly after dyed.
Soul he had none; admitting that,
How comes it? There upon her hat,
His plumes—a mortal chicken's—rise,
A glorious bird of paradise.

A YOUNG eel, that had been rated a nuisance, and told by his relativs two or three times one morning to "get out," tied a knot in its body and slid part way through it. Its mother's sisters coming up and exclaiming, "What now?" the young eel observed: "Oh, you needn't concern yourselvs about me. I'm a noose, aunts." This fable teaches whatever you like.

NEWLY married husband, jocularly: "Well, dear, if there is a smash on the line, you're well provided for. I've made my will, you know." Newly married wife, playfully: "Yes, love; but don't you think you'd better run and get an insurance ticket for the largest amount you can? It would be so handy to buy mourning. Black always did become me so!"

A MAN who wanted to buy a horse asked a friend how to tell the horse's age. "By his teeth," was the reply. The next day the man went to the horse dealer, who showed him a splendid black horse. The horse-hunter opened the animal's mouth, and gave one glance, and turned on his heel. "I don't want him," said he; "he's thirty-two years old." He had counted the teeth.

A CHAT WITH SALVINI.—On being introduced to the great tragedian I opened the conversation by remarking, "Signor Salvini, chiaro scuro macaroni," to which he courteously responded, "Signor Americano, andante stiletto." I was delighted to hear it, and replied, "Mezzo tinto Vittorio Emanuello viva voce." That seemed to please Salvini, and he remarked, smiling, "Pianissimo staccato mio." I agreed with him, and said, "Bravo lazzaroni piano." He seemed to like the idea very much and declared quite earnestly, "Hando organo grinderini." I then shook hands and withdrew, as I saw many of his friends waiting an opportunity to speak to him.

THERE was a Detroiter among the trio of officials who passed over the route of the Butler Railroad to secure the right of way. In some cases farmers cheerfully signed off; in others money had to be used, but in one case the committee found a most determined opposition. The road would divide a widow's farm, and she was independent, obstinate, and defiant. She knew that her haystacks would be destroyed by sparks, her live stock run over by trains, and her slumbers disturbed by the rattle of trains, and she wouldn't listen to argument. In this emergency one of the committee said:

"Madam, do you know of any widow in this neighborhood who would be willing to board a gentleman connected with the construction of our road? He is a widower and prefers to board with a widow."

"No, I don't know as I do. Is he a nice man?"

"Splendid man, and has money in the bank. We want him to permanently locate at this point and are in hopes he will take a wife. It is unfortunate that—"

"I never did take boarders," she mused, "but—"

"If you only could, now, I'm sure you would not regret it. He is extremely fond of children and would be like a father to your little ones."

"Perhaps I might, to accomodate you."

"Ah! thanks. He would be here next week if this right of way matter was decided, but as it is he may not—"

"Do you agree to pay damages if you burn my barn?"

"Of course we do."

"And I'll probably get used to the noise?"

"Oh, of course. In a week you won't mind it. Fact is, you'll sit up every night till midnight, anyhow, after the gentleman arrives."

"Oh, no, I shan't. I shall never love again; but if he is a nice man, and loves children, why, I don't know as I ought to stop your road. I guess I'll sign."

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

"The Gods and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," "Heretics and Heresies." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

"The Ghosts and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Ghosts," "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," "Declaration of Independence," "Farming in Illinois," "Speech at Cincinnati," "The Past Rises Before Me Like a Dream." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

Both volumes bound in one, price, paper, $1.00.

"What Must We Do to be Saved?"

"Interpolations are the foundation stones of every orthodox church." Thoroughly revised and corrected by the author. Price, 25 cents.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 8. No. 6. { PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. } New York, Saturday, February 5, 1881. { SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. } $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE national debt of England is held by about twenty-three thousand people; that of France by about four million.

TALMAGE and Bernhardt continue advertising each other. It is now the player's turn; the last notice came from the pulpiteer.

THE Scientific American estimates that more than $35,000,000 was brought into the United States last year by foreign immigrants.

A LOCAL preacher prayed in meeting, "Lord, keep us from living in the seventh chapter of Romans, and help us into the eighth."

THE Roman Catholic priest at Lewistown, Ill., went on a hilarious spree with a party of young fellows, and has been deposed by his bishop.

A LITTLE Sunday-school girl whose father is a tailor said to her teacher, "I can always tell when father makes a misfit, for when he comes home he givs fits to mother and me."

OUTSIDE of Baltimore there is not one self-sustaining Baptist church in all the state of Maryland. This statement is made by a correspondent of the Examiner and Chronicle.

THE Rev. John A. Huegli, of Detroit, has brought a suit for $5,000 against the man who accused him of withdrawing from the Roman Catholic church and joining the Lutheran in order to marry.

Two pyramids built by a king of the Sixth Dynasty hav been discovered to the north of Memphis. They were buried beneath the sand. The vaults and chambers are covered with inscriptions.

THE Interior complains that some of the ministers who send items of church news too frequently giv information regarding themselvs, instead of that which is of public interest in regard to religious work.

THE potency of our clergy is illustrated by the fact that Chigago is the only American city in which Bernhardt has not, thus far in her tour, been assailed from the pulpit, and her receipts there were the smallest.

AN English doctor says that in large cities night air is often the best and purest air to be had in twenty-four hours, and that fully one-half of all the diseases afflicting humanity are occasioned by people sleeping with their windows shut.

STEPHEN GREER and R. Luckey were attending a revival meeting held in the United Brethren church. They quarreled and made attempts to strike each other. They then withdrew from the church, and in a long and bloody contest outside Greer stabbed Luckey nine times, making fatal wounds.

THE daughter of a clergyman at Napa, Cal., went to a circus. On the following Sunday her father preached on sinful amusements, and used her case as an illustration. In the Sunday-school that afternoon he said that she was impenitent, and moved her expulsion; but a vote being taken the pupils failed to support his fatherly motion.

UP to Dec. 31st the French government had expelled, all told, 5,768 members of religious orders, including 2,464 Jesuits, 409 Franciscans, 406 Capuchins, 294 Dominicans, 240 Oblates, 239 Benedictines, and 126 Redemptorists. The 1,450 Trappists, though equally smitten by the decree, had not as yet been turned out of doors.

AFTER "very spirited bidding," a pew in a Christian church in this city was knocked down by a secular auctioneer in a secular salesroom to an opulent Christian for $760. Fancy the face that Paul of Tarsus would hav made over an announcement that Pew No. 58 in the church of the Disciples, Jerusalem, had been knocked down, after very spirited bidding, to brother Demetrius for 760 shekels! But "They didn't know everythin' down in Judee.'

THE Jesuits are reported to be negotiating for the Imperial Hotel at Dover, in England, which is to be occupied by a number of the brethren expelled from France. They hav leased Peak House, near Sidmouth, a large, fine place, with extensiv grounds and commanding charming views of the sea.

A CHURCH in the interior of Pennsylvania wants money, and proposes to raise it by a fair. To start the fair the pastor asks for donations. "Send cash," he says, "but if not cash, then send us anything that we can turn into cash." Already poultry and provisions of various kinds are coming up to the help of the Lord against the mighty.

AMONG the Hindoos it was formerly the case that the Brahmans were the only educated people. The law of caste cut off all the others and kept them in comparativ ignorance. Most of the converts to Christianity came from the lower castes. The indications now are that caste is breaking down, and that all are to hav an equal chance for enjoying the advantages of education.

A PASTOR CONFESSES.—The Rev. B. C. Miller, of Roxbury, N. Y., boarded with Mr. David Williams and became very fond of Mrs. Williams. A neighbor coming in unannounced one day caught the good man and the good wife in very close contact and immediately retired. It soon got noised around, and the good shepherd confessed that he was kissing the good sister, but it was a "holy kiss." Of course it was holy.

A WATCHMAKER of Copenhagen has constructed a clock that needs no winding up. It is kept going constantly by means of an electric current that operates on the spring and maintains an unvarying and permanent state of tension. Attention to the electric battery once or twice a year is all that is necessary to keep the clock in motion for an indefinit time. If this is true, it probably comes nearer being perpetual motion than anything yet heard of.

THE dissatisfied party in the church of England has accepted the invitation of the Archbishop of Canterbury to state what reforms are needed in the government and management of the church. The statement is a formidable one. It asks for the repeal of the Public Worship Regulation act, the dismissal of Lord Penzance, and the declaration that all the acts done by him are void. It demands the abolition of Privy Council interference with the church, and the removal from the House of Lords of stipendiary.

IT is remarkable that the working classes of Germany hav taken little part in the anti-Jewish agitation. At a stormy meeting in Berlin the other day, in which the Jews were denounced as a people "unfit to mix with other races," a workingman had the courage to state that "after seventeen years' hard work in Berlin, although a Christian himself, his experience was that Jewish employers had, as a rule, treated him far better than his co-religionists." He accordingly proposed a resolution "in favor of religious liberty." The result was that the meeting hissed him and turned him out.

THE Free church of Scotland is in something like a free fight over its methods of praising the Lord. According to the custom which has long prevailed in most of the churches of Scotland, this church has made use of psalms exclusivly. The young people demand a change both in the style and volume of their praise material. The collection which they hav been using for many years contains less than two hundred psalms. They want a book of hymns and psalms containing in all about 370 metrical compositions. The battle over the rejection or adoption of this book rages fiercely. In connection with it the old fight about organs comes up. The venerable Dr. Begg is one of the most earnest in his opposition to musical instruments of all kinds, and exerts himself to the utmost to prevent what he calls the desecration of the churches by organs and by compositions which are uninspired.

UP to the beginning of the month the Rev. Dr. Todd's church, in the city of New Haven, professed in its manual to believe in "the condemnation of the wicked to everlasting punishment." It has now discarded this cheering formula, and leaves the future fate of the wicked an open question, contenting itself with professing a belief that the Lord will come to judge the world in righteousness. This action on the part of a church under the eaves of Yale College will not lessen the anxiety of orthodox Congregationalists, East and West, over the present drift of things in the denomination.

A SHORT time ago some Russian peasants were drawing water from a well in Gadiatch, when one of them spied a picture of the Virgin floating on the surface of the liquid. They were soon joined by two village girls, who, the picture being pointed out to them, declared that, only two hours previously, they had seen it flying about in the air, and watched it as it gently descended into the well. This story spread throughout the district of Gadiatch like wildfire, and as soon as it came to the ears of the landowners upon whose property the "holy well" was situated, he lost no time in building a chapel over the spring. To this chapel the population of the district has since repaired in daily increasing numbers, leaving the churches empty of their congregations even on Sundays and saints' days, so that the local clergy eventually applied to the police authorities for an official investigation of the alleged miracle. In compliance with this requisition, the Stanovoi of Gadiatch forthwith betook himself to the chapel, seized the miraculous picture, and deposited it in the police office. Subsequent inquiry has brought to light the fact that the Virgin's counterfeit presentment had been purchased of a traveling peddler by the speculativ landowner above mentioned, who had utilized it, with the assistance of his peasantry, for the creation of a sacred shrine upon his estate, and had already cleared a handsome sum by appropriating the money offerings of the pilgrims who had flocked to the "holy well" from all parts of the surrounding country. This ingenious gentleman is safely in prison, awaiting his trial for sacrilege.

IT is somewhat painful to see that quarrels and contentions are still prevailing in many parts of the Christian brotherhood. In Tarrytown, N. Y., a serious difficulty between a pastor and a leading member has just been hushed up. In Belleman, Pa., a fierce war between the Appel party and the anti-Appel party has been raging for several weeks. It was hoped the quarrel had subsided, but it has broken out anew. The Rev. Mr. Appel and his party had been shut out of the church, and they made a formidable attempt to gain possession. The Rev. Appel gave it out that he would preach again in the church if it cost blood, and his friends were determined to accomplish it if they had to go behind prison bars in consequence. But their opponents were on the alert, and were too strong for the Appelites. They guarded the doors and windows of the church both day and night armed with bludgeons. Appel and a number of friends went to the church at 9 A.M., and demanded, in the name of God, admittance to the church, but the stalwart Christians with the bludgeons did not recognize their authority, and held their ground. The Appelites considering discretion the better part of valor, concluded to make no attack, and assuaged their disappointed feelings by holding service out doors in a snow-storm. In concluding his service the Rev. Mr. Appel announced that in four weeks from date he would hold service in the church. "No you won't," shouted a half-dozen opponents, who stood about the door of the church. "You are not our minister, and you can't come in." A few minutes afterward the Rev. Mr. Appel left the front of the church followed by his bodyguard. The crowd lingered for a long time, and finally dispersed without doing any violence.

GREAT damage has been done by the floods in the southern and central parts of Spain. The railroads in many places are under water.

FOUR young children were burnt to death at Altona, N. Y., a few days ago, the house having taken fire during the absence of the parents.

A MAD dog ran through the streets of this city a few nights ago, savagely attacking all he met. He bit twenty persons before he was killed.

THE British hav met with severe reverses in their recent encounter with the Boers in South Africa. In the last conflict several hundred men were lost.

THE state trials in Dublin are over. The jury disagreed, and Parnell and his associates in the Land League movement are free to continue the agitation.

THE streets of this city are in a very bad condition, owing to the heavy falls of snow which hav accumulated, and street blockades are of daily occurrence.

GAMBLING houses in this city are being pretty thoroughly broken up by the police, but gambling in private club rooms is becoming more prevalent than ever before.

THE Oneida Community, since its change of base, seems to be in a more flourishing condition than ever. They hav more orders for their goods than they can fill.

SENATOR FOSTER has been nominated by Hayes to take the place of United States District-Attorney Woodford in this city. It may be possible to get Colgate indicted for his vaseline anti-conception pamphlet now.

THE walking-matoh which ended on Saturday night last proved to be the most interesting that ever took place. Of the thirty starters only five held out to the finish. John Hughes, the winner, made 568 miles in six days, and had several hours to spare. This beats the previous record by two miles.

Report of a Debate

BETWEEN THE REV. A. HATCHARD AND MRS. ANNIE BESANT, AT THE HALL OF SCIENCE, LONDON.

SECOND NIGHT.—CONTINUED.

MR. HATCHARD.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies, and Gentlemen: Before I enter to-night upon what I hav really to say, I want to say one word, and that is this: I am exceedingly obliged to all those friends who hav written me a lot of letters regarding this debate, telling me what I was to say and what I was not to say. But I can only use my own brains, and not other people's, and if I don't follow the course that some persons present say that I ought to take, it is because I think I am doing the right thing in what I am about to do. I may say at once that I don't intend to follow Mrs. Besant over all the ground she has gone upon, but to tell you another story. I fully expected that she would follow the course which she has to-night, because she has printed these opinions. I will giv you another picture, which is a contrast to the picture which she has presented to you. It has been said by some persons that Christianity did not introduce many new intellectual truths to the world. That is directly the fact, but my contention is that, in short, both the revolution and the revelation of Christianity—that the change effected by Christianity—was a moral one and not an intellectual one. I say that Christianity has nothing at all that is not in harmony with the highest philosophy and the highest science, and I am prepared to prove that; but I do say most distinctly that Christianity was intended to be a moral revelation to the world, and I stand here to challenge the world to-night to contradict that which I am about to set before you. I suppose there is no person present who has not read at some time or other the first chapter of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans. If you hav not read that, I do most earnestly request you to do so when you get home, and to ponder it and think most carefully over it. I may be told at once that it is only St. Paul who speaks this, and, in short, that he is not worth attention. Let me tell you that St. Paul simply givs the words of many of the writers of antiquity—he exactly givs us a picture of the heathen vices of his time, which, ladies and gentlemen, are so truly abominable and defiling that before an audience in which there are a great many ladies I would rather not read the verses. If there were only Mr. Bradlaugh and a few gentlemen here, and the doors were locked, I would not mind going into these subjects. I hav told you that that was the state of the heathen world, and that it was a true and faithful picture of what the heathen world was at the time of St. Paul. Now, mind you, St. Paul is corroborated by a mass of testimony, and by a number of evidences which are literally overwhelming. You may ask me what were some of the prominent vices which were practiced at the time of St. Paul. Slavery was one, and slavery was universal. I may be a most ignorant person, but I say that Jesus Christ had love to man; I see that St. Paul had this; I see in the principle of Christian brotherhood that there was laid the great principle which opposed slavery in the ancient Roman world; and, with all due deference to our chairman, I say that it was Christian principle and Christian feeling which opposed slavery in the Southern states of America. You may think I am a very ignorant man in saying this, but I say it was Christian feeling in the Roman Empire, too, that was the cause of slavery being gradually given up. From different councils and different ancient authors we see that it was the church of which you hav heard so much to-night that stood between the slaves and their masters—that extended the power of her protecting hand or arm on their behalf. A Roman Catholic friend of mine—a Roman Catholic, mark you!—has taken the trouble to collect in the British Museum for me a whole mass of authorities upon this question, and I tell you that they are so voluminous that they hav astonished me. I will giv Mrs. Besant my notes if they are of any use to her. I speak respectfully.

Just for a moment or two let me refer you to Juvenal. Juvenal is truly what is called a satirist. Juvenal, mind you, was not a burlesque writer. Now let me tell you that Juvenal is one of the greatest names in Roman literature; and any of you who cannot read the Latin may buy a translation for about a shilling. Now I say distinctly that what is taught here is exactly the truth. This is Dryden's translation. I wish there were no ladies here. The sixth satire is so bad that I cannot read it before this audience. I say the picture of vice and immorality and profligacy here is something which is simply alarming.

Now, our chairman knows the Luxembourg, in Paris. They hav a collection of beautiful pictures there, and amongst them there is a splendid painting of "The Romans of the Decadence," and of the profligacy depicted by Juvenal and St. Paul. There is shown what Juvenal says and what St. Paul says. I hold in my hand "Horace." Listen just to this. This is a quotation which I looked out this afternoon. It occurs in the first book of his satires, and in the third satire. He is speaking about the punishment of the slaves, and he goes on in this way: "Lastly, since the vice of ire, likewise other vices adhering to fools, cannot be cut off entirely, why does not reason use her own weights and measures, and, as each thing is, so coerce offenses by punishment? If any one should fix that slave on a cross, who having been ordered to take away a dish shall hav licked the half-eaten fishes and warm sauce; among sane persons he would be called more insane than Labeo" (The Classical Student's Translation of Horace, ed. 1844, pp. 160, 161).

Do you understand what this means? It means this, that a man—mind you, this Horace was a heathen—a slave who simply partakes of a piece of any delicacy—say a fish, is punished, his master having supreme power over him, by ordering him away to be crucified on that account, and that is the custom or practice which Horace alludes to. The cruelty, the vice, and the immorality of the Roman Empire is something that you can hardly credit. There are no common books which giv a good account of this, simply because the majority of authors do not like to defile their pages with the immorality and licentiousness that abounds in these classics, but here is one which does. This is a well-known book, which was published some hundred years ago. It is called "The Advantage and Necessity of the Christian Revelation shown from the state of Religion in the Ancient Heathen World." It is by John Leland, doctor of divinity, who Mr. Bradlaugh well knows is the author of a book against the Deists. I say that that book is a black, appalling, fearful picture of what the state of the heathen world was morally.

I say nothing about Jerusalem when Jesus of Nazareth came into the world. Don't take my word for it, but listen attentivly to what I say; and I stand here against all the Freethinkers of England, I stand here before all the world, to bring evidence of what I hav said of the awful and appalling vices in Rome and the neighboring nations at the time when Jesus came into the world. It was because Christ came with the pure gospel, because it reproved and denounced the follies of the time, because it taught purity of morals and uprightness of life, that a large number of the heathens were so opposed to it and him. Why, if you will only get these two small volumes you will see for yourselvs. These two books are "The Early Empire," and the "Age of the Antonines," by Mr. Capes, the Reader of Ancient History in the University of Oxford. Now the truth is this, these two books giv the same kind of account, but not so extended as I hav told you with regard to Leland. I am going on at great length, showing you the state of the heathen world, because I think it is very important that you should know what the world was like at that time, and what Christianity has done to make it better. If you will only look carefully over the pages of another author, Mosheim, you can see most clearly what were some of the vices, and how Christianity operated in correcting these follies, in teaching these people higher and nobler views of life. I say the influence of these truths was such that at the time they were preached they purified the people. Within the first few years their effects were not so apparent, but as time rolled on—between the time of Paul and the time of Constantine—the rapid advance in teaching men nobler and higher ways of life was apparent in that age, and is apparent on the page of history.

Why, ladies and gentlemen, I should hardly dare to tell you what so great a man as Plato taught! What did Plato teach? Did Plato allow fornication? Did Plato appoint a community of women in his republic? That is, men were to hav wives in common. Read Plato's "Republic." You see how these vices were the great curse of the heathen world. They were really a large part of the means of the decline of the Roman Empire. If I do nothing else to-night than leave this upon your minds let me tell you again that the change wrought by Christianity was a moral change. I did not hear the book mentioned by Mrs. Besant, but the view placed before you by Mrs. Besant was much the same as is presented in Draper's "Conflict between Science and Religion." In that book you get a one-sided view, and I tell you that there might be a very different picture painted by another hand. Christianity was not so much intended to be an intellectual change as a moral change, and I stand here to-night to tell you that that moral change was effected in the Roman Empire by Christianity to a very great extent. I believe I may say entirely so. You will say it may be true, but Christianity is now worn out, and people do not believe in it; in short, that it is dead. I stand here to-night to bring before you facts as to what Christianity effected in the Roman Empire in the first three centuries, between the time of Jesus of Nazareth and the time of Constantine, and also facts as to the great change which has been effected in India during the last eighty years. I stand before you to-night to defend Christianity from this charge of being dead. I can defend it, and hav done so through a large part of England and Ireland before to-night.

Mrs. Besant told you last week in very eloquent words about Chrishna. There is not an atom, not a tittle, of proof that the story of Chrishna existed before the time of Jesus of Nazareth. I hold in my hand a book that is somewhat well known. It is this: "Christ and other Masters: a Historical Enquiry," by Archdeacon Hardwick. This book is published by Macmillan. His object is to draw a picture of the various religions of the ancient world, and he goes very elaborately into the question of the religions in India. I stand here before you to-night to tell you that there is not a tittle of proof to show that the story of Chrishna, as we know it in the Indian books of to-day, existed before the time of Jesus of Nazareth; but there is a very great amount of evidence to show that the story of Chrishna became popular in India about the sixth century, in the form in which we know it now, and you would be astonished to see the evidence which Archdeacon Hardwick givs in this book. His notion appears to be that the original story about Chrishna got mixed up with the story of our gospels, when they found their way into India. (A laugh.) Let me tell the gentleman who laughs that I can prove it to be the truth, and I tell the gentleman who laughs that I hav made it my business to understand these things. I cannot finish my subject to-night. Some time in January or February I hope to come here and lecture on these subjects. I can lecture for an hour, and I shall be happy to meet Mrs. Besant in the same way as we meet now if she likes.

In India they chiefly worship three gods—Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva. Now, I only, to-night, hav to do with Vishnu. Vishnu is the second person of the Hindoo triad or trinity. Don't confound this with our doctrin of the trinity. Only ignorant persons do so! There is no similarity or resemblance, and no one who knows anything of the subject would confound them. This person, Vishnu, whose name means to enter or pervade, the Hindoos believe has had nine incarnations in the past, and one incarnation in the time which is to come. I say this Vishnu is supposed to hav been nine times incarnate, and he has one to come in the future. In one of these incarnations he is called Chrishna, and he is one of the most popular gods in India in some parts.

Ladies and gentlemen, I wish to be a free man! I don't challenge persecution or prosecution, and, therefore, I am not going to tell you about Chrishna to-night; but I hav books on this platform that if the chairman likes to read to you I will see that he is sent to prison for doing it. I hold in my hand Ward's "History, Literature, and Religion of the Hindoos." What is Ward's evidence? These books are the original, and they were printed in India. What does Ward, who stands unchallenged before the world, say? He givs a picture of degradation, of fearful immorality, in India, which he dare not print in English. I could tell you a tale, but I won't. Ladies and gentlemen, you know I hav been brought on to the Freethinker's platform, and I must do my duty; and the heads of the church in London, who know well I am here, and what I am doing, and who hav sanctioned my coming, will hold me responsible if I don't do my duty.

Now, then, besides the evidence which is supplied by Ward, I hold in my hand the memoirs read before the Anthropological Society of London, volume ii, page 264. Dr. James Hunt, an intimate friend and acquaintance of mine, was the president. It is headed, "Some Remarks on Indian Gnosticism or Sacti Puja, the worship of the Female Powers," by Edward Sellon, Esq. I don't wish to get sent to prison, and I don't wish to read it to you. The worst of this is in Latin, and it shows distinctly the same kind of black picture of degradation, of vice, of immorality that existed in the Roman Empire at the time when Juvenal wrote his satires, and when Horace wrote his satires which I hav referred to.

What about Christianity? I stand here to-night fearlessly before all the Freethinkers of this country, and I say Christianity has so altered the whole tone of Indian society during the last eighty years—has so completely and thoroughly altered the moral tone—that now there is a totally opposit state of things to what there was eighty years ago.

I came here armed for the fray, I told you last week. I hav brought with me testimonies to the results of Christian missions, which I trust that our Chairman and Mrs. Besant will look at—at least, I earnestly pray that they will. There are testimonies from the late Lord Lawrence, Lord Northbrook, Lord Napier, Sir Bartle Frere, Sir Donald Macleod, late Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab, and Sir Richard Temple. There are so many that I won't go over more of them, except Prof. Monier Williams. Let me tell you, Freethinkers, that these testimonies no one can shake down, that there is a mass of evidence to show what Christianity has done in India—(interruption)—of what Christianity has done in India. Keep quiet. That they are simply overwhelming, and before I hav done with you this night I will show it you, and more still. It will be said that Christianity is dead. Gracious! how ignorant you must be!

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

What Objections to Christianity?

MR. MAIR'S FIFTH LETTER.—CONCLUDED.

It is not argued that there are no truths taught in paganism, for it would seem that a belief in a Creator, in immortality, in personal sinfulness, in future reward and punishment, in heaven and hell, and a day of judgment might possibly be vaguely perceived by reason and a sense of justice. But they could never be anything more than mere belief, and that necessarily very confused and imperfect; they could have no authority over the life, and could produce no certainty to the heart, unless the wish of Socrates was fulfilled and some one sent from heaven with knowledge and assurance to men. The young man whom Cicero introduces as anxiously studying his arguments for the immortality of the soul, but who while joyously convinced while the page was open before him, was yet again skeptical when he closed the volume, rightly represents the feeling of uncertainty in the hearts of all the ancient pagans on all important topics of the future existence, and even as to the being of God and the chief good in this life. Christianity on the contrary, to those who receive it, brings the only thing that can rest the conscience and bring peace and assurance to the heart—knowledge. "If any man will do his will he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God." Millions have tested the promise and borne witness to its absolute truth. Infidelity cannot adduce from the writings of the ancients any such assurance or unity of belief in any one important truth that Christianity reveals as are found in the writings of all Christians. The being of God, immortality, the resurrection, are held by all Christians with the conviction and assurance of absolute knowledge, while before the advent of Christ they were mere guesses. It is therefore absurd to assert that the scriptures borrowed any of these from other religions, not only because the priority of these religions has not been proved, but also because while reason seems to teach them, the Christian revelation alone has confirmed them, alone has given them any consistency, alone has removed from them the various superstitions, immoralities, and false teachings under which they were buried, and alone given them power over the heart, as it was probably the cause of their being held in the world at all. God spake to Adam, God spake to Noah, and from this source it is altogether probable all that was and is true in false religions sprang.

Equally absurd is it to object to or charge plagiarism on the scriptures because false religions recite several facts which the Bible asserts to have occurred. The characteristic insincerity of unbelief is borne witness to by this very charge, because a former generation of Infidels profess to reject the scriptures because, as they alleged, prominent facts like the deluge, the ark, the saving of Noah, etc., are not attested by other than scriptural writers. Thus, if other creeds support the scriptures in their recital of facts, Infidelity arraigns the Bible for plagiarism—if they are supposed to be silent on the same salient points, Infidels refuse likewise to believe on the plea of insufficient evidence. We may wonder that any honest, reflecting mind could be deluded by such dishonest shifting.

It will be seen, however, that unless there are weighty reasons, as there often are, for the silence of pagans, many scriptural facts must find a place in their histories and religions also of this kind. The Garden of Eden, the fall of man, Adam and Eve, the sacrifice of animals, the giants before the flood, the deluge, the saving of Noah and his family, etc., would naturally be expected to be found in all religions and mythologies. They are facts which occurred in the infancy of the world, before men were scattered over the earth, and hence traditions of them must be found among many nations, and such traditions uphold the integrity of scripture. Nor need we shrink from adducing the very avatars or descents of Vishnu of Hindoo mythology—which you have brought forward to prove the plagiarism of the idea of the conception of Christ—as thus confirming biblical truth.

Sir William Jones, to whom you have so often appealed, in a lecture before the Royal Asiatic Society, bears witness of the nine avatars. "The three first apparently relate to some stupendous convulsions of our globe from the fountains of the deep, and the fourth exhibits the miraculous punishment of pride and impiety. Firstly, as we have shown, there was in the opinion of the Hindoos an interposition of Providence to preserve a devout person and his family (for all the pundits agree that his wife, though not named, must be understood to have been saved with him) from an inundation, by which all the wicked were destroyed; next, the power of the deity descends in a form of a boar, the symbol of strength, to draw up and support on his tusks the whole earth which had been sunk beneath the ocean; thirdly, the same power is represented as a tortoise sustaining the globe which had been convulsed by the violent assaults of demons while the gods churned the sea with the mountain Mandar and forced it to disgorge the sacred things and animals, together with the water of life, which it had swallowed. These three stories relate, I think, to the same event shadowed by a moral, a metaphysical, and an astronomical allegory, and all three seem connected with the hieroglyphical sculptures of the old Egyptians. The fourth avatar was a lion issuing from a bursting column of marble to devour a blaspheming monarch who would otherwise have slain his religious son, and of the remaining six not one has the least relation to a deluge—the three which are ascribed to the Tretayug, when tyranny and irreligion are said to have been introduced, were ordained for the overthrow of tyrants or their natural types the giants with a thousand arms formed for the most extensive oppression, and in the Devaparyug the incarnation of Chrishna was partly for the same purpose and partly with a view to thin the world of unjust and impious men who had multiplied in that age. . . . As to Buddha, he seems to have been a reformer of the doctrines of the Vedas, and though his good nature led him to censure those ancient books because they enjoined sacrifices of cattle, yet he is admitted as the ninth avatar even by the Brahmans of Casi" (Asiatic Researches, vol. iii, p. 339). The tenth avatar is yet future.

I have given the full quotation that the reader may also judge for himself how reasonable the opinion is that the idea of Christ grew out of the above incarnations.

Sir William says in another lecture: "There is no shadow then of a foundation for an opinion that Moses borrowed the first nine or ten chapters of Genesis from the literature of Egypt, still less can the adamantine pillars of our Christian faith be moved by the result of any debate on the comparative antiquity of the Hindoos and Egyptians or of any inquiries into Indian theology."

But accurate chronology is your greatest enemy. You cannot prove that any of the resemblances which are claimed between Christianity and any of the religions of the world are anterior to the captivity of the ten tribes of Israel, and I believe they are all post-Christian. The alleged "oldest of books," the Rig Veda, cannot be proved to be as old as parts of the Old Testament, a fact which Prof. Muller, with all his devotion to Sanskrit, acknowledges (Chips, vol. i, p. 5). As a discerning critic says, in a review of the last three chapters of Mr. Mallock's "Is Life Worth Living?" "Seven hundred years before Christ, and two at least before the birth of the founder of Buddhism, the ten tribes of Israel were transported en masse almost to the borders of India. About one hundred and fifty years later the Babylonish captivity dispersed the rest of the nation probably still more widely, a dispersion from which they never more than partially returned. The prophecy of a child to be born, son of a virgin, and yet the mighty God, might thus hav been carried far and wide through India before Buddhism had in fact a history at all."

The Vedas make no reference to a trinity composed of Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva, nor is there any teaching of an incarnation. It is only in Hindoo books that are acknowledged by all critical authorities to be after the establishment of Christianity, from the first to the twelfth and even later centuries A.D., that the doctrines are taught of which you, following Mr. Graves, who followed Mr. Higgins, who derived his cue from Messrs. Volney and Dupuis, claim Christianity borrowed. But the real probability is that they all copied from the so-called apocryphal gospels and the teachings of that corruption of Christianity, the Nestorian heresy.

And this is especially true of the story of Christna, or Chrishna, as you spell it, though the general preference seems to be Krishna. There is no similarity at all between the meanings of the words Christ and Krishna, as the former means, as every one knows, "anointed," and the latter I am informed signifies black. He was not born of a virgin, and, as the famous astronomer Bentley demonstrated by exact mathematical calculation founded on his horoscope, he must hav been born A.D. 600 if at all. The curious reader will find many other facts interestingly grouped in a little book by the editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, which is a criticism of Mr. Graves's works, and to which I am indebted for part of this and the last paragraph.

The claim than Ahriman is a prototype of the biblical teachings of Satan is another Infidel assertion, easier made than proven. There is every probability that it is an addition to the early Persian religion, and it is at least doubtful if Cyrus, Darius, or Xerxes ever heard of him. The religious formula engraved by the last two on the rocks at Persepolis and Nags-i-Rustam omits all mention of him, and the historian Herodotus is equally silent.

The religious books of the East themselves are for the greater part infantile babblings. I had intended introducing quotations, but I have already trespassed too much on the patience of the reader. I will content myself with one or two quotations from Max Muller, whose word on Sanskrit is the highest living earthly authority. He says: "Readers who have been led to believe that the Vedas of the ancient Brahmans, the Avesta of the Zoroastrians, the Tripitaka of the Buddhists, the King of Confucius, or the Koran of Mohammed are books full of primeval wisdom and religious enthusiasm, or at least of sound and simple moral teaching, will be disappointed on consulting these volumes. Looking at many of the books that have lately been published on the religions of the ancient world, I do not wonder that such a belief should have been raised, but I have long felt that it was high time to dispel such illusions." The Vedas themselves distinctly disclaim inspiration, however fondly the Indian theologian may argue for it. "In many a hymn," writes the foregoing authority, "the author says plainly that he or his friends made it to please the gods, that he made it as a carpenter makes a chariot (Rig Veda I, 130, 6. v, 2, ii), or like a beautiful vesture (R. V. v. 29, 15); that he fashioned it in his heart and kept it in his mind (R. V. I. 171, 2); that he expects as his reward the favor of the god whom he celebrates (R. V. IV., 6, 21)." James Legge, in his introduction to his translation of the texts of Confucianism, bears like witness to the alleged "bibles" of the Flowery Kingdom. "The ancient books of China do not profess to have been inspired or to contain what we should call a revelation." It is interesting in this connection to remember that when the Vedas became popularly known to the natives of India, to whom they had long been "a fountain shut up and a book sealed," the claim to their divine inspiration was relinquished by the Brahma Somaj, the most enlightened of their sects.

In conclusion, a word about your authorities, which I suppose to be a proper subject of criticism. Neither James F. Clarke, Sir William Jones, nor Max Muller at all uphold your views. Mr. Kersey Graves is an uncritical and utterly unreliable writer, whose conceit and assumption is only equaled by his ignorance and incompetency to judge between authority and nonsense. Jacolliot is not only unreliable, but, according to the testimony of Prof. Muller and Prof. John Fiske—an Agnostic whose word should certainly be law for Infidels—contemptibly unscrupulous. Mr. Godfrey Higgins, while a man of considerable learning, was an imaginative and very credulous old English gentleman, who, while he had the leisure and taste to amass considerable interesting data, had not the critical acumen to sift the wheat from the tares. Dr. Inman, while somewhat of a scholar, I hope had more common sense in his theories of medicine than of theology. None of the ideas of the foregoing writers are original; they are merely elaborations of the defunct nonsense of Volney and Dupuis. Another of this precious school was Robert Taylor, of whom you give a glowing but erroneous account in "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Mr. Taylor was first a minister, then an Infidel, then recanted, again affected Infidelity, married, and passed himself as a Christian. In his first Infidelity he wrote "Diegesis," and other Infidel books. I have looked over the "Diegesis," and it is certainly one of the most impudently ignorant and dishonest productions that have ever fallen under my eye. But he recanted all this when he found Infidelity did not pay. I have lying on the table before me a work of his after he had again professed Christianity, written against Infidelity, called "Natural History of Religion; or, Youth Armed against Infidelity and Religious Errors." I judge he is a poor authority for either side. The case is very similar to the story they tell of a man who had been prominent as an anti-Masonic orator. After a while he went West and joined the Masons, and then returned to the same village where he had declaimed against them and became as strenuously their advocate. A lady who was afraid that her husband would be influenced to join them under his sophistry met him in the street one day and accosted him: "Mr. ———, some years ago you preached against Freemasons?" "Yes." "And now you preach in favor of them?" "Yes." "Well, were you lying then or are you lying now?"

But I must stop here, asking your and the reader's indulgence for the extreme length of my letter,

I am, sincerely yours, G. M. MAIR.

D. M. Bennett's New Book.

Mr. Bennett has published his European letters in book form, under the title of "An Infidel Abroad."

It is wonderful how Mr. Bennett picked up so much in so short a time. He has pictured the persons, places, and scenes visited with a vividness that almost impresses upon us his own personal realization of them. Those who hav not visited Europe will find a fund of information in these letters that it would be difficult to find elsewhere, clothed in so pleasing and comprehensiv a style. He leads us by pleasant ways through the wonders of Rome, London, and Paris to witness the stupendous works and varied genius of the highest past and present civilization of the world. The work is one of the most pleasing among the many books of travel, and should be read by all who take pleasure in contemplating what the past has produced and what the present is producing.—Progress.

The Freedom of the Human Will.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I observe in Mrs. Besant's report of the proceedings of Brussels Conference of Freethinkers, as published in the National Reformer, that there was an interesting discussion of the metaphysical question concerning the freedom of the will—whether it is always governed by the strongest motiv, or whether it has a self-determining power, and acts as it pleases. Will you indulge me in a few thoughts on this subject?

About the middle of the last century Jonathan Edwards wrote his famous treatis on the will, which stands to this day as a monument to his genius. In it he proves that the human will is, in a sense, passiv, and is governed, and ultimates in action, by the force of the strongest motiv; not the strongest motiv really in existence, but the strongest as it appears to the actor himself, and the strongest present before the mind at the time of action. Edwards' work was designed to be a defense of the Calvinistic system of theology generally, and particularly of the two doctrins of the election of the saints to eternal life and happiness, and the reprobation of the non-elect, who compose the larger part of the human family.

Now, while a man may repudiate both these theological dogmas, and all the rest that hang to them, he may hold to the metaphysics of Edwards, and call it, with the Duke of Argyle, "The Reign of Law," or "the machinery of the universe," including human volition as well as dead matter.

The only objection that a Rationalist can make to Edwards' doctrin that the will is governed by the strongest motiv is that it seems to make man a mere machine acted upon from without by an absolute God, who has the whole world of motivs at his disposal, thus destroying man's accountability for his actions, and blotting out the distinction between right and wrong. Let us test the questions by a little inductiv reasoning:

1. Is it not a fact, according with the experience of every age, that a person is conscious of his freedom to act, or not to act, just as he pleases? Consciousness of a thing is the best, nearest, and shortest evidence in the world of the truth of that thing. Argument and demonstration are only longer methods of proving to a man a proposition that does not come within the realm of his own consciousness, but only of his intellect.

2. Is it not a fact, proved by science to the satisfaction of every intelligent mind, that man and his actions, like any other thing, form links in the eternal chain of causes and effects which it is the province of time in its revolutions merely to unfold? The modern doctrin of the conservation of force shows that the universe is a unit, and that all persons, things, and events are but fractions of the unit, that there is a plan or system of things which dispenses entirely with miraculous interposition, but is executed by the unbroken operations of natural law.

3. Is it not a fact that of the countless murders committed, no man was ever yet known to excuse himself because he felt that he was irresistibly impelled to do the deed? The point I make is that while it is true that the plan of the world includes in its design and execution the voluntary actions of all organized beings, no man excuses himself for a bad act on that account because he is conscious of his freedom to do otherwise.

4. As to the reconciliations between the consciousness of a man's freedom to act or not act as he pleases, on the one hand, and on the other hand that the universe is a plan, including every person, thing, and moment of time, that is a matter we hav nothing to do with. Facts are facts whether we comprehend their relations to each other or not. Facts alone are the objects and subjects of all knowledge, and the facts we hav mentioned are on all hands admitted to be such.

5. If it be true, then, that the will is invariably governed by the strongest motiv presented to the mind is not man a mere irresponsible, moral machine? and is not God an arbitrary despot impelling him into sin, and then punishing him by the terrible consciousness of guilt, and perhaps by a public execution for his offense? To this I reply, Every sane man, when he is tempted to commit a crime, or when he feels the superior force of a bad motiv tugging at his will, has the power to pause and reflect, by which I mean that he has the power to call up the opposing motivs, and to study their numbers and their force, until they outweigh the one that prompts him to action. This goes upon the presumption that there is always in existence somewhere a stronger motiv to do right than to do wrong, and the business of a moral and accountable agent, when he is tempted, is to hunt up that motiv or motivs by the mental process called reflection. The Quakers hav a rule that when any one is provoked to speak or act unadvisedly he must keep entirely silent until he can deliberately count one hundred; an irritable man one hundred and fifty. During this time the blood has a chance to cool, and go more slowly through the veins, and although the strongest motiv was to knock down the man who affronted him, he has called in the opposing motivs to such an extent that, all being combined, they weigh heavier than the once strongest motiv. Do we not all admit that we hav this power, and do we not in our moral nature feel that when tempted by a strong motiv we ought to exercise it?

A young man meets in a stage-coach a woman. After a few hours' conversation with her, she being fascinating, he finds himself in the chains of love. So powerful is the newborn motiv which has crossed his path that in obedience to it he is willing to lay himself and his fortune at her feet. Her presence is his heaven, and her absence is hell. He would cheerfully risk his life in a duel with a rival in order to secure the prize of her love. He would marry her instantly if it was possible. Her beauty and loveliness of character, which he has discovered, constitute the strongest motiv, moving power, in the world now acting upon his will, and he is governed entirely by it for the time being. But that does not prove that there are not opposing motivs, one of which, or all together, may change the complexion of the whole case. The young man has as a fellow-traveler, a life-long friend, an old man who has traveled the ways of love himself, and that friend says, Young man, pause and reflect. And, beginning with number one, he goes on to giv ten reasons why by no act he should yield permanently to the motiv which has enslaved him. The first reason is as light as a feather to the lover, but at the giving of the fourth or fifth, the youth begins to feel shaken in his purpose; or, to speak metaphysically, the strongest motiv weakens and loses weight as it lies in the scale, and the opposing motivs in the other scale gather in weight and numbers. By the time the old man gets to the tenth reason, the strongest motiv, as it once was, has become the weakest. All this because the agent, when tempted to act by the presence of the strongest motiv, paused and let his mind go through the process of reflecting, whereby his whole course of actions was changed.

If there be a flaw in this argument, the writer is not aware it, and will be glad to hav it pointed out. To be sure, no attempt is made to reconcile the absolute freedom of the human will with the unitary and unbroken plan of the world expressed by the theological phrase, the sovereignity of God, that controls the act of every living being by presenting the strongest motiv. But these two seemingly opposit facts compose a mystery, but not an obscurity. It is an absurdity to say that a part is equal to the whole, or that two straight lines can inclose a space; but a mystery is a fact so high above us, and so round, that there is no place for the human intellect to take hold of and subject it to examination. Look at the mysteries which hang round the whole subject of electricity, and defy us as yet to understand it. We do not puzzle our brains and stand still because we cannot reconcile the conflicting features of the phenomenon. We hitch it up like a mule, and put it to work in the service of man.

This, then, seems to be the conclusion of the whole matter. Our understandings teach us that our persons, and our volitions, which lead to actions that exert momentous influence on human affairs, are all necessary parts of the iron-linked plan of the world, which time in its progress reveals. The relations between these parts are so intimate, old effects being only new causes of future effects, as to justify us in saying, without a figure of speech, that that part of the universe called our world is a unit. We are conscious, nevertheless, and therefore harbor no doubt, that we are perfectly free in our actions, and do exactly as we please, without compulsion from any quarter, and are therefore responsible for our actions. And we know from a thousand experiences in life that when distracted and unable promptly to act by a variety of conflicting motivs we hav the power to sit in judgment on the case, examin these motivs deliberately, call in others from a distance, and by reflections make the whole of them to change places, the weaker ones at the moment taking the place of the stronger, and the strongest of all at the time taking the place of the weakest. This is the reason why men feel responsible for their actions, and they could neither be nor feel responsible unless they were and felt themselvs to be free.

The Athanasian Creed Explained.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I came across the orthodox creed the other day for the first time. I had always understood that it was something entirely beyond our reason to comprehend or understand. I think I hav heard Col. Ingersoll hold it up for ridicule on this account. I was surprised when I came to read it to find how easy it was to understand. I read it over several times, to be sure there was nothing incomprehensible about it. And then the doctrin of the trinity is perfectly simple when you understand the orthodox creed. The creed is this:

"The Father is made of none, neither created nor begotten. The Son is of the Father alone, neither made nor created, but begotten. The Holy Ghost is of the Father and the Son, neither made nor created, nor begotten, but proceeding." How easy!

First: "The Father is made of none." This is in the present tense, showing that God has ever been and is now in a state of formation or being made, and as man is the greatest maker that we know anything about, we conclude that man is continually making this God or Father. But what do they make him of? The creed says of none, which must mean no thing or nothing. Now as the Father is made of nothing, he is nothing still, for every man knows that something cannot be made of nothing, so it is perfectly plain that the Father is nothing.

"The Son is of the Father begotten." Now it is a long-established fact that like begets like, and as the Son is of the Father alone, and I hav shown the Father to be nothing, so the Son must be nothing also.

The Holy Ghost is of the Father and the Son proceeded. Now as the Father and the Son are nothing, could anything else proceed from them but nothing? Consequently the Holy Ghost is nothing.

Now we understand it perfectly; we hav God the Father, nothing; God the Son, nothing; and God the Holy Ghost, nothing; and these three nothings are one nothing. How easy the trinity comes in!

Now I think this is so plain, "that a wayfaring man though a fool need not err therein."

This creed was formed over fifteen hundred years ago, and the clergy hav been trying to mystify it ever since. If they had shown it to the people just as it is, how much happier the world would hav been, for it is the most simple, the easiest to be understood, and the most correct description of this personal Godhead that I hav ever seen.

Proceedings of Secular Association No. 1.

"It mus' be now de kingdom's comin'
"An' de year ob jubiloo."

Goody gracious, Mr. Bennett, I must tell you of our meeting last night! We are all so glad that the secularization of the nation is so soon to be accomplished under the new dispensation. Last night the *Green*ville Grand Pacific Secular Association, No. 1, held its first meeting in the chapel. It would hav done you good to hav seen the people of our village flock to our noble standard—literally all except a few "obscenity repealers."

The President, Col. Pope, being absent, the Treasurer, Col. Begundy, presided with universal satisfaction. He happily introduced Col. Spendwind, who he said would address the meeting.

Col. Spendwind commenced by congratulating us that the people of *Green*ville were the first to enroll themselvs under the glorious "grand pacific" banner, which is very soon to "secularize" the government, and bring that happy time which by faith christendom has long seen, proclaimed in a Bethlehemite stable. He thanked God that those who hav for many years been hurling the irresistible shafts of reason, argument, and ridicule against the church and the dominant party, to the great detriment of our cause, hav at length become sensible of the injury done to the feelings of our Christian friends, and hav resolved to do so no more, but in the future turn their attention to the cause of "Secularization." He dwelt at considerable length upon the unparalleled outrage of the Catholics of New York receiving public funds for the support of their schools; and as they are universally Democrats, and are by no means expected to rally under our glorious banner of "Secularization," this ought to end at once. In conclusion he expressed the well-grounded hope that before the expiration of the present year the church everywhere throughout our land would rush to the "Grand Pacific plan of Secularization," and that by the 1882d anniversary of the birth of our Savior, the lion of Infidelity and the lamb of Christianity would lie down together, and be led to green pastures under the shade of our glorious banner of "Secularization." (Universal applause.)

Bro. Weekly rejoiced in the early prospect of the "Secularization" of the government; for then his children in the school will no longer be compelled to read the obscenities, vulgarities, and falsehoods in the pretended word of God.

He was promptly called to order by the chairman, who informed him that nothing could be allowed to hurt the feelings of Christians. This is duly incorporated in our Constitution, and a repetition of the offense would subject him to expulsion.

Col. Gingerlost said that in the past he had said much about the "Mistakes of Moses," "Hell," etc., but in the future he should be silent on all these points.

Prof. Upperwood declared he had dwelt much on the "Crimes and Cruelties of Christianity," but was now an advocate of the new di-Spencer-ation.

Adjourned to meet next Wednesday evening in the Presbyterian church.

The hearty congratulations indulged in showed the universal satisfaction of all. 572½ already enrolled. Secularist.

Singing Stones.

I believe that Liberals, who are necessarily the most sincere and enthusiastic admirers of the real marvels of nature, will be much interested in learning that a key-board of undressed stones, giving forth the most melodious sounds, has been curiously collected. Mr. Baudre, of Paris, is the gentleman who after a quarter of a century's perseverance and search through every part of France has succeeded in proving the truth of his hypothesis that the quarries of nature contained, ready and waiting only for the magic touch of man, all the various notes of musical harmony, and that her great and tuneful voices were not dumb in the stone any more than in man, bird, or tree.

This "geological piano," constructed through the strange devotion of a man to his idea, has three full octaves. The stones, simply balanced by strings upon a wooden frame, are undressed flints varying from three to sixteen inches in length, irregular and of every shape, such, in a word, as Dame Nature, in her all-wise and supreme will, has seen fit to deposit, long before Adam was a suckling babe, in the bowels of her pet daughter, our Mother Earth. There they hav lain, treasuring up their wealth of soul-stirring melody, through the countless ages of the past.

To attempt, by means of prosy, articulated words, to giv an adequate idea of the purity and pervading sweetness of the tones Mr. Baudre knows how to draw from these uncouth flints would be a vain task. It is, we think, no exaggeration to say that sounds of such crystalline clearness hav never before greeted the ear of man. These singing stones must be seen and heard to be appreciated. Such is the testimony of the most distinguished men, as, for instance, the composer Rossini (who said to Mr. Baudre that had men been ignorant of music he—Baudre—would hav invented it); the poet Victor Hugo, the great scientist Tyndall; and on this side, Dr. Wheatland, Prof. Eustis, Dean of the Scientific Faculty at Harvard, Prof. Gibbs of the same university, Dr. Thomas Hilt, former president of Harvard, and many other widely known men, who unite to speak in enthusiastic terms of the singing stones.

It is Mr. Baudre's intention to exhibit the stones in New York city, giving an interesting lecture upon the flints, their peculiarities, many of which are not only very singular, but also of keen scientific interest, their history, their executing operatic and popular airs upon his primitiv though perfect key-board, and what has proven not the least interesting part of the program, inviting all present to test the accuracy of the notes, and address him any question or request concerning, or in connection with, his marvelous instrument.

This lecture and exhibition must attract the curious as well as the scientific, as, in addition to the natural curiosity of brute stones, graded on a scale of more than two full octaves, and emitting more perfect sounds than any musical instrument, not to speak of the persistent genius of the man who collected them, it throws new light on the probable uses of the flint in the ages of primitiv man. It will be given at Steck Hall, No. 11 East 14th street (near 5th avenue), on Thursday evening, February 3d, commencing at 8 o'clock. Tickets (at 50 cents each) can be secured at THE TRUTH SEEKER office, at Steck Hall, or at Brentano's, corner of Union Square and 16th street. E. G.

Letter from Wm. McDonnell,

AUTHOR OF "EXETER HALL," "HEATHENS OF THE HEATH," "FAMILY CREEDS," ETC.

MY DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Accept my thanks for the copy of the "Infidel Abroad" sent me. I hav again read many pages of your letters from Europe with renewed interest. Most travelers when describing their journeyings dwell much upon natural scenery — mountain, valley, and lake; rock, river, and waterfall; and forts, castles, and ancient ruins are also brought prominently before the reader. But while not overlooking these, you take us into the most famous museums, art and picture galleries. With peculiar zeal you lead us into splendid churches and cathedrals, and we gaze in wonder at the towering and magnificent varied forms of materialized superstition. We see a glut of pious pomp and pageantry in every direction. Every city and town, even while having a majority of its population pauperized and degraded, must hav, it seems, its palatial ecclesiastical structures, as if to awe into greater servility the unreasoning slaves of blind faith. Statues and pictures of Madonnas, of infant gods, and of crucifixions, and those of apostles, saints, and martyrs, also adorn or disfigure the most conspicuous places in churches and on highways, winning the ready worship of votaries who feel no degradation in their prostrations before these, or in the more than semi-idolatry with which they hav learned to regard the skulls, and bones, and rags, and other relics held by the priests as worthy of the highest veneration. Religion, particularly in Catholic countries, is delusion almost complete. There credulity seems to be boundless. In early life I experienced in my own case something of this feeling, and I therefore believe that your statements regarding religious infatuation hav not been exaggerated. But what shall be said of Protestant countries? There, too, the army of paid priests and pious pensioners still shout, "Glory to God in the highest; him alone shall we serve." And while solicitations are constantly made to the wealthy and great, as well as to the suffering poor, for "offerings to the Lord," the Christian God has superabundant gifts, while the pressing wants of Christian men are comparativly overlooked, vast numbers being still allowed to remain in their normal state of destitution. Verily the home of pauperism is in Christian lands.

With kindest regards to Mrs. Bennett and yourself, I remain, Yours truly, W. MCDONNELL.

Lindsay, Ont., Jan. 25, 1881.

Personal—Just Once.

While conducting the Secretaryship of the National Liberal League without money compensation, I find that it will be necessary to earn bread by the sweat of my brow in some other occupation. I cannot steal, and "to beg I am ashamed." I hav been young, and now I am old; yet never hav I seen my seed begging bread.

Fortunately, I hav a trade. Since 1845 I hav been first a phonographic teacher, then reporter in the courts of this city, in government service, and as secretary of various societies and corporations. Of late years I hav done less reporting and more teaching. Some of the best reporters in the profession are pupils of mine. Last year I accepted a professorship in a phonographic college. This year I declined; and, since my election to this Secretaryship, I hav given my whole time to it, earning nothing in any other way. This cannot last. I propose to resume teaching, not for the profit of employers, but on my own account, giving three hours' time to it daily for pay. This will leave me ten hours a day to work for the League for nothing. St. Paul mended sails while he saved souls. I will mend souls while I fill the sails of the Liberal League; thereby I, too, will be an independent apostle, and "not be chargeable to any."

Phonographic shorthand is yet a new profession—perhaps the only one that is not yet crowded. There is a growing demand for sharp, smart young men and women phonographers in the courts, in counting rooms, in telegraph offices, in editorial sanctums; and it is a genteel, not severely laborious, and fairly well-paid pursuit. It is also a good foundation to begin upon, establish a character, and rise to higher positions. Having charge of the correspondence of the principals of firms and presidents of companies, it throws the clerk into intimate relations and enables him to make valuable acquaintances and form profitable business connections.

Phonography can be acquired by steady application three hours a day in from four to six months. The average gain is one word per minute per day. One hundred lessons will giv one hundred words per minute, which is sufficiently rapid for clerk, secretarp, or amanuensis purposes. One hundred and fifty lessons will carry the pupil up to one hundred and fifty words a minute, which is sufficient to report most speakers verbatim. This speed is the standard for admission to the Law Stenographers' Association of this city. The compensation for phonographic clerks is from $500 to $1,000 a year, according to capacity, and for reporters from $1,000 to $2,000 a year. Beginners, however, hav to commence on lower salaries and work up. At present, and for a few years to come, a well-qualified stenographer is pretty sure of getting a position, as the demand is increasing faster than the supply.

If any young Liberal who reads this would like to engage in this pursuit I will fit him or her for the position of clerk, secretary, or amanuensis for $100; or, to take a reporter's position, for $150, payable for every twenty-five lessons $25 in advance. I wish to take from five to ten pupils only at one time. Further particulars will be given on application to the undersigned.

Another hint I will giv to Liberal young men seeking mercantile or business positions. Our trade with the Spanish republics south of us is increasing year by year, and most business houses must hav one or more clerks who write and speak Spanish. The language is one of the easiest to be acquired, and any clerk with an outfit of Spanish and phonography would be sure of commanding a good situation with a good salary.

Now, Mr. Editor, please lay this proposition before your readers; and if a few of them would like to accept it I will work for them for a term and for the League till the crack of doom. T. C. LELAND.

"THE Darwins" is an animated, vigorous, and life-like story, and is written in Mrs. Slenker's usual vigorous, sledge-hammer style, and is bristling with sharp points, every one of which is driven clear home and doubly clinched. The book will be extensivly read, and cannot fail to be admired by all reformers for its just and forcible condemnation of the use of intoxicants, tobacco, tea, and coffee. — Seymour Times.

A New League.

Our friend J. H. Burnham, of Michigan, is stirring up the Liberals of his state. Last week he was at Lowell, and the result is the Lowell, Michigan, Auxiliary Liberal League (No. 29), John M. Mathewson, President; and James H. Weeks, Secretary.

This League takes the place and number of the Albany, N. Y., auxiliary which seceded with Mr. Abbot in 1878.

I am happy to be able to report the following additional annual members:

Henry Gildemeister, Bunker Hill, Ill.
Joseph Henry, Salina, Kan.
J. Francis Ruggles, Bronson, Mich.
James McDonald, Fort Fred Steele, Wyo. Ter.
C. S. Rowley, Jackson, Mich.
Elizabeth M. F. Denton, } Wellesley, Mass.
Prof. Wm. Denton, }
S. B. Bancroft, Buffalo, N. Y.
John Brown, Buffalo, Kan.
Wm. Gorman, New Britain, Conn.
Juliet H. Severance, M.D., Milwaukee, Wis.

Fifteen Liberals in all hav now joined the National League as annual members. This is a fair beginning; but there is room for a thousand more. Every five annual members help the League treasury as much as a new auxiliary, and each one exerts his influence in his locality.

I am glad also to report the following life members—adding Dr. Foote again to make the list complete: E. B. Foote, Sr., M.D., 120 Lexington avenue, New York; Chas. Eckhard, Earle's Hotel, New York; D. N. Harwood, Shelbyville, Ill.

This too is a fair beginning; but there is room for a hundred more. Every life member helps the League treasury as much as five auxilliaries, and enables us to put forth the effort to organize five auxiliaries.

Let the good membership of all kinds go on.

"While the lamp holds out to burn
The vilest Christian may return."

No Compromise.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of January 22d, I notice that you are laboring under a slight misapprehension of facts in regard to my release from the grasp of obscene Comstock and the United States courts. The facts in the case are these: About two weeks previous to the time fixed for trial I received a note from Hon. James H. Lane, prosecuting attorney, with a request to call for consultation. Complying with the request, Mr. Lane stated that the prosecution was willing to withdraw the suit providing I would acknowledge the publication and mailing of the Le Clair Pilot, which I had already done before Commissioner White at the time of his arrest. Mr. Lane then agreed to take the case to Keokuk, without my attendance, and ask the court to impose a nominal fine of $100 and costs, after which he would see that the fine and costs were remitted.

Under such circumstances, I felt it my duty to accept the terms offered, and walked out of the office once more to breathe the air of freedom and personal liberty. So you see it was not a "compromise." It was a square back down and out of the case on the part of the government. I hav never acknowledged to any guilt or violation of law, and never will.

Yours truly, H. L. BARTER.

Errata.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In my article in your issue of January 29th the sense of a statement was spoiled by your printers. The sentence, "I hav known cases of prolonged uterin diseases that had baffled the skill of the most eminent doctors to be perfectly cured by proper mating," was made to read "cured by proper treating." My name was also wrong.

I like the idea of a fund to help furnish THE TRUTH SEEKER to those unable to pay for it, and send you one dollar for that purpose, hoping a hundred others will do likewise. Yours,

JULIET H. SEVERANCE, M. D.

Constructiv Liberalism.

LESSON III.

THESIS.

The relations of Man to his world hav been so far made out by Modern Science that they giv an affirmativ and constructiv basis for human life, thought, and feeling, to the exclusion of Theology.

Law, matter, force, cause, life, are capable of relativ but affirmativ and reliable definitions.

TEXT DEFINITIONS.

I.—INORGANIC.

Science has two distinct procedures:

1. The investigation and classification of relations, condensing them into Laws.

2. The mathematical investigation of the relations of such relations, i. e., the reason of such Laws.

A Law is the formula of the facts.

A Theory is a formula of the reason of those facts.

A Hypothesis is a postulate which helps Theory where observation halts.—G. H. Lewes (Life and Mind, vol. ii, p. 299).

Matter is the Felt viewed in its statical aspect.

All we know is Feeling and the changes of Feeling.

We class the Felt apart from the Changes, the one as Matter, the other as Force.

The qualities of Matter are our feelings.

The properties of Matter are its qualities viewed in reference to the effects of one body on another rather than their effects on us.

Force is the activity of the Felt.

A phenomenon is a process; its causation is a procession. Nothing acts by itself; nothing is in itself [but in its correlativ antecedents and conditions].—Ibid, p. 232.

II.—ORGANIC.

Life is the definit combination of heterogeneous changes, both simultaneous and successiv, in correspondence with coexistences and sequences.—Herbert Spencer.

Life is the process of reaction which takes place in protoplasmic bodies only (however small or large those bodies may be) in answer to the forces, changes, and conditions to which they are subjected.—The Evolution.

For the tree of the field is man's life.—Deut. xx, 19.

Suchst du das Hoechste, das Groesste? Die Pflanze kann es dich lehren.
Was sie willenlos ist, sei du es wollend, das ist's.
—Goethe and Schiller.

Seekest thou the highest, the greatest? The plant can teach it thee.
What that unconsciously is, consciously be thou; that is all!

COMMENTARIES.

1. We can never again behold the heavens which appeared to the early navigators and to the Chaldean shepherds; that panorama has been replaced by one which is the consolidated thought of Hipparchus and Kepler, of Galileo and Newton. For it is the mind which sees, and the mind sees what it has been taught to see. We are never left to ourselvs. From the first the child is told "what" things "are;" his attention is directed to the distinctions already established. At his mother's knee he learns the legends of a mythologic past; at his school desk he spells the wisdom of a line of sages; in his library he fortifies himself with the results of research. . . His utmost effort is to see from the shoulders of the Present a little further into the future. Every one is weak standing alone; he leans on others and is strong.

2. Our perceptions are never isolated. . . If we see the bud, after we hav learned that it is a bud, there is always a forward glance at the flower and a backward glance at the seed, dimly associated with the perception. But what animal sees such things? What animal sees a bud, except as a visual sign of some other sensation?

3. Thus on all sides it appears that nature embodies the transfigured desires of man and the idealizing spirit of man. It is the work, the emotion, and the thought of Humanity. Watt and Arkwright hav not more transfigured and intensified the available forces of nature than Wordsworth and Turner hav transfigured and idealized her esthetic aspects. It is in this sense we must interpret Comte's sayings that the living are more and more dominated by the dead, and that between man and nature we must place Humanity.—G. H. Lewes (Life and Mind, vol. ii, pp. 122–124).

FLOWERS.

Your voiceless lips, O Flowers, are living preachers,
Each cup a pulpit and each leaf a book,
Supplying to my fancy numerous teachers
From loveliest nook.

Floral Apostles! that in dewy splendor
"Weep without woe and blush without crime,"
Oh, may I deeply learn, and ne'er surrender
Your love sublime!

In the sweet-scented pictures, heavenly Artist,
With which thou paintest Nature's wide-spread hall,
What a delightful lesson thou impartest
Of love to all!

Not useless are ye Flowers, though made for pleasure;
Blooming o'er field and wave, by day and night,
From every source your sanction bids me treasure
Harmless delight.

Ephemeral sages! what instructors hoary
For such a world of thought could furnish scope?
Each fading calyx a memento mori,
Yet fount of hope.

Posthumous glories! angel-like collection!
Upraised from seed or bulb interred in earth,
Ye are to me a type of resurrection,
A second birth. —Horace Smith.

THE LESSON.

Do not turn away from the texts and commentaries given to-day because they may seem at first unusual or abstruse. A little reflection will make them intelligible, and they may become of great value in founding the new faith in your mind. Let us giv the attempt to learn a patient trial. Inevitable ignorance is the only tolerable variety. There is nothing more mean and cowardly than wilful, boastful, and pretended ignorance, and yet that is very popular. The teacher or lecturer, to say nothing of the preacher, who hypocritically professes humble ignorance is pretty sure of a round of applause from audiences who think he is, in that, one of them, and whose "fellow-feeling makes them wondrous kind."

If any candid inquirer does try to straighten out the world so as to liv in it somewhat intelligently, these champions of ignorance set upon him with shouts of scorn or ridicule as if he were guilty of some crime or absurdity.

It is time to fix the value of this pretentious humility of ignorance. Let it be confessed, then, at once, as shown in our last lesson, that in any ultimate or absolute sense in which Theologians and Metaphysicians talk, man knows nothing and can know nothing. But this is just the kind of ignorance to which Priest and Presbyter will not confess. What no one can really find out they take great credit for knowing. With them formulated ignorance appears as the highest wisdom, especially if it has come down to us as antiquated and savage tradition. Ignorance is invaluable to them, because their God exists only in that which has not been found out, and disappears like ghosts at the dawn of knowledge.

But when they apply to relativ and human science the charge of ignorance, or that it is too limited to become the creed of mankind, the charge must be met by the assurance that science, in exposing theology, really takes its place. Science is the law, and so the real creed of the world. Every Liberal must therefore study it, not as others do, for use or honor, but as the basis and substance of his religion. In that view it acquires an interest and charm that makes the dryest details more interesting than the cleverest fictions.

The general laws and results of each of the Special Sciences hav been so popularized by easy and beautifully illustrated text-books that there is no reasonable excuse for the Liberal who fails to get a pretty good hold of their methods and results. Every one should keep within easy reach some of these popular and beautiful scientific works, especially in Astronomy, Physics, Chemistry, Vegetable, Animal, and Human Physiology, then in Sociology and History, to be followed by Morals, Art, Language, Psychology, Logic, and some works on Synthetic and Positiv Philosophy, like Spencer, Comte, or Lewes. At a proper time we will hav a list of such works presented in THE TRUTH SEEKER as a suggestion to those who would like to know what kind of a world we hav fallen heir to, and how to survey and work the great farm. A small part of the time and money wasted upon trashy literature and "amusements" will become the paying part of life if so invested.

No matter what the defects of education hav been in the past, it is never too late to be curious and to learn something. Liberals are not worthy of the name who do not know something of their own creed. It is not enough to earn that honored name to be able to expose the bibles and creeds of others; they must become affirmativly grounded in the Laws of Science. If then haughty, divine Ignorance insultingly asks: "Is this the man? Is it you, sir, that know things?" Shakspere's reply may be both truthfully and modestly used,

"In nature's infinit book of secrecy
A little I can read."

To aid, then, and to further the general review of the sciences above recommended, the texts given above will be very useful. It is only by such general fundamental conceptions that the details of the Sciences can be understood, mastered, and connected. The Laws that as warp hold our Cosmos together, pass from science to science, step by step, pyramid-like, up to and include Man himself.

Let us giv the first clauses of the new creed. It might be worded in the old formula, somewhat in this wise, as far as the material word is concerned: I believe

1. That the World that surrounds Man is infinit and unknowable to Man, except as he is able to observe it and its laws as they appear to him.

2. That the Cosmos is the order of the world in so far as known or knowable to Man; and is known to him and modifiable by him only as interpreted by his senses and observation.

3. That the fundamental laws of the Cosmos at present known are the Law of Correlation and Conservation of Forces, and the Law of the Indestructibility of Matter.

4. That the laws of gravitation and of the movements of the heavenly bodies, known as Astronomy, are illustrations of this general Law of Correlation.

5. That the laws of the properties of bodies of matter in mass, which are formulated under the science of Physics—to wit, Barology, Acoustics, Thermology, Optics, Magnetism, and Electrology—are also instances of the same general Laws of the indestructibility, equivalence, and correlation of forces and matter.

6. That the Laws of equivalence, composition, and decomposition of the ultimate known constituents of bodies, known as the science of Chemistry, are also instances of the same fundamental laws.

7. That all of our knowledge of an outer world is to us but modes of feeling called sensation. That matter is what is so felt considered as at rest.

That Force is a synthesis of the changes in matter and not an entity.

That Law is a record of facts and changes formulated by human intelligence, and not an entity, force, god, or matter.

That Cause is the correlative antecedent, and Effect is the correlativ consequent, of any phenomenon taken together with the conditions existing around it.

That Space is the perception of interval or difference between what is felt or thought of as matter.

That Time is the perception of interval, in our states of feeling, or in the changes observed or thought of in matter.

These definitions, together with the texts given above, seem to be needed in order to get the material sciences, Astronomy, Physics, and Chemistry, down upon the hard-pan of the human or subjectiv synthesis, upon which all true Science must rest, if it would escape the bogs of Theology and Metaphysics as their foundation, and which are the only foundations usually given to them.

How much these definitions imply, what loads of Speculativ, Theological, and Metaphysical nonsense they affirmativly displace, will be gradually perceived as we advance. They are the subjectiv or human foundations of the grand Material Sciences. They are the needed axioms which connect these Sciences directly with MAN as the center of the human Synthesis or new Faith.

But now it is claimed that we hav reached an impassible gap, which lies between these material sciences and the organic or vital Science of vegetable and animal life known as Biology.

Some God, it is still generally claimed, must be invented to help us over this bottomless chasm in which even the Law of correlation, so true everywhere else, wholly fails.

Even Carlyle, in his glorious "Sartor Resartus," thinks this gap is the end of Science. He exclaims: "Poor Devil! Doth not thy cow calve? doth not thy bull gender? Thou thyself, wert thou not born? wilt thou not die? Explain me all this . . or weep that thou art hitherto a Dilettante or sand-blind Pedant."

These words finely illustrate the ignorance of which we spoke above. Instead of weeping, if we only giv the subject fair attention, we shall find that the explanation is already fairly made out by Science.

There is really little more "mystery" now in Biology than in other branches of Science when the increased complexity of the phenomena, and the kind of explanation possible, are considered. But Science is in a far different condition now from what it was when Carlyle meditated Sartor, and proves how soon it can silence the ignorant reproaches of ignorance.

What Newton and Laplace did for the material Sciences in the last century, Darwin, Haeckel and their compeers hav done for Biology in our century. Their success has made it a glorious thing for us to liv as their contemporaries.

For an outline even of the "vital sciences" as now constructed by the great modern Biologists, reference must be had to their works. Surely nothing can be more interesting than the works of Darwin, Huxley, and Haeckel, and it would be idle to try to condense them here. In them we are indeed made to pass a great gap, from the great material world with its many elements to the little organic world with its five or six elements, and which is nothing more than a microscopic m old existing only on the surface of our planet when compared with its mass—and how small our planet is in the whole cosmos! Never forget that gap nor compare the great world to the little, or vice versa.

A few words as to another gap, as to the forces operating, may be useful to get over the effects which the divine and boastful ignorance has largely produced on the average reader, to wit, that Biological phenomena cannot be understood and are in fact, utterly "mysterious." Let no one take this for granted without a trial. Things are in one sense all apt to be mysterious and wonderful, which is only saying that we are stupid and ignorant. In sciences so comparativly new our best theory may be properly held only as a working hypothesis, but as such the law of evolution is to Biology and Sociology what gravitation is to astronomy and physics. Let it be understood that it is the only theory or hypothesis that has a fact to stand upon. The hypothesis of "creation" has not a single fact. Not a single instance of creation has ever been known to occur. Indeed under the law of correlation it is impossible and unthinkable.

There ought to be no end to the interest with which every intelligent person should follow the tracing out of the true steps of our own race into the fact of being. Darwin, Haeckel, Huxley, are three leaders in this work of revelation, and their books are all designed to be popular, and are readily understood with a little patience and attention. They are not for the specially learned alone, and do not need a priesthood to interpret them. Haeckel's books are especially popular. The glossary at the end of the volumes should be first consulted, and then common sense and observation, and a little of the time that is usually wasted, will open up the new and true world of wonders to the reader.

The first wonder is that all this living world, vegetable and animal, from the speck that the finest microscope can hardly reveal to the giant trees of the forest, or to the elephant, whale, or Man, is really but the varying forms of one simple substance, now commonly known as Protoplasm. We, and all living things known, are but parts of one Protoplasmic World. In its simplest forms this substance is a jelly, and as it is slightly varied in form or constituent parts we call it Proteine, Fibrine, Albumen, Caseine, etc. But at its simplest it is the proteine, plasson; or protoplasm which is woven up into the living world.

Of what does this singular colloid, i.e., uncrystallized, substance consist? Chemists tell us that of one hundred parts there are aproximately of Carbon, 55; Hydrogen, 7; Nitrogen, 16; Oxygen, 21; Sulphur or Phosphorus, 1 or 2. With these constants other substances—as phosphate of lime to form the bones, and iron for the blood—are brought in and made useful for various purposes in all animal bodies.

But the condition and beginning of all life, animal or vegetable, is the presence of this singular Nitrocarbon plasm or jelly. By reason of its entire dependence upon this substance, life, and all the properties of life, are entirely cut off from and are never to be attributed to inorganic matter nor to unprotoplasmic substances, nor to "entities" or "spirits," which hav no known substance at all. There is a chasm here, a gap that is intelligible; not "mysterious," but an observed fact to be honestly recognized.

For what is life? It would be pretentious to giv any very fine or final definition, but we do at least know of it as the "process of reaction of protoplasmic bodies only (however small or large those bodies may be) to the forces or changes to which they are subjected." This process is the peculiar and exclusiv property of protoplasm. Its molecules are chemically in unstable equilibrium, and a change at one point in any body of it is followed by a change continuing and reacting throughout the molecules of the mass. Thus we for the first time gain a clear notion of what life is—it is not material nor spiritual, not a force nor an entity, but a process or succession of changes in bodies of protoplasm, consequent upon the environment and its changes and forces.

This process is not the result of the component parts of the protoplasm itself chemically considered.

That is, life is not the chemical or correlativ result of the matter or forces of the elements which make up the protoplasm, but rather it is the correlate of the forces and conditions which externally act upon the protoplasm and so cause the reactiv vital change or process. Chemistry and chemical forces make the substance protoplasm to be of such texture and state that it reacts to the forces of the world about it in a way we call living. This living is the result of the outer forces and conditions to which it thus corresponds. To illustrate:

The shaking of a jelly is not from the chemical changes in its substance, but from the jarring from the world about it. So life is the action of organisms in answer to their environment. We must not here look for single lines of correlation as we isolate lines of change for inquiry in physics and chemistry. In all organic and social sciences every event is a correlate not of the components of the organism but of the world then existing and acting upon the organism which is in a state to respond. Protoplasm is in a state to respond to its environment as a whole, and this continuous response is what we call life. It is a fact observed and to be accepted just as we accept every other fact in nature. It is just as mysterious as every other fact, but not more unless we wish to make it so.

What legions of ghosts, spirits, and assumptions, materialistic and other, are laid forever by this discovery at the threshold of the new world of Biology! The gap exists, but science fully accounts for it and explains it.

It follows of course that life has not been "created" nor spontaneously generated. It has simply always existed wherever protoplasm has existed under the proper conditions of moisture and warmth to enable the process of changes which constitute life to go on. In the simpler forms of plants and animals we see this fact of the suspension and revival of life frequently illustrated in the æstivation of dry and wet seasons, and the hybernation of winter, and in the resuscitation of animals drowned or suffocated.

But where did the protoplasm come from? Evidently from the material world out of whose sixty or seventy elements it has gathered its six or seven. But when or how this substance was first produced it seems idle to speculate. That it is being formed now wherever the proper conditions occur we shall probably soon learn. There are so many chemical forms of it, and of substances similar to it, that it will probably not be long before it will not only be found but made or prepared by our chemists.

Of its existence as the first round of the vital ladder there is no doubt. From this simple life-exhibiting substance up to man, "the paragon of animals——the beauty of the world—in action like an angel, in apprehension like a god," Haeckel takes us by simple stages from age to age of animal evolution and geological development. First he shows the simple unnucleated gelatin. From this simple uncelled plasm he shows that cells are formed as in the case of the "Monera" and simple Amœbæ, viz., protists or first animal forms, without sex. They propagate simply by division or throwing off of cells, and form the simple, general, and ancient kingdom of living beings, from which on one side plants hav been evolved, and on the other side animals, ending in Man. The first chapter in Biology is this most interesting world of simple forms or protists, and then the vegetativ processes of plant life, with its glorious revelation of phænerogams or open love by means of flowers, which hav been evolved from the lower life forms.

If attention is paid, so as to become familiar with the vegetativ processes of these two worlds first, there will be much less of difficulty, and thus much less "mystery" afterward in unraveling animal and human physiology. The principal difficulty in understanding these higher and more complex forms of organic action, or life, is that the first steps hav not been mastered in the growth and cell life of protists and plants. Supposing that to be done, to some extent at least, our next lesson will glance at the "mysteries" of animal life and mind. Now let us turn to the esthetic side of our subject.

Hav the feelings of man remained unmoved in the presence of this affirmativ revelation of the organic world? By the example of Faust we showed how the cosmic emotion had a regenerativ influence under the new faith, healthy, healing, invincible. The world of plants and flowers teaches also "the best and the highest" by its constant tending to the fulness of life, the highest life it can gain. The lesson of quiet, persistent, unconscious performance of duty taught by the plant is the one lesson we are to illustrate in our conscious struggle and toil of life. Still more are we taught by the opening flowers, which are the loves of plant life. The human soul has ever gathered them to itself as the symbols of its own moods, loves, hopes, sympathies, and even eternal destiny.

I shall not trust myself to speak on this subject, which each one has or will make too sacred for words by his or her own heart version. Two interpretations of flower symbols let me lay before you, because of their singular beauty and apparent contradiction. The first, in our texts is a "Hymn to Flowers," which closes with hope, in strange contrast with the beautiful poem which will close our musings to-day. The contradiction, as good novelists are wont to do, will be left for you to ponder over and solve if you can until our last chapter. The symbols will perhaps then become clearer. Meanwhile let them both be felt and enjoyed as they are. The explanation will come in the proper time.

This closing poem from Rueckert, "The Dying Flower," is in itself exquisitly beautiful and touching. It will hav an additional charm for those who not long ago heard it recited before one of the Liberal societies of New York by a lady whose sterling worth, grace, and usefulness made her then the flower, but whose devoted and noble resignation now, under threatening fate, givs to her flower symbol a sad reality, so that it seems no longer a symbol or a poem, but the story of a beautiful human life.

My translation is not only linear and literal, but by the revising skill and taste of Mr. Courtlandt Palmer kindly given, it has become poetical to a degree that I believe is unusual in strictly accurate translations. It may be done better. It deserves to be done as well as possible. I would thank the reader, who may appreciate it, to help me to transfer it still more perfectly to our language.

THE DYING FLOWER.

BY FRIEDRICH RUECKERT.

THE POET.

Hope on! Thou wilt outliv it yet,
Liv till the spring's return from death;
The flowers are hoping one and all,
Though blasted now by Autumn's breath;
In silent potency of buds
They hope the weary winter through,
Till stirs the vital sap again
And bids the green burst forth anew.

Hoffe! du erlebst es noch,
Dass der Frueling widerkehrt.
Hoffen alle Blumen doch,
Die des Herbstes Wind verheert,
Hoffen mit der stillen kraft
Ihrer Knospen winter lang
Bis sich wieder regt der Saft
Und ein neues Gruen entsprang.

THE FLOWER.

Alas! I am no mighty tree,
That for a thousand summers grew,
And which from out a winter's dream
Will weave its spring-born poem anew.
Ah me! I'm but a summer flower
Awakened by the kiss of May,
Not e'en a trace of me there'll be
When o'er my grave the snow-drifts play.

Ach, ich bin kein starker Baum,
Der ein Sommertausend lebt,
Nach vertraeumtem Wintertraum
Neue Lenzgedichte webt.
Ach, ich bin die Blume nur,
Die des Maies Kuss geweckt,
Und von der nicht bleibt die Spur,
Wie das weisse Grab sie deckt.

THE POET.

But surely, since thou'st bloomed at all,
Thou little life of modest mood,
Take cheer! for seed crowns every flower—
That law at least holds ever good:
Then let cold death's relentless storm
Thy dust of life all-widely strew,
From out that seed-dust thou wilt yet
A hundredfold thyself renew.

Wenn du dann die Blume bist,
O bescheidenes Gemueth,
Troeste dich, beschieden ist
Samen allem, was da blueht.
Lass der Sturm des Todes doch
Deinen Lebenstaub verstreun,
Aus dem Staube wirst du noch
Hundertmal dich selbst erneu'n.

THE FLOWER.

Tis true there will liv after me
Bright flowers who like me will bloom;
Eternal is the world of green,
Yet every floweret fades so soon!
But though they liv as once did I,
Yet will my own self life be o'er,
Now am I, I, so real and true,
Before I was not; soon—no more!

Ja, es werden noch mir bluehn
Andre, die mir aehnlich sind;
Ewig ist das Ganze-gruen,
Nur das Einzle welkt geschwind.
Aber sind sie, was ich war,
Bin ich selber es nicht mehr;
Jetzt nur bin ich ganz und gar,
Nicht zuvor und nicht nachher.

And though through them the Sun's warm glow,
As now through me may pour its light;
That fact my fate will soften not—
That drops me into endless night.
O Sun! e'en now thine amorous eye
Woos from afar life soon to be;
Why now, as if with scornful smile,
Mock'st thou through cloud-rifts at me?

Wenn einst sie der Sonne Blick
Waermt, der jetzt noch mich durchflammt,
Lindert das nicht mein Geschick,
Das mich nun zur Nacht verdammt
Sonne, ja du aeugelst schon
Ihnen in die Ferne zu;
Warum noch mit frost' gem Hohn
Mir aus Wolken laechelst du?

Ah me! that e'er I gave thee trust
When kissed by thine awakening ray;
That to thine eye for life I turned,
Until it stole my life away.
E'en now the remnant of my day
From thy mock-sympathy shall fly;
I will close fast my sicken'd heart
From thee, alone with self to die.

Weh' mir, dass ich dir vertraut,
Als mich wach gekuest dein Strahl,
Dass ins Aug' ich dir geshaut,
Bis es mir das Leben stahl!
Dieses Lebens armen Rest
Dienem Mitleid zu entziehn,
Schliessen will ich krankhaft fest
Mich in mich und dir entfliehn.

And yet my firmest ice of hate
Thou meltest into tears amain.
Oh, take, take thou my fleeting life,
Eternal one, to thee again!
Thy bright beam suns the bitter woe
E'en from my inmost soul away.
For all of thine that came to me
I, dying, giv thee thanks to-day.

Doch du schmelzest meines Grimms
Starres Eis in Thraenen auf;
Nimm mein fliehend Leben, nimm's,
Ewige, zu dir hinauf!
Ja, du sonnest noch den Gram
Aus der Seele mir zuletzt;
Alles, was von dir mir kam,
Sterbend dank' ich dir es jetzt:

For breathings of the morning breeze
To which I waved through summer's tide,
For all the troops of butterflies
That o'er me danced in dainty pride;
For eyes that brightened at my grace,
For hearts that of my perfume drank—
Since 'tis of these my life thou mad'st,
'Tis thou, Creator, I would thank.

Aller Luefte Morgenzug,
Dem ich sommerlang gebebt,
Aller Schmetterlinge Flug,

Die um mich in Tanz geschwebt,
Augen, die mein Glanz erfrischt,
Herzen, die mein Duft erfreut,
Wie aus Duft und Glanz gemischt,
Du mich schuffst, dir dank ich's heut.

A little jewel in thy world,
Although so very small was I,
Thou lets'dt me bloom in the field of earth,
Like yonder stars in thy fields of sky.
One breath yet I hav left—my last—
But this, my last, no sigh shall be;
One glance I'll cast to heaven above,
The world will then be one with me.

Eine Zierde deiner Welt,
Wenn auch eine kleine nur,
Liessest du mich bluehn im Feld
Wie die Stern' auf hoehrer Flur.
Einen Odem hauch' ich noch,
Und er soll kein Seufzer sein,
Einen Blick zum Himmel hoch
Und zur schoenen Welt hinein.

Eternal flame-heart of the world,
Oh, let my light go out in thee!
O Heaven, spread out thy tent of blue;
My withered one now drops from me.
Yet, O Spring, to thy splendor hail!
Hail, morning incense of the plain!
Without regret I fall asleep,
Without a hope to rise again.

Ew'ges Flammenherz der Welt,
Lass verglimmen mich an dir!
Himmel, spann dein blaues Zelt,
Mein vergruentes sinket hier.
Heil, O Frueling, deinem Schein,
Morgenluft, Heil deinem Wehn!
Ohne Kummer schlaf' ich ein,
Ohne Hoffnung aufzustehn.

More Ill-Advised Legislation.

Some ten days ago or more Assemblyman Murphy introduced into the Legislature of this state a bill to prevent the evidence of detectivs, spies, and informers, who act without authority from the district-attorney, being taken to send persons to prison. To counteract this bill, and to increase the power already reposing in Comstock's hands, Assemblyman Warring introduced a most objectionable measure, which provides that the Society for the Suppression of Vice shall directly enforce all laws in relation to raffling, lotteries, betting, gambling, etc., and also indecent or obscene plays.

If this bill becomes a law it will virtually supersede the offices of the police and the prosecuting attorney, placing the power instead in an agent created by an ecclasiastical society, a position not provided for by the Constitution of the state or of the United States. The person holding this position will be empowered to enter any theater or place of amusement and arbitrarily close it should he take a notion to do so. It would clothe him with power in that direction that is not possessed by the chief of police, the prosecuting attorney, or the mayor himself. He will be made the sole arbiter, with dictatorial power over gaming of every description, even of the most innocent sort. As has been said by one of our dailies, "He could forbid what lotteries he pleased, and allow others to operate. He would, in fact, be clothed with a power equal to the district-attorney, sheriff, and superintendent of police all in one.

As this bill is introduced in the interests of ecclesiasticism and of the church party, it is to be expected that every influence within the control of the party will be used to secure its passage. It has been asserted that Anthony Comstock himself drew the bill, and that he wishes an increase of power to oppress and array his fellowbeings. before the courts and to thrust them into prison there is not a particle of doubt. The influence of the church will be brought to bear in the case, and as monstrous as the proposition is, great fears are entertained that it will become a law.

However meritorious it may be to suppress lotteries and improper exhibitions, it is most desirable that they should be done by the appliances provided by the Constitution of the state, and in existence, and not by the exercise of ecclesiastical power or by the self-appointed agents of sectarian societies. It is to be regretted that any who count themselvs as Liberals should for a moment advocate and sustain that kind of legislation. We hav already had too much of it, and it is to be hoped the principles of our liberties will be not further endangered, and that the guarantees of the Constitution will not be needessly disturbed.

Most desirable would it be that honest and efficient men could be appointed to the positions of prosecuting attorneys and policemen and then there would be no need of ecclesiastical societies for the Prevention of Vice and the Prevention of Crime to employ unprincipled agents at salaries of $4,000 or more per year to usurp or hav delegated to them the power justly belonging to the prosecuting attorneys, policemen, etc.

Ecclesiastical justice, or rather ecclesiastical control, has been the most tyrannical and severe the world has known, and it is greatly to be dreaded lest in the last quarter of the nineteenth century that kind of power should increase among us. Let every lover of liberty, every reasonable man, frown down this species of usurpation and unnecessary legislation. Let us look to the officials and courts provided for in our Constitution, and discountenance so far as possible the creation and domination of sectarian and "religious" societies. If our judges, prosecuting attorneys, and policemen fail to perform their duty, let them be replaced by upright, efficient men; but let not any more Comstocks or Whitneys be empowered to imprison and disgrace men better than themselvs. Let us shun ecclesiasticism as we would a upas tree.

Thomas Paine's Birthday

Was celebrated in an unostentatious manner in Science Hall, in this city, on Saturday evening last. A fair audience was in attendance. The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER presided, and made only a few brief remarks. Speeches were made by T. B. Wakeman, S. P. Andrews, H. B. Brown, Captain George Lloyd of New Rochelle, and Mr. J. W. Fankel of Newark. A fine original poem for the occasion was read by S. P. Putnam, and another by H. A. Stone. Prof. A. L. Rawson intended to hav been present to deliver a short speech, but illness prevented. The remarks, however, which he had written out were read by S. P. Putnam. The speeches delivered were appropriate to the occasion, and were well rendered and duly appreciated by the audience, who applauded heartily. Mr. Putnam's poem and some of the speeches will perhaps appear in a future issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Several letters were read from friends at a distance who were not able to be present. Attention was also called to the condition of Paine's monument at New Rochelle, being considerably damaged by the ruthless hands of visitors, who, probably to possess themselvs of a piece of the monument, hav broken off the corners and thereby defaced it materially. Donations were called for to repair it, as well as the wall around the enclosure. A collection was taken for the purpose.

It is cheering that the birth of Paine has been commemorated in so many places in the country. At Knickerbocker Hall in this city another Paine meeting was held by a select company, at the same hour as the above, by gentlemen who were not aware in time that a meeting of the kind would be held in Science Hall. An enthusiastic meeting was held in Paine Hall, Boston. Another celebration was observed at Linesville, Pa.; another at Kansas City, Mo.; another at Waverly, Iowa. We thank the friends who sent us invitations to be present, including one from Dowgiac, Mich. Thomas Paine assuredly is worthy of the remembrance and gratitude of every free American citizen.

An Aged Truth Seeker.

Mr. John Grant, of New Orleans, a venerable reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, called upon us a few days ago and afforded us a most pleasant interview. He is in his eighty-fifth year, but is as straight and activ both in body and mind as most men at fifty. He has been the father of nine children, four of whom are living; has now thirty-one grandchildren and forty-eight great-grandchildren. He has been a resident of New Orleans and Mobile nearly seventy years, and never left his home on account of any epidemic disease, and passed through one siege of yellow fever. He is a man of remarkable health and preservation for his years. He inherited a fine constitution from his parents, nativs of Maryland, and has never impaired his system by intemperate or injurious habits. He has never made use of alcoholic drinks, malted, fermented, or distilled; has made no use of tobacco since he was seventeen years of age, eats no animal food, and takes no medicine. He eats but two meals a day, taking one or two boiled eggs for breakfast, with milk and oatmeal pudding. For dinner he takes rice and milk, with potatoes or other vegetables, bread and butter and a cup of coffee. He has been an unbeliever in the dogmas of theology for more than seventy years, and enjoys the hope of life beyond the grave. He has been an activ man all his life. He has been a government contractor in public works, being the oldest of that class in the country. For many years, also, he was steamboating.

He believes if nature's laws are followed in prenatal conditions, and if men and women will liv right from their childhood up, they will suffer very little from disease and pain and liv to old age, dying, like the running down of a clock, without pain or suffering. He bids fair to liv twenty years longer, and we hope will continue to enjoy reading THE TRUTH SEEKER till a hundred years of age. He thinks it the best Liberal paper in the world.

Our Balaam's A.S.S.

Consistency is a jewel! We never felt the force of the above remark more amazingly or amusingly than when trying to get to the end of the almost interminable address of the "Association for State Secularization," with which our seceding friends at Chicago hav favored the world, but not us, for no copy of it has been allowed to reach our benighted sanctum. A friend has kindly smuggled a copy in for us, much as a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER would reach the exquisitly pure Mr. Bundy. That life is short and some articles are long was the first reflection when we began to wade through the fourteen closely-printed columns of this admirable Address, for admirable it is to such a degree that its merit excuses its length, and there could not possibly be higher praise. No abler vindication of the National Liberal League has yet appeared, and the reason is that it is simply and purely National Liberal League work, and belongs to the movement that the League can only effectivly foster and represent. It is an egg that ought never to hav been laid outside of the League, and which never can be hatched outside of it. Its appearance outside of the League is simply an accident which both and all parties interested in the same cause had better forget as soon as their zeal and interest in the cause can get the upper hand of personal differences and animosities.

Great men with great undertakings may learn much from our feathered friends, as Æsop proved long ago. Hens who hav been very important, fussy, and proud will sometimes get on a strike and refuse to honor their old nests if adjusted with modern improvements. Yet lay they must, for the egg already grown within cannot otherwise be disposed of, and so out of mere spite the egg is dropped outside in the cold, and the cackle is raised just as though the result had fallen in the genial nest, where it would giv a future chick. The egg must be put back into the nest where it belongs, and the hen must go with it or soon furnish material for the pot-pie.

That is to say, this grand Address has no sense, place, consistency, or meaning outside of the Liberal League movement. It is only consistent with, and its logic directly leads to, the resolutions of the last congress of the League as to the Comstock legislation, on account of which its authors pretended to secede.

Why shall we go for absolute divorce of church and state in all other particulars, even to the smallest details, as to taxes, oaths, tests, laws, Bible-reading, chaplains, thanksgiving proclamations, etc,, etc., as they so ably specify, and then hand over to the churches and their Agents the enforcement of the criminal laws that bear directly upon freedom of thought and speech, and of the press and mails? Why strain at gnats and then swallow the largest camel that foreign ecclesiastical law is really trying to acclimate in our country? If secular government is the thing for every other offense, why do these advocates of secularization insist upon church and amateur society censorship and government as to the offenses that touch most nearly the free thoughts and feelings of the people?

Why do they insist that the United States post-offices shall be used as detectiv bureaus of those church amateur societies instead of being simply a post-office of and for the people?

The complete secularization of the governments, state and national, was just what the League asked, and all that they asked, at Chicago. If our venerable but fussy fowls had quietly meditated upon the situation instead of flopping outside, their egg would hav dropped in the nest, where it belongs. And now that they hav gone outside, what can they do? Try to associate with the clergy? Æsop's geese with the cranes! What do the cranes, who are living by preventing the secularization of the state, care for them? A few semi-clerical sentimentalists may pretend that they wish justice, but their words are merely paliations of their accusing consciences. They can do nothing, and dare to do nothing that will deprive the churches of pay and power. Priests are not the birds to make geese of themselvs by plucking their own wings. A thousand years of legal and illegal robbery hav taught them the art too well for that.

But a step from Æsop to "Holy Writ" reveals our seceding friends in their true role. They went out of the League to curse it. They were told at the time that they could not do otherwise than re-perform the part of Balaam's Ass. They could only bless in spite of their baulkiness and wish to curse. And so their Association, or State Secularization (Ass.), givs out a bendiction that covers all that the League they left has at heart. The absurdity and inconsistency is personal to the Balaams only; the A.S.S., they ride, is all right, but never ought to hav been driven out into the wilderness to curse the Israel, where it was foaled and fed, and of which it is and must be really a part or cease to be Liberal A.S.S. at all.

We hav treated this subject as seriously as we could, but one of our Western friends, a sterling Liberal, though somewhat of a humorist, attended the great Convention of these Balaam's, and givs its true inwardness in an amusing light in another column.

We hope the Address may be put into a form in which we can giv it a much larger circulation than it is likely to get. Good poultry wont often lay outside the nest; but when they do we will do all we can to get the eggs back to the nest where they belong.

What Objections to Christianity?

REPLY TO MR. MAIR'S FIFTH LETTER.

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: After having been home several weeks from my European trip I have just taken the time to read your very lengthy letter, No. 5, comprising eight instalments of an aggregate of twenty-four columns, equal to six dozen pages of an ordinary-sized book. If the length of your letter could be accepted as argument, a fair-minded jury would probably accord you a verdict; but as that can hardly be done, the decision will be deferred. On the other hand, if the magnitude of your effort indicates the necessities of your side of the question, none could deny your cause to be in great straits.

After the length of your remarks, I find myself unable to see that you have overthrown my arguments or positions. I do not conceive it necessary for me to follow you in all you have said, nor to use in reply half the space you occupied. I will only notice some of the points you have attempted to make, and mention some of the mistakes you have made.

First of all, let me say I did not intend to indicate the precise source whence Christian dogmas were derived, whether from Indian, Persian, Chinese, Chaldean, or Egyptian sources, but attempted rather to show that such dogmas existed before Christianity was known in the world, thereby indicating where its theories or ideas might have been borrowed. And I shall insist that those notions or creeds cannot be considered new or original which had been believed and promulgated centuries earlier. Few of the systems of the world's religions have been original or new; few have had an existence independent of other previous systems. They have all been founded in error and superstition, which has been more or less borrowed from older systems. A marked peculiarity is found between them, showing conclusively that they were borrowed more than invented, as I think I have sufficiently shown. Chistianity forms no exception to this rule.

It, moreover, is not my business to show that the religions of paganism were true, that they were perfect, or that their sacred books were written by inspiration, or that they were more faultless than the more modern system of Christianity. I do not believe that the Vedas, the Puranas, the Shaster, the Pymander, the Koran, or the Eddas were written or dictated by Deity, but doubt not they were penned by the finger of God quite as much as were the Jewish or Christian scriptures. I cannot see why one nation or people should have any superiority in this respect over others. I readily admit that the Vedas do not claim to have been written by inspiration, or by the direction of heaven, and it is precisely the same with the Jewish and Christian scriptures. In scarcely a book in the two collections can the claim be established that the writer ever claimed that he wrote by the dictation of the Divine Being. There is not the slightest authority for thinking those books were written at the dictation of heaven, save the assertions of priests, who lived hundreds of years later, and who, of course, knew nothing about it. There is not room for a rational doubt that all these books, like all others that were ever produced, were written by men. Men only can write books; none others have ever written books.

I readily conceded that pagan nations were polytheists, nor do I conceive that fact is particularly to their credit and I cannot see that it is to their discredit. If there is virtue in believing in one God it would seem more virtuous to believe in several gods. I notice that in the third paragraph of your letter you say it is set down for a truth that primitiv man was monotheistic, while in the very next paragraph you quote Max Muller to prove that he was polytheistic. It is a little difficult to see how both propositions can be true.

I hav not undertaken to prove that there was an accurate resemblance between the trinities of India, Chaldea, and Egypt and that of Christianity, but that the conception of the trinity is much older than Christianity I sufficiently demonstrated, and you hav not refuted it. It would indeed be very stupid in the founders of a new religion if they could not make a slight divergence from or improvement over the religious systems of a previous age. That India, Chaldea, and Egypt did believe in trinities and triads many centuries before the Christian era no sane man will deny. If the Christian trinity is true it always was true. It was true when God is believed to have talked with Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Samuel, David, Solomon, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel. If the Holy Ghost and the Son were real individualities and formed part of the godhead when God talked so confidentially with Moses, and was so intimate and familiar with him as to show him his back parts, it is very singular, to say the least, that to a special agent and devoted friend, to whom, in fact, he was so much indebted to carry out his plans, and even in preserving his honor and equanimity among the gods and people of surrounding nations, he never even hinted that he was not a full-fledged god and that it required his two partners, the Son and the Holy Ghost, to make up a regular full and perfect God, with all the attributes and perfections of a first-class deity.

It is almost inconceivable that a communicative sort of God who had plans and purposes that he wished his creatures to know and understand should never give even a wink or a nod as to his three-ply character. It is hard, also, to comprehend if the Son and the Holy Ghost were just as old, just as powerful, and just as individual and independent as the senior member of the firm, how they should be willing to be kept wholly in the background for over four thousand years and not be allowed to be seen or known, nor their names even breathed to Abraham, Moses, Joshua, Gideon, Nathan, Isaiah, Jeremiah, or Ezekiel, nor even to Daniel, who could dream out more hidden things than any man before or since. All the three Gods must have been very secretive, and known how to play the game of "mum," extremely well to allow two-thirds of the only three Gods or of the only one God to keep their names and their existence a profound secret for over forty centuries. It is either so, or Moses, Daniel & Co. were extremely stupid, with their lifetime intercourse with God, not to find out a tenth part as much about Jesus and his companion and the Holy Ghost as any little Sunday-school boy or girl now learns before they are eight years old. God is easier to find out now than he used to be, or the sons and daughters of men are vastly sharper than in the beginning when God was young.

But concerning this doctrine of the trinity—three beings without body or parts comprised into one being without body or parts—I trust you will grant me the same privilege you enjoy. You entirely discredit what is a sacred truth to the Brahman, to the fire worshiper of Persia, and to the holy priests of Egypt, and you hav a perfect right to do so. I claim the same right by your trinity—I do not believe in it at all. The pious Hindoo strongly believes in his trinity, but you snap your fingers at him, and speak flippantly about his monster gods and baseless vagaries. I think just as little of your trinity. I can see you have no more to base your belief upon than he has, and I snap my fingers, etc., just as you do. I see just as much proof that God is a quadrinity, or a quintimity as that he is a trinity, a triad, a duad, or a monad. All these absurd notions I regard as the outgrowth of superstition and ignorance. Let me call your attention to a short communication in this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER on the "Athanasian Creed," in which Dr. Southwick gives his clear understanding of what the trinity is: First, "the Father is made of none," nothing; "the Son is of the Father begotten," also nothing; the Holy Ghost of both the Father and Son, not begotten but "proceeding," but equally nothing. To you this may be "disgusting levity;" but to me it seems equally as sensible as your incomprehensible, impossible trinity.

I cannot see any justice or propriety in your aspersing the honest Brahmans and Buddhists because they believe in nine incarnations and one yet to come. If it is a virtue to believe in one incarnation, to believe in nine, and still look for another, ought to be nine times as virtuous. That Jesus was an incarnation, of Jah, Jahveh, or Jehovah, you of course fully believe. But as you easily throw all their incarnations behind you and call them the grossest of absurdities, so I throw yours aside and pronounce it the hugest kind of an absurdity, and it is simply amusing to see believers of one form of superstition and fallacy condemning others for believing no greater absurdity than their own. It is singular how you can so easily condemn a Hindoo for having a faith very similar to the one to that which you think is the only thing in the world to prevent damnation. You are like the patent-medicine man who denounces all other nostrums as frauds and quackery while with most earnest tones he assures those who will listen to him that they must take his physic or die. I do not want any trinity-physic or god-physic. The pure light, the pure air, and the pure water of nature are enough for me. These, with healthy food, proper exercise, and sensible habits, will preserve good health. I require no theological doctor to administer to me wafers, or pieces of bread, which, after making a few passes over them, he calls the body of God and says all who do not eat of it must go to hell. I am clearly of the opinion that the Hindoo preaches no greater absurdity than the Christian.

You have a good deal of fault to find with the belief of the Buddhists, and readily condemn them as the advocates of the grossest errors. I understand they are equally certain that you are also in the wrong, and that to harbor the belief of a Christian is intensely absurd. I am inclined to be fair with you, and declare you both correct in your opinions of the other. They believe that Gautama was an incarnation of the great God, and you say it is false. You believe that Jesus was the incarnation of the great God, and they say you are wrong. I pronounce the knowledge of one as great as the other, that their conclusions are as correct as yours, and yours as correct as theirs.

It is very easy for you to disbelieve the divine paternity of Buddha. I do not believe that his mother Maia was impregnated by a ray from a star. I do not believe it any more than you do; but I believe it just as much as I do that Mary was impregnated by the Holy Ghost coming upon her and the power of the Highest overshadowing her. It would require a great deal more than a bogus Matthew telling a dream-story of which he knew nothing, or a bogus Luke's story of a vision of which he had no knowledge whatever, to cause me to believe such an improbable and impossible theory or statement. You may reach a very high state in heaven by virtue of your credulity, but I doubt it very much. I am sure I do not wish to win heaven by such means. I grant you that the story about the paternity of Buddha is only a legend, but that of Jesus is equally as much so—simply an idle dream-story, and nothing more, without the slightest proof whatever. How men of intelligence, like yourself, can be gullible enough to swallow such an improbable story and utterly impossible event is very hard for me to understand. But thousands upon thousands of the simple devotees believed it of Buddha and Christna and several others, and you and thousands upon thousands of others believe it of Jesus. I cannot see any difference in the facility with which each class of believers accept utterly improbable statements without a scintilla of proof. I pity both classes and those equally deluded. But that the belief in Buddha, as of Christna, was cherished by millions long before the name of Jesus had been spoken, I have not only scores of eminent writers and historians to sustain me, but the rock-temples in various parts of India, which are known to be older than the Christian era. Even if it is generously admitted that the vagaries about the parentage of Jesus were not necessarily borrowed from India or Egypt, it must be insisted upon that the legends and stories of miraculous conceptions had existed in India, Chaldea, and Egypt hundreds of years before, and that those countries were not so far away as to render the borrowing and blending of religious superstitions and absurdities very easy and natural.

You are generous enough to admit that of the false religions of the world the belief in the teachings of Buddha is the best, and express the willingness to accept Buddhism as divine had it the same proofs of divinity that Christianity has. Allow me to say that, having embraced Christianity, and being a devout believer of its doctrines, you are very naturally prejudiced in its favor, and your judgment is necessarily biased, while with me the case is different. I am an impartial observer, being unbiased in my opinions by both systems, and I must give in my verdict that I see about the same justness in the claims to divinity in one case as in the other; but if any difference exists it must be decided in favor of Buddha. He lived a much longer life, practiced far more self-denial, uttered a far greater number of lessons of morality and self-abnegation, he has had double the number or followers, and still has; his followers have been less sanguinary, less pugnacious, more peaceful, more moral, and in every way as divine. That Buddhists are far older than Christians you will not be able to disprove.

By way of parenthesis you throw in the remark that there cannot be but one religion possessing proofs of divinity. I know not what authority you have for making such a statement. If one system has divine qualities attached to it, why may not others that possess very similar characteristics? Is divinity a quality so limited and so exclusive that only one system can boast of possessing it? Indeed, you remind me of the newspaper contest which took place some thirty or forty years between the proprietors of two Townsend's' Sarsaparillas. One was Jacob Townsend and the other was S. P. Townsend. Both claimed to be the true and the original, and almost the divine. For months the war waged lively, and it seemed hard to decide which was the real, simon-pure, original Jacob, and I do not know as it ever was satisfactorily settled; but the hoodwinked people finally lost all interest in the matter, and found both to be humbugs and ceased to patronize them. It is much the same with your rival systems of religion; many are finding that your claims to originality and divinity are without truth, and are relegating both systems to the domain of human production, denying the divinity part in toto. Until divinity can be better proved than it has yet been up to the present writing, it is idle for you Christians, as well as the Buddhists, to lay special claim to it.

The Absolute Proofs of Continued Existence.

BY E. A. CHAPMAN.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In The Truth Seeker of Oct. 2d, I made a partial statement of what Spiritualists accept as absolute proofs of a conscious future existence, and of the communion of spirits with mortals.

In continuing this subject I will say to all, let us step out into the broad fields of true Liberalism, where bigotry and blind intolerance are unknown and where we can study the philosophy of human existence through glasses that reveal truth exactly as it is. Whatever we do should be done in a spirit of charity, with an earnest desire to do good as well as receive good. "Come let us reason together" should be the motto of all true Liberals, and those who claim to be such and do not come up to this standard are Liberals only in name. I am certain there are very many who honestly believe Spiritualists are deluded and deceived, that some day, "some as yet undiscovered law of the mind" will be found that will explain away the spiritual theory. Some are really sincere and honest in their opinions that the phenomena of Spiritualism are ridiculously silly and unworthy of investigation. Such doubtless would hav ridiculed Benjamin Franklin and called him a silly old fellow. His kite, key, and Leyden jar, and what he did with them,were trifling matters, but who thinks of ridiculing Benjamin Franklin to-day?

So trifling a matter as the falling of an apple revealed to Newton one of the grandest truths the world has ever known. Is it possible the world of science has progressed to that point where small things are no longer worthy of notice? Some honestly believe Spiritualists are demented, that they hav a kind of softening of the brain which renders their imaginations inordinately large, and in this way account for what they call the "vagaries and hallucinations of Spiritualism."

One says, "Convince them in any way they hav no proofs and then they will join the Materialists." That's true. I once joined the Christians and no longer hanker after atoning blood or sanctified faith, therefore I should join the Materialists who are with us now all but the "continued in our next."

Another says, "It is my deliberate purpose to explode every vestige of Spiritual manifestations." To which I say, All right, brother. If you will only explode them so they will stay exploded, I for one will hold up both hands. The world has been cursed long enough with false ideas about a future existence. The agitation of this subject has caused untold misery and crime. There is but one way to stop the accursed rule of priestly bigots, and that is by the same methods Franklin and Newton employed.

We must discover and promulgate the truth. This is just what Spiritualism means, and what Spiritualists propose to do; and the fact that Christians make war on us with such vindictiv spite is proof that they understand what we are about. It is a fact that the more people know the more they find there is yet to learn, and it is equally true that many think they hav learned all that is worth knowing. This is the great trouble with Christians. They are taught that wisdom is foolishness with God, that they must substitute faith for knowledge, must trust in Jesus, the Holy Ghost, atoning blood, bibles, ministers, creeds, prayers, and in fact everything but reason, and the less they know the more they can trust and believe. They are consistent. But when men and women who hav outgrown all superstitions, who acknowledge no religion, creed, or faith but that of reason, who are rigid investigators of science, heroes and pioneers in the great struggle for human liberty, declare that "death ends all," and fix the limits to life and progression, when they refuse to investigate and ignore well-known facts and phenomena, which can be the only rational proof of continued existence, and ridicule those who do, they are not consistent, in fact are playing the role of the Christian with Christian left out. Some say, "If we had a beginning we must hav an ending," but science tells us nothing in the universe ever had a beginning, therefore, all the elements both physical and spiritual of which we are composed, always existed and always will.

But I am to deal with absolute proofs and not argument. We shall with Zoellner treat Spiritualism as a science, and subject all our facts to the crucible of scientific reasoning. The universe is divided into the physical and spiritual, and all facts pertaining to the spiritual may and doubtless will be eventually scientifically classified. I believe Spiritualism is the greatest of all sciences. I shall commence with the Rochester rappings and finish with independent slate-writing and full-form materializations which now occur in the presence of a score of well-proved and reliable mediums. We shall put upon the stand unimpeachable witnesses, men of science, the profoundest thinkers of the age, not obscure mountebanks, unprincipled tricksters, and low villains, who are always for sale to the highest bidder, and whose business is to deceive. Only the genuin phenomena, which occur in broad daylight and in the presence of thoroughly reliable and well attested mediums, will be presented, and not the trickery of unprincipled villains and tricksters who are always ready to betray the truth for a few paltry pieces of silver. We shall rely on such mediums as Mrs. Conant, Mrs. Simpson, Mrs. Richmond, A. J. Davis, J. R. Newton, Charles N. Foster, S. V. Mansfield, E. V. Wilson, and Henry Slade, and such representativs of science as Zoellner, Fichte, Flamarion, Aksakof, Wallace, Crookes, Varley, Sargent, Kiddle, Buchanan, Edmunds, Hare, Mapes, and others equally as renowned; and finally, on the most talented and learned performers of magic, such as Belachini, Maskelyne, Houdin, and Jacobs. By the unimpeachable evidence of these witnesses we shall prove absolutely the occurrence and the spiritual significance of clairvoyance, clairaudience, healing by laying on of hands, levitation, or moving of ponderable bodies without visible contact, independent slate writing, materializations and dematerializations of hands, faces, full forms, flowers, draperies, etc., rappings, noises, lights, voices, music, dreams, the wonders of the trance or mesmeric condition, talking and writing in unknown tongues, spirit photography, painting, and many other phases, and finally shall consider the wonderful significance of the fact that these phenomena broke out, after ages of silence, simultaneously, not only all over this country, but among all the nations of the earth.

By way of premise I will state, as I hav done before, that the universe is both physical and spiritual, visible and invisible, ponderable and imponderable, activ and passiv, positiv and negativ, intelligence—the essence and spirit of matter—and matter itself stripped of all force and life; that knowledge is a manifestation of the invisible, and that by knowledge only can we absolutely identify ourselvs to each other, or spirits to us; that spirits belong to and dwell in the invisible realms of refined and etherealized matter, and that if they cannot identify themselvs to us and prove absolutely their identity as living, conscious entities, then it is impossible for us to do so who are yet in the flesh. The physical is subject to so many variations, resemblances, and transformations that as a means of absolute identification, it is very unreliable. It is only the mind that is stable, and by its manifestation, which is knowledge, we are able to prove absolutely our identity and that of our friends.

We are fortunate, then, in being compelled to rely mainly on this most reliable of all methods of identification, the intelligence or knowledge which our friends in spirit life manifest to prove the spiritual significance of these phenomena. I shall again present as our first proof those mysterious rappings which occurred at Rochester thirty-two years ago. The intelligence which produced those rappings spelled out a message which claimed that the person whose spirit was communicating was murdered and the body buried in the cellar. Search was made, the body found, and the message verified in every particular. These points are too well authenticated to be disputed. Here was knowledge coming from an invisible, individualized intelligence, and this we claim to be the first authentic and absolute proof of future existence the world has ever received. If those rappings occurred, something produced them, and as no other solution has ever been given; and as we hav an identified cause which harmonizes with all that we know of the universe, we claim that the spirit of the murdered pedler did produce those rappings as claimed. It might be asked why he didn't expose the murderer. In spirit life revenge is quickly discovered to be an investment that does not pay, and as they see that our treatment of criminals is unphilosophical and more to satisfy revenge than justice, they are silent on this point. When we learn to treat criminals as we ought, then doubtless will the spirit world aid us in running them down. These spirit rappings occur to-day in the presence of thousands of the most respectable and intelligent people on earth, and they are invariably accompanied by an invisible intelligence which manifests knowledge of and givs satisfactory tests concerning a former earth life. These rappings are almost exactly identical with the tickings heard in the telegraph office. These two systems are not only identical in the manner of work, but also in the transmission of messages. As messages are received, both systems must require an operator at the other end of the line, and as the raps first occurred at about the time that telegraphy was discovered, we claim that we hav proved that the rappings are the ticking of the spirit telegraph through which we receive messages from spirit friends. If these rappings are a swindle then the telegraph must be, and there is no truth in it. To unbiased minds they are just as worthy of investigation as the loudest thunder, and so long as no other explanation is presented by those who oppose our theory but ridicule, we shall adhere to the belief that spirits produced them. Nothing can occur but in accordance with natural law, and those who ignore and ridicule these manifestations of invisible intelligences because materialistic science has not yet found laws to account for them, or because new fields or realms are presented for explanation, are simply repeating the errors of the past.

I shall next consider levitation, or the moving of inanimate and ponderable bodies without visible contact. Bodies are moved, first, in obedience to law and force alone, and second, in obedience to intelligence and force, apparently contrary to law. The first class, which includes the movements of air, water, ships, falling bodies, etc., we may readily understand, but when chairs, tables, stands, etc., poise themselvs on one or two legs, and walk around a room, dance, or beat time to music, when they manifest in a variety of ways all the intelligence of a human being deprived of speech, when articles of furniture seem thus endowed with life, hearing, memory, and reasoning faculties, we hav a class of phenomena entirely different, and which cannot be accounted for by the ordinary laws which govern matter. We must remember that science in its researches has yet scarcely crossed the threshold of the invisible realms of the universe. Mind, spirit, or the essence of matter is as yet almost an unknown quantity. Here we hav inanimate objects endowed temporarily with mind-powers which do not and cannot belong to the objects moved. We know absolutely that no inanimate object was ever stirred but by the application of some force outside of and foreign to it, acting upon it, and as we know too that knowledge is the manifestation of an organized intelligence, it only remains for us to identify the intelligence which originates and directs the force which produces those movements.

Now flesh, blood, bones, and brains are not mind, and if there is power in mind that is yet incased in the flesh, as those who oppose the spiritual theory claim, sufficient to produce these phenomena, then we see no reason why mind when not so encumbered cannot produce them. Our friends, the Materialists, so-called, claim that by some hocus pocus process, which they call "unconscious cerebration" (moonshine would be equally as appropriate), we produce these manifestations and don't know it. Now, I will giv a thousand dollars to any man who will make a table beat time to music, tell the exact age of, or giv a correct message from, some individual they never heard of, or lift a heavy piano with heavy men sitting on it, or produce rappings, and prove they did it with their minds. "Unconscious cerebration" ought to be capable of a scientific demonstration.

The question is, is it our minds, is it the devil, or is it our loved ones from spirit life who are present but invisible? We claim, and are willing to testify under oath, that we do not do it. If our minds produce these phenomena we certainly think we should know it. If my mind can make a piano beat time to music with heavy men sitting on it, and I not know I am the cause, it is the funniest conundrum I ever heard of. I am a geni, and the "Arabian Nights" is true, every word of it. Hurrah for "unconscious cerebration." Those who believe in that kind of "spookery" should be able to swallow the worst ghost story ever heard of and do no violence to their credulity. Surely our friends will not feel hurt if I laugh a little. They hav laughed so many times at our credulity, and we hav borne it so good-naturedly, it's a pity when we discover their credulity is so much larger than ours, we can not be permitted to smile just a little.

We are perfectly satisfied there is no devil, therefore, we are compelled to conclude that either evil spirits, or good spirits, or both, are the authors of this work. As they claim it and prove it I see no reason why we are not compelled to admit it. If evil spirits can manifest there is no reason why our fathers, mothers, wives, and children may not also. Had these phenomena been unaccompanied by intelligence, and, therefore, failed to threaten to overthrow the religious and scientific dogmas of the past, not a man living would hav stopped short of a thorough investigation and knowledge of their cause.

Men like Huxley, Carpenter, Tyndall, and Spurgeon ignore these phenomena simply because they are incompatible with their dogmatic notions concerning matter, death, and future existence. These men, who, like Franklin, ought to be the first to investigate, join hands not only in ridiculing but crushing out these phenomena, which promis to settle forever the great problem of the destiny of the race, and which has kept the world in turmoil and wars during ages of the past.

Ridicule is a power, and none realize this more than men of science and priestly bigots. The world to-day appreciates the grand work done by such men as Galileo, Franklin, Paine, and Morse. They too ran the gantlet of ridicule and cruel persecution. The sneers about the raps, table-tippings, etc., hav been rung in the ears of the people till thousands dare not investigate, dare not be known as Spiritualists, dare not admit they hav conversed with their friends in spirit life. I hav heard strong men say they hav thus conversed with spirit friends and then prove themselvs the most abject cowards by saying, "Oh, but I am not a Spiritualist. I don't want it known I hav told you this, or that I ever attended a Spiritual circle."

Such is the power of ridicule. Ashamed? Of what? The man or woman who will close the door in the face of father, mother, wife, or child, and refuse to converse with them because people laugh, is an arrant coward, unworthy the respect even of brutes.

Any one visiting Henry Slade, now in New York city, will hear rappings and see objects moved by invisible powers, and witness many other phenomena in broad daylight, with every facility possible for thorough investigation. Many other mediums I might name equally as reliable, but Mr. Slade has been tested and is fully indorsed by the ablest scientists and professors of magic living. Between slates which may be locked or tied together, and furnished by the investigator, and which Mr. Slade has never seen or touched, while hanging from a gas jet, lying on the table, or held by the sitter's hands, messages are written, the scratching of an inclosed bit of pencil being distinctly heard corresponding to the writing, and are always from the so-called dead.

I condense the following from a statement made in the Nov. 27th issue of the R.-P. Journal, under the caption, "Dr. Henry Slade:"

"Dr. Slade came to this city I think in June, 1870. I was introduced and had a sitting. I received on a slate placed under the edge of the table a characteristic communication, signed by the full name of my father. Another, addressing me as 'dear brother,' requesting me to tell the writer's husband a great many things in regard to herself and signed by the full name of my youngest brother's deceased wife. I then asked the spirits to write on the slate while I should hold it before my eyes. Two raps. I then asked, Do you mean by that signal that you will try? Three emphatic raps. I then turned my back to the table and medium, holding the slate before me. In a few seconds the pencil was moved by some invisible agency, writing, 'A. Farnsworth is well and happy." On hearing the writing Dr. Slade rose, leaned forward and said, 'That is something we do not often get.' The name I did not recognize, but the writer claimed persistently to be a relativ. I then took the slate to my brother, who, without hesitation said, 'It is probably our eldest brother's first wife, whose name was Abigail.' I had known her well, but she passed away many years ago. The phenomena of pencil writing without visible contact in plain view of the sitter is not new in Dr. Slade's presence. In this instance it contained all the elements of a most perfect and convincing test of spirit power if not of identity. I think no candid, fair-minded person can visit Dr. Slade without receiving something convincing and satisfactory.

"P. E. Farnsworth,
"19 Park Place, New York city."

A short time since I visited Dr. Slade and received the following significant message, written between two slates while suspended from a gas jet. My wife and L. A. Baker, of Lansing, were with me, and all distinctly heard the scratching of the pencil. The slates hung almost directly over our heads:

"My Dear Friends: Can you tell me why a theological education should be so constructed in its sentiments, so prejudicial in its tendency, constantly seeking to keep the masses in ignorance of this divine truth? Is it because they do not want to see the light that will lead them from error and prejudice? Spirits come to earth to make all mankind better, so you may enjoy the spiritual to which you all must come. H. C. Wright."

In that sitting I saw a large table rise and remain suspended a foot from the floor, was touched and grasped by what felt like invisible hands, saw the keys of an accordeon manipulated by an invisible power through an entire tune, saw a slate held by one of Dr. Slade's hands half concealed under the edge of the table, while on it I heard the scratching of a pencil as it wrote, on the upper side, answers to questions we had written on the under side, and carefully concealed, the scratching corresponding to the words written, and the answers matching the questions every time. During the entire sitting Dr. Slade's left hand was on the table in contact with ours, the slate being held by his right hand, which was in full view, and the writing being on the side farthest from his hand, opposit his thumb, just under the edge of the table. My face was within a foot of the slate, and I know absolutely the writing was produced by a power unseen. Mr. Slade sat with his body turned toward me and from the table, and at no time was any part of his body beneath it.

The same day Mr. Babcock, author of "Why Don't God Kill the Devil," in a speech, said: "Something touched me on my person opposit Mr. Slade which felt like a hand. What it was I cannot say, but I know it was not Mr. Slade, and I know, also, it was not the devil nor the Holy Ghost." Also Mrs. L. A. Pearsall, of Disco, and Mrs. L. S. Bailey, of Battle Creek, told me they were lifted by an invisible power and held suspended for a number of seconds. Also Dr. Johnson, of Coldwater, told me he received a message written in the handwriting of his father with unmistakable proofs of his identity. Also Mrs. John Dexter, of Evart, Mich., received messages in the well-known writing of both husband and daughter. Mr. Wilbur, of Greenville, an Adventist minister, in a speech, said: "I hav this day received absolute proofs of spirit communion. I know now that I shall liv again. No more faith for me. Spiritualism is true, and I shall now go back and undo the errors I hav promulgated. I thank God I must now work out my own salvation. I shall build on a rock."

Prof. Zoellner, in "Transcendental Physics," says: "Henry Slade having proceeded to St. Petersburg to fulfil his engagements with Mr. Aksaoff and Prof. Boutlerof, and to present the phenomena of psychography to the scrutiny of a committee of scientific experts, has had a series of successful sittings, in the course of which writing has been obtained in the Russian language. At one sitting writing in six different languages was obtained on a single slate. On Wednesday, February 20th, accompanied by M. Aksakoff and Boutlerof, Slade had a most successful sitting with the Grand Duke Constantine, who received them candidly, and himself obtained writing on a new slate held by himself alone."

The evidence presented in the following testimonial is of great value:

"At the house of Epes Sargent, on the evening of Saturday, March 13th, the undersigned saw two clean slates placed face to face with a bit of pencil between them; we all held our hands clasped around the edges of the two slates. Mr. Watkin's (the medium) hands also clasped the slates. In this position we all distinctly heard the pencil moving, and on opening the slates found an intelligent message in a strong masculin hand in answer to a question asked by one of the company. Afterward two slates were clasped together with strong brass fixtures and held at arm's length by Mr. Cook while the rest of the company and the psychic held their hands in full view on the table. After a moment of waiting the slates were opened and a message in a feminin hand was found on one of the inner surfaces. There were five lighted gas-burners in the room at the time. We cannot apply to these facts any theory of fraud, and we do not see how the writing can be explained unless matter in the slate pencil was moved without contact. "F. E. Bundy, M.D., Epes Sargent,
"John C. Kinney, Henry G. White.
"Joseph Cook,"

These gentlemen do not seem to accept Carpenter's "unconscious cerebration" theory. Joe Cook since said, "Spiritualism is a toad, and my mission is to pluck the jewel from its head and giv it to the people." It sounds well to hear such crawling, lying reptils as Joe Cook rant about toads. His reptilian brain for once found its true level. The public will find the jewel whether Cook fills his reptilian mission or not. When I think of that pious monster my mind reverts to the reptilian age, and I can almost see those horrid reptils as they emerge from their slimy pools all dripping with mire and filth unspeakable. We bid this slimy, lying, hypocritical monster begone. Spiritualism needs not the services of liars, calumniators, and hypocrits. Poor, perverted, dying Christianity is your nativ element, and she is welcome to your services. Yet I would gladly "pluck the jewel," if there is one, from his reptilian head, and illuminate it with the glorious light of the gospel of truth. We believe "the greatest of these is charity," and I for one can practice this even toward toads with false jewels.

The following well-attested fact must be accepted as positiv proof of continued existence. No other explanation is possible.

Giles B. Stebbins, of Detroit, related the following, which I condense, at the late Lansing camp-meeting. It also appeared over his own signature in the R.-P. Journal. He says:

"I was at the late Cassadaga camp-meeting. Mr. Kellogg and myself examined two slates and then handed them to Mr. R. W. Saur, a medium of Titusville, Pa. Mr. Saur, being on the rostrum before a large audience, then held the slates upon the outstretched fingers of his extended hand. We then heard distinctly the scratching of a pencil inside. The slates were turned over and the scratching was continued. When the scratching ceased I opened the slates and found a message signed H. H. Bouse, which I at once read to the people. A Mr. Rouse, chief of police, of Titusville, then came forward, and on examining the writing, said, with tears in his eyes, 'That is from my brother.' He then took from his pocket a letter, the last received from that brother, and on comparing them, the writing on the slate was found to be an exact fac-simile of the writing in the letter, the signature especially being perfect."

The fact that the late Prof. Hare, widely known as an able scientist, and an honorable man, found evidence of continued existence in the movements of ponderable bodies, is a fact that is worthy of our most earnest consideration. He constructed an apparatus with the letters of the alphabet so arranged that they could be moved without contact, and while it was so placed that the medium could not possibly see them, they were moved so as to spell out for him message after message from his friends in spirit life. This, to him, under absolute test-conditions, convinced him, and he ever afterward devoted his best energies to the promulgation of Spiritualism as a scientifically-demonstrated proof of immortality.

So much for proof No. 2. The above facts in reference to the movements of ponderable bodies we claim do absolutely prove continued existence. Here we hav power and identified intelligence. What more do we need? I will add the following to the testimony already adduced: M. Belachini, of Germany; John N. Maskelyne, of London; Robert Houdin and Prof. Jacobs, of France, the most learned and skilful conjurers the world has ever known, all declare that these manifestations are not fraudulently produced, and announce their adhesion to the spiritual theory (See Zoellner's Transcendental Physics).

Prof. Zoellner says, in his dedication to his third volume of Scientific Treatises, to Wm. Crookes, F. R. S.: "By a strange conjunction, our scientific endeavors hav met upon the same field of light, and of a new class of physical phenomena, which proclaim to astonished mankind, with assurance no longer doubtful, the existence of another material and intelligent world. As two solitary wanderers on high mountains joyfully greet one another at their encounter, when passing storms and clouds veil the summit to which they aspire, so I rejoice to hav met you, undismayed champion, upon this new province of science. If ever the ideal of a general peace on this earth shall be realized, this will assuredly be the result, not of political speeches and agitations, in which human vanity always demands its tribute, but of the bond of extended knowledge and advancing information, for which we hav to thank such heroes of true science as Copernicus, Galileo, Kepler, Newton, Faraday, Wilhelm, Weber, and yourself."

Lowell, Mich.

From Mr. H. L. Green.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

I thank you for your scathing arraignment of Gov. Cornell in your issue of the 22d inst. for his conduct in the case of Charles H. Phelps. If what you say of the governor is true, he should be detested by every lover of humanity. I cut out your editorial, and sent it to the governor for his consideration.

The Truth Seeker makes a fine appearance in its new dress and with its greatly improved head. I am glad you "put a head on it" so much superior to the old one. And the contents, I think, hav improved since the first of January. T. B. Wakeman's articles are admirable, the only objection to them being that they are a little to profound for the ordinary reader. I am pleased to see articles from the pen of Hon. Elizur Wright in The Truth Seeker—one of the best men Liberalism ever produced; and the speeches and articles of George Chainey read well. I hope he will often favor your columns with his clear, polished, and sensible communications. Fill The Truth Seeker with the productions of Wakeman, Wright, Parton, Palmer, Bradford, Chainey, and such other thinkers as they are, and it will not only be the best-appearing Liberal paper in the country, but will surpass all the others in real value. We want much better Liberal papers than we hav now, and much better readers of them—readers who are willing to aid them with pen and purse.

Soon the annual town-meetings will come off in this state. At those meetings will be a fine opportunity to get subscribers to petitions for the taxation of church property. I hav just got published a large quantity, and will be pleased to send to any persons who will circulate them. Can't we send up one hundred thousand names to this legislature? I will also furnish the address of the Secular Association, a pamphlet of 24 pages, for 10 cents. It is the most complete statement in favor of what the National Liberal League and the National Secular Association demand that was ever published. H. L. Green.

[From the Boston Investigator.]

"An Infidel Abroad."

This is the title of D. M. Bennett's latest book, embodying his letters written during a ten-weeks' trip in Europe; and if every Infidel would go abroad to such good purpose as Mr. Bennett, it would be worth while to send them all away occasionally.

But really these are the fullest and most interesting letters from Europe it has ever been my fortune to read. Besides being interesting and entertaining they co tain a vast amount of valuable and useful information. What a volume for winter evenings, for old and young! Everybody should hav a copy, and it is hoped that the talented and industrious author may dispose of so many thousands, and hundreds of thousands, of these books that he will feel abundantly able, in a financial point of view, to make the tour around the world, and then tell the story of his travels as pleasantly and agreeably as he has done in his ten-weeks' trip to Europe.

Susan H. Wixon.

Dear Friends: I hav arranged with Mr. Bennett so as to sell the "Darwins" myself, and I ask all who would like a simple story embodying our principles to try the book, and thus help me to help our glorious cause of universal mental liberty and social freedom. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Elmina D. Slenker.

Letters from Friends.

BALTIMORE, MD., Jan. 22, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I wish to contribute the amount of $5.00 to aid the Asiatic expedition particularly, and to make a suggestion or two when you reach the land of the Mongolians. Our priestcraft, as you know, hav been busily engaged ever since we can remember in trying to teach these so-called benighted people about our God, who of old commanded and sanctioned murder, theft, rapine, and all manner of atrocious villainies. And if the Asiatics had in any noteworthy degree accepted their teachings and patterned after the God held up to them, I should tremble for your safety among them. But inasmuch as their nativ virtue and the better inculcations of their nativ religion hav doubtless allowed but a small hold for our priestly humbuggery, I think you will find them leading comparativly correct lives. I hav no idea that you will find them as our theology teaches, the father divided against the son, and the son against the father, etc., and that a man's enemies shall be those of his own household. Now, I want to suggest that you procure an interpreter, and through him expose the humbuggery and true inwardness of our missionaries that are among these people. Display before them the immaculate book itself, not only that they hav not come to send peace on earth, but a sword, but that to be his true followers they must deny father and mother, wife and children, even hate them and their own lives also.

I think the Mongolians will hav sense enough, if we hav not, to tell them, in the language of Col. Ingersoll, that they "won't do," and repudiate the Christian crowd of vagabonds that infest their country.

I want you to be a regular scientific, truth-advocating, and priest-crushing missionary among them. Then we will accomplish a triumph over superstition, and the friends of Freethought will be proud of their well-tried champion's trip round the world.

Your friend, E. LIVEZEY.

SILVER PLUME, Col., Jan. 10, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Put me down for $5.00 for the round the world trip. Hoping there will be enough to raise all the funds you will need, I remain, Yours,

ABE. FISKE.

ST. THOMAS, ONT., Jan. 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Put me down for $5.00 for that trip round the world, and had I time to wait upon them personally I hav no doubt I could get a few to subscribe the above sum also. I agree with your correspondent S. D. Moore, of Adrian, Mich., that what we want to know about is Buddhism, Brahmanism, and more particularly about Christian missions, their effects upon those who hav received the Christian religion, and its extent, influence, and prospects; and I am sure that those who contribute to the trip will receive more than value in information never before given to the public. Co-operativly yours,

D. NEILSON.

MOMENCE, ILL., Jan. 14, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav been very much amused in the reading of your letters of travel in Europe, and hav taken some pains to hav others read them. All seem well pleased. They could not wait after they had read the first two letters, seemingly, for the next number. I gave a young Catholic the papers to read. He was delighted with them; said he would purchase the letters if they were published in book form; but the description given of the monk funeral settled him. He thought it was sacrilegious.

I see by the last two papers that you may take a trip round the world. That will certainly please all Liberals who hav read your letters of travel in Europe.

You will please put my name dgwn for $5.00 payable when you want it; also Charles Wiltse and Ichabod Stodard $5.00 each, all of Momence. I think you can get five hundred names.

Fraternally, H. S. HALL.

OTTAWA, ILL., Jan. 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Put me down for $5.00 for your trip round the world. Your extra copy of Jan. 1st I hav disposed of for three dollars, on condition you send it the remainder of the year. I like your new dress very much. It helps my old eyes.

Very respectfully, SYLVESTER BROWN.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Jan. 19, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: You may put me down for five dollars for your trip around the world, and as I notice quite a number of your correspondents hav each their individual pet schemes for your investigation while abroad, I also hav mine, which in a few days I may submit to you for your prayerful consideration.

Yours truly, RALPH HELM.

CARMARGO, ILL., Dec. 28, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find draft for eight dollars, for which send me your work entitled "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," and one year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

You spoke in your paper that you would circumnavigate the world provided you could induce three hundred men to giv $5.00 apiece, and you publish in book form the history of your trip and present one copy to each of the three hundred subscribers. In case you succeed I am willing to be one of the three hundred. Yours respectfully,

W. H. PEARCE.

DUDLEY, ILL., Jan. 20, 1881.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: Inclosed please find money order for six dollars.

You will put me down $5.00 for your journey round the world. Philip Brinkerhoff says tell you to put down $5.00 for him. I am with you to the end.

M. ROWE.

CARDOVA, ILL., Jan. 19, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: You can count on us for $5.00 for that journey around the world. We would like to hear what you would hav to say about the condition of the heathen, both intellectually and morally. We think your Christian proclivity is not so strong but what you could tell the truth about them, and that is what we do not believe observers hav done heretofore. M. and J. HOPE.

ROCK RAPIDS, IOWA, Jan. 12, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am reminded by the little tab that my subscription has expired, and that the needful is wanted to help open the eyes of the blind, and to crush the great monster, superstition; and a few more gigantic blows like the lecture of George Chainey's, and T. B. Wakeman's "Constructiv Liberalism," will enable us to say, "I see Satan fall from heaven." I do wish I could see those two men and thank them personally for such words of truth and soberness that are able to separate the truth from error. How can a cause fail with such noble champions? If you hav partially lost a great champion and noble man, as one of the leaders of your noble band, the herculean "Bob," you hav one, yea, more than one, who can fill the breach, whose sterling blows hit both right and left, and that will soon draw an invincible army, and the great cloud of error and superstition will grow small and beautifully less, until truth shall hav free course and honor, and be honored by all men.

The improvement in the appearance of the good old TRUTH SEEKER is very good. I will get a new subscriber for the extra number that I received if I hav to send for another copy myself. In all these years I hav distributed all my papers among reading men, free; and if you hav received no subscription in this county except mine, they must be theologically hide-bound monuments of Talmage or Joe Cook crazyology.

About the trip around the world, could you not be divided?—one-half go, and the other half remain as flag-bearer for THE TRUTH SEEKER? But anything that will make the cohorts of error and superstition avaunt, and afford you happiness while doing good, is in order; and if you lack just five dollars, when the rest hav all spoken, I will send it to you instead of giving it to build a Methodist house of error and superstition. If you should go, please enlist in your service the great apostle of St. Johns, M. Babcock, to close up their rear and spike their guns. He is a brick, and a large house of such bricks would be a greater sight than all the old musty cathedrals you saw while in Europe. Yours, C. W. HALL.

LONG LAKE, MINN., Jan. 15, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will find three dollars for my paper. If you should get enough subscribers to your Round the World Fund, count on me for a "V." Respectfully, O. B. BROWN.

COTTONWOOD, KAN., Jan. 6, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: I passed my station. Here is three dollars for a round trip. Count me in five dollars for your trip around the world.

Your well wisher, L. P. SANTY.

WINNEMUCCA, NEV., Jan. 16, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send $20 to assist you on your trip around the world, on which I hope you soon will be able to start. Your "Infidel Abroad," when ready for delivery, I shall be pleased to see and read, as I hav only read a few of your letters from Europe, but was very much interested in them. The style you hav of telling what you see is captivating and a person like you with such a wonderful gift should be on the go.

If you should chance this way overland to San Francisco, let me know by telegram two or three hours before the train should arrive here and I will meet you at the train. Yours truly, W. F. STEVENS.

[We heartily thank our generous friend for his liberality and promptness. If the proposed journey is not made his money shall be returned. If the journey is made it will be in an eastern instead of a western direction, visiting Europe first, then going from Greece to Constantinople, then Egypt, Palestine, India, China, Japan, etc., returning to San Francisco. We will be most happy on our way home to call on our generous friend, also to see many other good friends on the western side of our continent.—Ed. T. S.]

ALTOONA, PA., Jan. 23, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: I sincerely hope you may obtain subscribers sufficient so that you can make the circuit of the globe. Please to visit the grave of Adam and Eve, tell us something about the dogs of Constantinople, bring me back a Circassian beauty, stop at Altoona and visit the largest railway shops in the world, and put me down for $5. Yours for success,

W. J BURNS.

PEORIA, ILL., Jan. 15, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Max Deere and myself will giv you $5 each for the trip around the world. We would like to see the Testimonial if you hav any left.

SAM. WEBBER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 1881.

MR. EDITOR: After consulting with Mr. John Cosgrove, you may count each of us in for the trip around the world with the proposed collateral.

JAMES C. LEHMER.

EAST DUBUQUE, ILL., Jan. 25, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I will hold myself ready to contribute $10 for your trip around the world, and will forward the same as soon as I can learn from you that you hav so determined. It appears from your showing that there is a deficit of $140.00 on the Brussels fund. Well, it will stand as a lasting disgrace if this is not wiped out by the Liberals, and will not look very much like liberality if any portion of the $400 is left for you to pay. Where are the many Liberals that were urging you to accept the duty of representing them in that Congress, which you did? I should like to inquire of such if they can sleep quietly without responding in a material form to aid in paying the expenses of the same. There are, as it appears, a large number of Liberal friends ready to urge upon you certain duties who consider their duty ended upon your accepting the same. I wish Leland or Palmer would write an article showing up such contemptible liberality. I gave only five as called for, but consider it my duty to giv at least ten more if required.

Your showing of the apathy of some of your patrons is rather discouraging, I must confess. I am old, with the infirmities of age falling thick and fast upon me, but I am not so deep in my dotage as to consider three dollars of more importance than my principles. I said to one of your subscribers the other day upon his saying, "I am owing Bennett some, and hav concluded to pay up and stop my paper," "I shall lose all respect for you if you do. You know that our business transactions are large, and hav you not often said that I was liberal with you? If you do as you propose, what reason can I hav for continuing this liberality if you abandon the support of the principles we both profess to love? Yours is the only Liberal paper that comes to your office, and if you back down, the church and your enemies will rejoice and sneer at your past. Giv a bold fight for the right, and you will succeed. May God and nature forgiv me if I ever yield principle for three dollars, as it would be in this case." I believe he will continue his paper. I am driven to the conclusion that Freethinkers as a class are the least willing to giv aid in support of their blood-bought rights. Shame on them! the Bridgets of our kitchens hav more liberality.

D. R. BURT.

GALT, ONT., Jan. 24, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: A friend has sent me a few copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, commencing with No. 7, from Versailles, and my wife has been reading them with great pleasure. It is a fixture in our house, and we want you to go around this little planet and tell us something about it in your own way, boiled down so we can get at it, just as you did in your letters from Europe. We want you to take Mrs. Bennett with you, and take your time and enjoy yourselvs; and although I am a thorough temperance man, I do not wish to see you handicapped with prohibition or any other dead right. Count me in for $5, which will be promptly sent in any way you choose on a hint in your paper. WM. E. RENWICK.

[We thank our friend for his pledge and his kind words. On many accounts it would be pleasant to hav Mrs. Bennett accompany us should we make the journey around the world, but there are some difficulties in the way. Not the least will be the want of funds. We find that it will be a more expensiv journey than we at first supposed. If funds enough are contributed to take one it is all that can be looked for, to say nothing of two. Besides, the journey would be too long and tiresome to please our better half; and still more, we cannot both be absent from home at the same time for so long a period. There is a good deal to be looked after here at home while we are away.—ED. T. S.]

SALINA, CAL., Jan. 11, 1881.

ED. TRUTH SEEKER: I hav three besides myself who will subscribe $5 each for you to write up the world from an Infidel standpoint. I think I will get some more soon Our best wishes to you and Mrs. Bennett.

Ever yours, W. B. FORD.

HAMMONTON, N. J., Dec. 26, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing much good wherever it gains admittance. The Christians, as a class, are afraid of it, as the clergy are of Paine, Draper, and Robert Taylor. Yet its sentiments are gaining ground. Some are daring to think. Many of the articles of your contributors can not be excelled. They contain many valuable thoughts. Your letters are excellent, and I know of no work from which so correct a knowledge can be obtained of the people, and especially of the Roman church in the places you visited, as from these letters,

ROLLIN BRADLEY.

MANCHESTER, IOWA, Jan. 24, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Put us down for two shares for that trip around the world. Just let us know when you want the money. Yours for truth,

C. W. MEAD & Co.

LOVELAND, COL., Jan. 23, 1881.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: You can put me down for a book of your trip around the world. I can get a couple more. WM. LORHBOUGH.

CROTON LANDING, N. Y., Jan. 24, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT; Please put me down for $5.00 toward your trip around the world. By the way, if you come across the Garden of Eden, Balaam's ass, or righteous Lot's wife, don't forget to forward them home. They would prove quite attractiv to THE TRUTH SEEKER office. Yours fraternally,

C. E. PETERSON.

CENTRAL CITY, COL., Jan. 16, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am pleased to see offers of assistance for that "round the world trip" coming in so freely. I can fully meet mine of $50, and will not be at all surprised if, upon a thorough canvass, I should be able to nearly double that offer. I was not only surprised but really astonished at the number of people I find who are in sympathy with me in my fight against this Christian religion founded upon the imagination of a superstitious people.

We want to institute a Liberal League in our town. You will please giv me all the necessary information whereby we may be enabled to proceed in a proper manner.

We hav in our town two newspapers, one weekly and one daily, which also issues a weekly. The daily, notwithstanding nearly all connected therewith are unbelievers, refuses to publish any Liberal articles for fear it may injure its trade, while at the same time they admit that not one-fourth of their support is derived from the church or from church believers. How strange it appears to an outsider that any institution which derives but little benefit from another should take sides with the one and oppose another from which it obtained the material upon which it keeps up its existence! I think we will bring them around by and by.

The weekly, on the other hand, is more progressiv and will publish any article which may be intelligibly written. I see by its last issue that a Liberal writer proposes to furnish them an article every week, which they giv notice will be published. So far so good. Now if we can get a Liberal League started I think we will wake up this 8,400 altitude to a sense of being not so near heaven as they expected they were.

I am accused of being of a too progressiv temperament. I in reply claim that no one can be too progressiv for the good of mankind. They may be for their individual advancement financially or socially, but not otherwise.

My reforms consist of three. I ask that for the advancement and benefit of the whole people we do away with the present form of religious worship, that we substitute for the old style of financial legislation one in which the government shall control the currency, and say what quality it shall be and of what it shall consist, and not try to satisfy a hungry working man with one-fourth the quantity of food necessary that he do the labor required of him. And the last, but not the least, is a spelling reform whereby our children may be enabled to obtain an education in much less time than by the present method.

I see many of the newspapers throughout the country are taking steps toward such a reform, but I should like to see them adopt the full "fonetik" standard; and right here allow me to suggest to you this: THE TRUTH SEEKER claim to be a progressiv paper, willing to hear and publish all manner of opinions, why would it not be a good idea for you to publish one page of THE TRUTH SEEKER in fonetiks? If you find it accepted and encouraged by your readers, add another page, and so on at your pleasure. Simply add a key to the sounds of the vowels, at the head of the page. I do not think you could add more to your paper in any form than you would by so doing. For myself, I know I should look to that advancement the first thing when I open the paper. Of course you hav studied this system, and must admit its advantage to children and foreigners in their studies, but it may not hav occurred to you to begin its adoption by degrees as I hav suggested. See as an instance hu for who, rits for writes, sez for says, favr for favor, lanygwag for language, tungs for tongues, tha for they, snod for snowed, letrz for letters, hwil for while, forinerz for foreigners, red for read, silabel for syllables, etc.

If there is luck in odd numbers, I should be lucky with my three "hobbies," Infidelity, Greenbackism, and fonetiks. I hav one satisfaction when I find people ridiculing them of being able to reply, Well, they may look absurd, ridiculous, and visionary to you, but their final adoption is simply a matter of time. For this age is becoming too far advanced in intelligence to go on forever taking as their guide the rules and customs of people with but a crude idea of what was really the best for themselvs, let alone framing laws and establishing rules and regulations for an era so far ahead of them in every essential of knowledge as we are.

Yours truly, D. D. LAKE.

ST. LOUIS, MO., Jan. 7, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT; Inclose I you will find eight dollars, three for THE TRUTH SEEKER or the present year, $1.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER to be sent to my brother-in-law, P. H. Parsons, Hart[illegible]n, Minn.; $3 for two copies of "The Infidel Abroad," or letters written from Europe; the other 50 cents you can send in tracts or any other reading of interest as you see fit.

I hav been a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER from its early existence before you went to New York. Am pleased to find it growing better and stronger in the advocation of its truth principles from year to year. At first, but few were found bold enough to speak in its behalf, but now its influence begins to be felt, and many speak in its praise as being truthful, honest, and bold. Long may it liv and become widespread in circulation, and should you take the trip you contemplate around the world, you can put me down as one of the three hundred. I feel that I could not invest five dollars better. I hav read your letters from Europe with great pleasure, feeling that your description of men and places was clear and beautiful and in no wise influenced by the bane o superstition. Yours truly, O. F. GREEN.

GANANOQUE, ONT., Jan. 17, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am willing to go $5.00 to help you to "swing the circle;" in other words, take Horace Greeley's advice and "go West," and keep going West until you arrive back at New York.

Fraternally yours, HENRY SMITH.

MAUSTON, WIS., Jan. 14, 1881.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: You may put me down for five dollars for your Infidel trip around the world. If you dare risk your life I dare risk a "V," even if I hav to borrow it. I am certain to hav my money's worth if you liv to return, and I hope you will. I can't pray for your return worth a cent, but I can wish you may hav good health and as prosperous a journey as any other man could hav, and I think it will go as far into eternity as any prayer man may offer up. WM. HOLGATE.

MURDOCK, ILL., Jan. 18, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I hav delayed sending the money to renew my subscription for some time, hoping to get you a new subscriber, but failed to succeed, s the beautiful, sweet-scented Christians would rather giv their money to the clergy. I am very well pleased with your paper, especially your letters from Europe. If you intend making a voyage around the world I hav $5 you shall hav. Please excuse tardiness this time. You will find $3 inclosed to pay for my paper another year. Yours truly, W. H. JORDAN.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Dec. 29, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1881. I think there is no paper doing more to open the eyes of creed-bound Christians. After readin my paper I send it to some other person to read. During the last three months I hav sent it to a young man, a son of a Methodist clergyman and a member of the same church, who came to make us a visit last May and was with us four months. He read various Liberal books and papers, and went away rather a spoilt Christian. He writes me that five of his fellow-students at the telegraphic school who were Christian believers hav been converted to Freethought. The paper is read in the school until it is worn out. I get similar reports from others to whom I hav sent your paper.

Fraternally yours, A. H. FRANK.

BAXTER, KS., Jan. 17, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: We hav had Prof. O. A. Phelps here, who delivered three lectures, and who has been lecturing in our neighboring towns to crowded houses. He is a very energetic worker in the cause of Liberalism. He is a good orator and well posted, but I fear he will giv out physically, as he is of a rather weak constitution. He needs rest.

I am sorry I cannot do more for the cause of Liberalism; but it keeps us all busy down here in Kansas to make a living and owe no man anything.

The constant dropping of THE TRUTH SEEKER down on our Western towns is wearing away the rock of superstition and corruption, and fast making inroads on old dogmatic orthodoxy. May the grand work still go on, and I wish you all the success in the world. Yours truly, J. D. MCCLURE.

"WHAT MUST WE DO TO BE SAVED?"

WILSON, KAN., Jan. 19, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: The other day at Wilson, Kansas, as two gentlemen, Frank Meade and Prof. Leffer, were quietly discussing the merits of Col. Ingersoll, their conversation was interrupted by Geo. Baird, a deacon in the Presbyterian church at that place, who in language more deprecatory than polite called the Colonel a liar. For this uncalled-for insult, Frank—who is Frank by name and frank by nature—promptly knocked the deacon to the floor by a blow over his eye, compelling him to go to bed with a piece of raw beefsteak tied over the injured member. The deacon on this occasion, however, was not emphatic as at another time, when in reply to the accusation of a Methodist brother who said he had stolen his hay, he told him he was a "G—d d—d liar!" Nothing like being a Christian! X.

SHELBY, MICH.

FRIEND BENNETT: You are a splendid traveler and a sensation, no odds where you work. Your cynicism and descriptions of gods, virgins, and saints are only eclipsed by Voltaire. By all means start again, and don't come back until you complete the circuit. I will gladly throw in my little mite to help you keep your journalistic flag flying in your absence.

Your letters from Europe are truly interesting and instructiv. I hav learned more from them about the people of France, Italy, and Switzerland than I ever knew before.

Inclosed is my fare for another year's trip on your truth-seeking ship. I would be glad to hav "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," but am too poor and must be content.

Respectfully, Mrs. L. G. TOMES.

ALLIANCE, OHIO, Jan. 18, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: In your excellent letters from over the sea I hav been highly entertained as well as instructed, and hope it will not be long before you hav means sufficient to commence the trip you propose to make around the world.

Your friend, CARRIE E. WEIR.

LAKE VILLAGE, N. H., Jan. 19, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: After so long a time I hav got one subscriber for your paper, for which you will find inclosed three dollars. Your paper grows better and better every week. If I were able I should send it into many families. All that the people want is to read and think.

Your article on centralization of wealth and power is good. It is GEN. Weaver's idea in full. Let the people be taxed according to their property. Worthy Putnam is very good on telling experience. T. B. Wakeman and Mrs. Slenker, bless them! are tip-top. If I could write as well as think it would be loud, and radical too. Your trip around the world, I guess, will be secure. I hope so. Oh, I wish I could help! The Banner of Light sent me their paper free for six months, bless them! You are all working for humanity. Yours truly, J. M. COOK.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will find an article for publication, handed to me with a request to send it to you for that purpose.

It is well to call the attention of the people to these things as the party in power is so careful of the morals of the people as to waste a great deal of time harping upon the dangers of sending little "Cupid's Yokes" through Uncle Sam's mail bags, and a great deal of money prosecuting men for doing just what they hav a constitutional right to do. Which is the most licentious, a Mormon or a congressman, is a question to be answered by those who are distressed about polygamy.

CONSTANT READER

Under date of October 1, 1879, G. S. Palmer, M. D, Surgeon-in-Chief of the Freedman's Hospital and Asylum at Washington, D. C., states: "That in thirty-nine of forty-eight cases of confinement, the mothers were not married Of these, twenty-four were first on the part of these mothers, and yet they are far from being abandoned and dissolute. There is no law in the district to reach them, nor are the partners of their guilt amenable to law, a circumstance very much to be deplored."

"Religious exercises and chaplain services hav been performed by theological students, licentiate preachers, who receive their board for their services."

"As evidence that the patients are well cared for here I will cite the fact that most of them, white and colored, when cured leave the hospital with reluctance, and most of those who hav been treated here when again overtaken by accident and disease apply a second, third, fourth, and even a fifth time for admission."

We hazard the opinion that there is not a state in this Union, or a territory, in which the father of a bastard child is not amenable to law, except the District of Columbia, and nowhere else except heathen Africa. Here is business for Comstock, Cameron, Conkling, Hayes, and company. This announcement was sent broadcast through the U. S. mail, thus informing the licentious that in Washington no law exists to punish the men who bring misfortune on women. No law! No, no. But $40,500 was appropriated of the money of the people of the United States to support for one year the aforesaid asylum, which included the board, of which the chaplain and licentiate preachers had for their services. Please don't misread licentiate and call it licentious. This would reflect on the clergy.

Then in the Columbia hospital for women and lying-in asylum, during the year ending June 30, 1879, "299 were treated, of whom one death is recorded." See report of P. J. Murphy, presiding physician and surgeon in charge.

These and other official reports shock the moral pride of a virtuous and free people. Has it come to this, that no law exists in the District of Columbia to check licentiousness or obscenity? Was there ever any matter sent through the United States mail more corrupting than this, giving notice that no law exists in Washington to punish? Comfortable quarters are provided free to the mothers and babes. And the acting clergy hav "their board for their services." See executiv documents, pages 1,009 and 1,010 of 1879-80.

A Priest's Soliloquy on the "Infidel Abroad."

AN ACROSTIC.—BY SADA BAILEY.

Dare he around the world to go, and write such letters home—
Mere curses on theology—as he wrote when in Rome?

Behold! the circle will be formed, magnetic, far,
and near;
Embracing all the Infidels within each hemisphere.
No end to agitation then. Truth seekers will increase;
Nowhere can priests the people blind, or idly liv
in peace.
Eternal God, Christ Jesus, come! we priests are in a flutter;
This man we know will tell the truth—truth that we dare not utter.
Talmage says religion's dead—we'll lose our bread and butter!

Evolution; or a Tale of Tails.

AN EXTRACT FROM DR. MONROE'S NEW UNPUBLISHED AND UNFINISHED POEM.

189.

All this, however, the base Infidel denies;
Nor can we wonder when we once reflect—
Can there be truth in him who shuts his eyes
To revelation, and who dares neglect
His Christian duties?—who re-crucifies
Our blessed Savior—daring to reject
The preached gospel and the precious gore
Shed on the cross that sin might be no more?

190.

Can we respect the skeptic who pretends
He can't believe a son was his own father,
Or vice versa, for redeeming ends,
When scripture says 'tis so? Or rather,
Are we not bound to see that he ascends?
Had we not ought to mask ourselvs and gather
About his house at deadly mid of night,
And fix his head in a strong rope's deadly bight?

191.

Proscribe we may, but 'tis no longer legal
To pinch, imprison, stab, or skin or burn him:
No saucier feller marched and "fit mit Siegel,"
So Christ upon the cross does not concern him;
A cawing crow, that jeers the soaring eagle,
That from its dizzy hight may scarce discern him.
A buzzard flopping round the Christian flock,
That they may not molest nor rout nor rock!

192.

Oh, there is comfort in the contemplation
Of endless torment for the wicked man;
He scoffs at Jesus and rejects salvation
Upon the Savior's blood-atoning plan;
And yet Bob Ingersoll, with much oration,
Will rob us of this comfort if he can,
And giv us not a thing in place of it;
Therefore we want his horns hauled in a bit.

193.

Men who deny the Bible, hav they rights?
May we not, for the good of God and man,
Remove them when the Lord removes his lights?
May Christian men not kill them if they can?
The wolf, the lion, the mad dog that bites,
Hav stronger claims upon our mercy than
The impious wretch who scoffs at holy writ
Or the true creeds engrafted upon it.

194.

I say true creeds, and by true creeds I mean
Those that enjoin faith, prayer, and chant of psalm
As the chief Christian; duties make you lean
Upon dear Jesus, hoping he will damn
Those who deny him, but yet still will screen
Even murderers owning up that he's the lamb
That taketh sin away, whese blood was shed,
And who still liveth, though reported dead.

195.

We hold that murderers who believe and pray
Are innocent as babes compared to those
Who, like cursed Judas, our dear Lord betrayed.
They may be good and moral, but are foes
If they deny the Christ; and Christians may Lay snares for them and fill their lives with woe—
May lie about and rob them—'tis no sin;
All's fair that's needful for our Lord to win.

196.

Thus thinks brave Anthony, the Christian's friend,
When in pursuit of the cursed Infidel,
He spares no measure needfu to the end,
Which is to cage the wicked in a cell.
His letters of decoy we can commend,
Likewise the schemes he understands so well,
To tempt the unwary into overt acts,
Then seize and charge them home with stubborn facts,

197.

Because the ends to be attained are great—
The Infidel to trap and bring to grief;
The cause of Christ to avenge and vindicate,
Which justifies the Y. M. C. A. chief,
Armed as he is with powers of church and state,
To play the sneak, the spy, the assassin, thief,
Or aught besides best fitted to deceive,
And cause the heathen to disgorge and grieve.

198.

And, as the agent of the vice society,
Vice he may use to track and punish vice—
May pay bad girls to strip—then with propriety
March them to prison naked in a trice;
Or, loitering, scan their charms to full satiety,
Then march them off, the naughty things (but nice)!
And take them nude before the "jedge," because
To doff their robes outrages Christian laws!

199.

The Christian law may peep in ladies' rooms
If peradventure it leads to disclosure
Of what, from their pursuit, the law presumes,
Some ladies make—of hidden charms exposure
To men not their own priests, nor even their grooms!—
And pray, how is our Anthony to know sure
Of secret vices and forbidden joys?—
They drive him to disguises and decoys.

200.

And if for dollars fourteen he could hire
Five girls to play nude Eve for hours some three,
For him and friends, the wicked who admire
Such exhibitions, by like bribery,
Could be like served, and thus God's fearful ire
Be terribly aroused. Thus Anthony,
In ferreting out vice, God's wrath averts.
And the prerogativs of church asserts.

201.

And vice, that church and state would undermine,
Finds Tony's schemes as sly as snakes in grass;
He plays it on the heathen awful fine,
In various ways; but we will let them pass,
For in our Tony church and state combine
To giv the world assurance of an ass,
With knave enough thrown in to indicate
Foul conjugation of Dame Church with state.

202.

But this I say with no ill will for Tony,
But just to allay the roaring heathen's wrath,
Who lays about him, with cold eye and stony,
And with much logic and his sword of lath,
Contesting, teasing, wanting testimony,
And trying to turn men from the beaten path
That leads the Christian upward to his crown,
To follow him in unbelief and down!

203.

And as the average heathen hates oppression,
And interference meddlesome with freedom
Of press and speech, and will make no concession
Of rights he claims to hav (and seems to need 'em),
To mail facilities—to his discretion,
Whether to work on holy days or heed 'em—
We hav to curb him gently—giv him rein,
Then lie with Anthony for him again.

204.

We hav to treat him gingerly because
He seems exceedingly to multiply;
He is more contumacious than he was,
Claiming he can with true believers vie
In purity of life; he hoots at laws
That plant the gospel in our schools—and why?
He knows the gospel, if it would abound,
Must be sown early in untilled ground.

205.

He multiplies apace, as I hav said,
And so must be a little bit placated;
We find him even at the nation's head—
In office everywhere, but not elated;
He leads in our best colleges, whence spread
Those scientific heresies so hated;
He almost owns the forum and tripod,
And thrives, for all I know, by grace of God.

206.

But I must hurry onward. I reveal
A growing tendency toward verbosity,
Which may in time make the judicious squeal,
And wish the bard shot hell-ward with velocity
Akin to lightning. And sometimes I feel
That it were well to weave in some monstrosity,
Some blood-and-thunder hero, broke from jails,
To lend a charm to my dull tale of tails.

207.

Because a tale of blood and savage deeds
Has fascination for your modern lad,
He rolls and ruminates his cud, and reads,
And swears when grown he'll be as smart and bad;
He'll be a foot-pad, herding with half-breeds—
He'll steal a pistol, run away from "dad"
He'll rob the stages, and he'll wed a squaw—
He'll be a frontier hero—an outlaw!

THE Standard Cure Company, No. 114 Nassau street, New York city, will send to any address a box of Emery's Standard Cure (Purely Vegetable Cream-Coated Pills), a never-failing remedy for Ague, Biliousness, and all Malarial Diseases. Standard Cure is pleasant to take, contains no quinine, mercury, or poisons of any kind.

Special Notice from Bliss' Chief's Band.

Me, Red Cloud, speak for Blackfoot, the great Medicin Chief from happy hunting grounds. He say he love white chiefs and squaws. He travel like the wind. He go to circles. Him big chief. Blackfoot want much work to do. Him want to show him healing power. Make sick people well. Where paper go, Blackfoot go. Go quick. Send right away. No wampum for three moon.

This spirit message was first published in "Mind and Matter," January 10, M. S. 32, with the announcement that magnetized paper would be sent to all who were sick in body or mind that desired to be healed, also to those that desired to be developed as spirit mediums, for three months for three three-cent stamps. The three months closed with the following result: 3,405 persons hav sent for the paper by mail, one thousand persons hav received it at the office; and the hundreds of testimonials that hav been received of its wonderful work in healing the sick and developing mediums prove that Red Cloud and Blackfoot hav faithfully kept promises. From January 10th, M. S. 32, to January 10th, M. S. 33, over 15,000 persons hav sent for this paper, and thousands hav been benefited by its use. That all may hav an opportunity to test the merits of the paper, the price for the future will be as follows: one sheet, postage paid, ten cents; twelve sheets, one dollar. Send a silver ten cent piece if you can. Address James A. Bliss, 713 Sansom street, Philadelphia, Pa.

A Proposition.

I am prepared and will send to any one address, direct from my office, one sheet of "Blackfoot's" Magnetized Paper, postage paid, every week for one month for forty cents; two months for seventy cents; three months for one dollar. Address, with amount inclosed, James A. Bliss, 713 Sansom st., Philadelphia, Pa.

THE SEYMOUR, IND., TIMES

Is one of the most widely known and best heeled papers in the great Mississippi Valley. It will complete its 25th year in March, 1881, if the day of judgment doesn't come prior to that date; and it isn't at all likely that even Gabriel's toot horn can set it back much.

The Seymour Times has but few principles. Most papers are bothered and hampered with principles; but the Times having but few of 'em, and not one solitary politic to its name, is free to slip in a word for Truth, Justice, Mercy, and Humanity whenever it can get a chance.

The Seymour Times is for light and for useful knowledge, and it has no faith in humbuggery and superstition. It is the only paper in the great West that is able to run without a god or devil or ghost.

The Seymour Times is paying $4,000,000 (four million dollars) a head for ghosts, though, and it wants all it can get. It is also paying the same figure for virgins who are mothers, or sons who are their own fathers, or fathers who are their own sons.

The Times makes it a business to defend the holy ministers of the Lord from the slanders of the wicked. Those good men, full of the love of God, can do no sin. They are constantly tempted, however, of the women and of Satan, and accordiug to the wicked they fall often and hard. This the Seymour Times denies on the general principle that the love of God shed abroad in the heart leaves no room for sin and none can get in or could stay there a minute if it did.

The Seymour Times is a large six-column quarto, beautifully printed in bold type.

If you are a Freethinker, you want it; if you ain't, you want it.

Price, $2.15 a year; 6 months, $1.10; 3 months, 60 cents. Stamps received for change. At least send two red stamps for sample copy. Address J. R. MONROE, M.D., Seymour, Ind.

SUPERSTITION IN ALL AGES.

BY JOHN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 28, 1878.

TO MISS ANNA KNOOP, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

CONSULT

Your Case Is Curable!

You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

NOTE.—In reference to the few persons named above, I have taken them as they occur in my books, feeling assured that each person will give their experience and the effects of my appliances in their respective cases. But being only a few months from Europe, "where thirty thousand people are wearing my goods," it cannot be expected that absolute cures have been effected in so short a time "in all cases," but in every instance it will be found that decided improvement set in even where all medicines had failed to give the slightest relief, yet given time "even in the worst cases" a cure is certain, but some persons will get worn out by drugging and poisoning, and then expect a magical cure. That is impossible and our common sense must be appealed to in such instances.

Gems of Thought.

FULFIL now, O Lord, the desires and petitions of thy servants, as may be most expedient for them.—St. Chrysostom.

THE good which any one who follows virtue desires for himself he desires also for the rest of mankind, and that the more the greater his knowledge of God.—Spinoza.

WE, ignorant of ourselvs,
Beg often our own harms, which the wise powers
Deny us for our good; so find we profit
By losing of our prayers. —Shakspere.

GREAT Jove! this one petition grant—
Thou knowest best what mortals want—
Asked or unasked, what's good, supply,
What's evil, to my prayer deny!
—Prayer of a heathen.

"THE great help to memory is writing," Lord Bacon had said. Locke emphasizes the dictum and adds: "If you hav not tried it, you cannot imagin the difference there is in studying with and without a pen in your hand. The thoughts that come unsought and, as it were, dropped into the mind are commonly the most valuable of any we hav, and therefore should be secured, because they seldom return again."—Foster's Locke.

IF human reason is to decide when there is proper occasion for miracles, it would seem that by all means they ought to occur in this age of skepticism. When was there ever so much unbelief that needed to be convinced as to-day? Let us hav a good, substantial miracle, such as the standing still of the sun in the heavens, which all eyes could see and at which there could be no cavil, and it would confound all Infidels at once and might possibly throw the ranks of believers into some temporary confusion—F. R. Index.

MIRACLE working priests are only successful among credulously disposed people. Miracles can only be received by those who think it less likely that nature should speak falsely than that man should deceive. Those who believe in this change [the change of bread and wine into the very blood and body of the Lord Jesus] through consecration cannot be touched by argument. They hav closed their eyes that they may not see, their ears that they may not hear. No known logic can reach them, for they hav shut the gateways whereby it could enter. They are literally dead in their superstition, buried beneath the stone of their faith. —Mrs. Annie Besant.

THE victims of fanaticism outnumber those of every other and all other passions that hav wasted the earth. Pining in dungeons, hunted like beasts of prey, stretched on the rack, affixed to the cross, their sufferings are the horror of history. No high-wrought fiction, recording imaginary wars, can match the colors of their authentic tragedy. A corruption of the text of the Vedas has cast thousands of Hindoo widows alive on the funeral pile. An interpolation of two words in the service of the Eastern church has driven whole villages in Russia into fiery death. A sentence in the Book of Exodus has been a death sentence to millions of hapless women. And who shall compute the sum of the lives that hav furnished the holocausts of the Inquisition?—Hedge.

IF the power of reasoning be the gift of the Supreme Reason, that we be sedulous, yea, and militant in the endeavor to reason aright, is his implied command. But what is of permanent and essential interest to one man must needs be so to all in proportion to the opportunities and means of each. Woe to him by whom these are neglected and double woe to him by whom they are withholden, for he robs at once himself and his neighbors. That man's soul is not dear to himself to whom the souls of his brethren are not dear. As far as they can be influenced by him they are parts and properties of his own soul; their faith is his faith, their errors his burden, and their righteousness or bliss his righteouss and reward, and of their guilt and misery his own will be the echo.—Coleridge's "Friend."

SO continually has prayer failed to win an answer that, spite of the clearness and force of the Bible promises in regard to it, Christians hav found themselvs obliged to limit their extent and to say that God judges whether or no it will be beneficial for the worshiper to grant the petition, and if the prayer be a mistaken one he will in mercy withhold the implored-for boon. Of course this prevents prayer from being ever tested by experience at all, because, whenever a prayer remains unanswered, the reply is ready, that "it was not according to the will of God." This means that we cannot test the value of prayer in any way. We must accept its worth wholly as a matter of faith. We must pray because we are bidden to do so, and fulfil a useless form which affords no tangible results. In this melancholy position are we landed by an appeal to experience, by which we are challenged to test the value of prayer.—Mrs. Annie Besant.

ALL honor to the brave, noble Infidels! To them the world owes more than it realizes. The truths that hav been written, printed, and circulated by them and their coadjutors are making themselvs felt in every household in the country. They hav not the powerful machinery of the church to work with, nor do they make vain promises to their constituents of an eternity of perfect bliss as a reward for believing their say-so, or, still worse, threaten them with an eternal, infernal damnation. But they speak plain, every-day fact and common sense, which, though not dressed in art and trickery, and made gaudy and attractiv, is real and practical, and the only safe and sure doctrin. Novels and fairy tales, ghost-stories and narrations of unnatural monstrosities hav always obtained more readers than simple unvarnished statements of actualities. But the wise and cultured mind prefers plain, substaintial diet to a feast of condiments which, palatable though they may be, always produce indigestion and disease. —Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

A VERY disagreeable old gentleman dies. A nephew, charged with the duty of preparing his epitaph, suggests: "Deeply regretted by all who never knew him."

IT HARDLY PAYS.

A New Jersey merchant met an old acquaintance on a street car the other day, and after some general remarks the latter said:

"I saw a newspaper notice that you had failed."

"Yes, I went by the board."

"Very bad?"

"Yes, pretty bad."

"Outside speculation, I suppose?"

"Partly."

"Creditors willing to giv you a chance to recover?"

"Yes."

"Glad of it. I suppose you'll soon be all right?"

"Yes. I tell you what, it is very disagreeable business. I had to plead family extravagance, and my wife, who hadn't had a new dress for six months, was as mad as a hop. I proved that I had given too much to the church, and the minister called and raked me over the coals. I had a clerk abscond with a lot of cash, and the creditors made me own up that he was my brother. I supposed that I had lost $500 by a fire, but they figured that I was $100 ahead. I figured on having enough to pay thirty cents on the dollar, but somehow they got hold of enough to pay ninety-eight, and put all the costs on me. I lost four weeks of trade on the top of this, and I'm feeling awful blue. It hardly pays to fail—unless you've got a partner to help bluff creditors."

A WEDDING POSTPONED.

William Parker appeared to be a young man of twenty-five with an open countenance and a mind firmly "sot;" but on the letter point the audience were soon undeceived. One of the spectators in court was a father with a bad squint to his left eye. Another was a mother with fingers hooked just right to secure a firm hold on a broomstick. A third was a young woman with a sharp chin, red curls, and a great sorrow. Little by little the truth was unraveled. That there William Parker was engaged to marry that there girl with a sharp chin. Indeed, the day had been set, and it was yesterday. Her parents had gone to an expense of fifty dollars for a bridal feast, and the minister came and waited and talked and waited, but the groom came not.

Six hours before he was to be wed William read a magazine article to the effect that a woman with a sharp chin could make a husband so miserable in four weeks that he would welcome death as a relief. The article further said that a father-in-law with a squint to his eye was a bad old man to loaf on, and he put this and that together and made up his mind to escape the noose ready to slip over his head. While the bride waited William was growing drunk at the rate of ten feet an hour, and when the clergyman walked home he almost passed the alley in which the recreant groom lay sleeping.

"Were you ever here before?" asked his honor.

"No, sir."

"Do you think you can keep sober after this?"

The prisoner looked over his shoulder at the three accusing witnesses, and then whispered:

"Say, judge, send me up for three months."

"Well, if you can behave yourself, I think I'll let you go," continued the court.

"No, no; send me up."

"But don't come here again," answered the judge, as he closed the docket and reached for his hat.

William was boxed. He went out of there surrounded on all sides, and when the trio got him out of the neighborhood they either changed his mind on sharp chins or killed him.—Detroit Free Press.

SHE DISGRACED THE FAMILY.

A traveler in the state of Illinois came to a hut on the prairie near Cairo, and there halted. He went into the house. It was a wretched affair, with an empty box for a table, while two or three old chairs and disabled stools disgraced the reception-room, the dark walls of which were further ornamented by dirty tinware and a broken shelf article or two. The woman was crying in one corner, and the man, with tears in his eyes and pipe in his mouth, sat on a stool, with his dirty arms resting on his knees, and his sorrowful-looking head supported by the palms of his hands. Not a word greeted the interloper.

"Well," he said, "you seem to be in awful trouble here; what's up?"

"Ah, we are almost crazed, neighbor," said the woman; "and we ain't got no patience to see folks now."

"That's all right," said the visitor, not much taken aback by this polite rebuff; "but can I be of any service to you in all this trouble?"

"Well, we've lost our gal; our Sal's gone off and left us," said the man in tones of despair.

"Ah; do you know what induced her to leave you?" remarked the new arrival.

"Well, we can't say, stranger, as how she's so far lost as to be induced, but then she's gone and disgraced us," remarked the afflicted father.

"Yes, neighbor, and—not as I should say it is as her mother—but there wan't a pootier gal in the West than our Sal. She's gone and brought ruin on us and on her own head, now," followed the stricken mother.

"Who has she gone off with?" inquired the visitor.

"Well, there's the trouble. The gal could hav done well and might hav married Martin Kehoe, a capital shoemaker, who, although he has got but one eye, plays on the flute in a lively manner and earns a good living. Then, look, she was surrounded by all the luxury in the country," said the father.

"Yes, who knows what poor Sal will hav to eat, drink, or wear, now?" groaned the old woman.

"And who is the fellow that has taken her into such misery?"

"Why, she's gone off and got married to a critter called an editor, as livs in the village, and the Lord only knows how he airns a living."

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

"The Gods and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," "Heretics and Heresies." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

"The Ghosts and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Ghosts," "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," "Declaration of Independence," "Farming in Illinois," "Speech at Cincinnati," "The Past Rises Before Me Like a Dream." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

Both volumes bound in one, price, paper, $1.00.

"What Must We Do to be Saved?"

"Interpolations are the foundation stones of every orthodox church." Thoroughly revised and corrected by the author. Price, 25 cents.

Notes and Clippings.

FROM 1848 to Jan. 1, 1881, California turned out in gold and silver $2,139,258,000.

MR. BRADLAUGH continues his attacks on the British pension list, which later in the session will probably be heard a good deal about.

TEN thousand Nestorian Christians residing in the Persian provinces devastated by the Kurds hav sent a petition to the Grand Duke Michael, asking permission to emigrate to the Caucasus.

MR. THERON C. LELAND, who Sunday evening addressed the Liberal League on "Social Evolution," is not only a thorough student of social and religious topics, but he is also one of the few great shorthand experts of the age.—Port Jervis Daily Union.

THE party in favor of instrumental music in an Irish Presbyterian church recently ordered an organ for their church. The opposition, who think it wicked to accompany sacred song with instrumental help, went to the secular courts, and succeeded in having the organ stopped by an injunction.

AN experienced matron says, "A man will eat soggy biscuits twice a week without complaint when his girl invites him out to tea, but when the girl becomes his wife, if there is the faintest suspicion of saleratus in them the neighbors will think the district school is out for recess by the racket he makes."

BISHOP FALLOWS, of Chicago, one Sunday recently preached a sermon in which he castigated the Rev. Dr. Tyng for the recent utterances which that gentleman made concerning the miracles at Lourdes and Knock. Bishop Fallows denies the miraculous nature of the alleged cures at these places, and says that instead of being miraculous they are preternatural.

DR. OSCAR JENNINGS, a physician of standing in Paris, writes to the London Lancet that in the treatment of mental disease he has constantly used music, which calms and soothes the mind, and is too precious an agent to be neglected. Concerts form a part of the regular treatment in many asylums. It will be remembered that Saul found satisfaction in music.

A FRENCH physician's experience goes to prove that widowers commit suicide more frequently than married men, and that the presence of children in a house diminishes the tendency to self-destruction in both men and women. People who hav lived much in houses and hotels with other people's children will perhaps be disposed to question the latter conclusion.

THE clergy of Newburg now contest the palm for bigoted imbecility. They are violently protesting against the employment of workmen on Sundays in relaying a railroad track so as to spare the traveling public the inconvenience of a day's delay in journeys. Protest, gentlemen, if you will. This is a big world, and its population are not troubled by your pious clamor.

THE Methodists will send $25,000 to convert Italy next year. The Rev. Dr. Olin says he wants the sum as large as possible, for "that is the best place to strike deadly blows against the man of sin." But we hav a very wretched colony of Italians in this city, for instance, upon whom the mnney could be better spent; and as to the man of sin, you needn't go to Italy to find him.

AT the opening of the February term of the New Castle county court in Wilmington, Del., on the 7th, the chief justice in his charge to the grand jury made special and severe reference to the lecture of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll delivered in that city some weeks ago on "What Shall We Do to be Saved?" His remarks showed that it was his impression that under the law relating to blasphemy Ingersoll could and should be indicted.

IT was not in Italy in the dark ages but in New York on Thursday that the intercession of a saint to put an end to the diphtheria scourge was implored by many people. The deity of common sense is the real one to be invoked. If it was applied to our plumbing and sewerage systems there would be little cause to appeal for the protection of saint or surgeon any more. Until it is, all the saints in the calendar will remain as powerless as the grotesque gods of a Chinese temple would be in the case.

IT seems that the English authorities hav "allowed to leak out" the fact that Mr. Davitt will be treated with extra leniency in consequence of his ill-health. This is a confession that Davitt's arrest was an outrage, for the law has no right to consider a man's health. If he is well enough to commit crime he is well enough (in the eye of the law) to take the consequences. The English government know well that Davitt has committed no crime, and hav thrown a sop to the many-headed by their announcement of Davitt's tender treatment.

THE work of restoring Palestine to the possession of the Jews drags along so slowly that the receipt of $200 to help a Jewish colony near Jaffa is chronicled as an important event in the history of the movement. This sum has been raised by some Jews in Chicago, who hav formed a society for the purpose of raising money in considerable amounts. It has been conclusivly shown by eminent persons who are well informed as to the Holy Land and the Jews that there is no enthusiasm for repossessing the land, nor any concerted plan of action.

PARTY feeling runs high in Scotland over anything and everything connected with the old standards of faith. In the Presbytery of Elgin, at a recent meeting, the subject of a modification of the form of assent to the Westminster Confession of Faith was under discussion. A man who was in favor of a modification of the present formula rose to offer a suggestion, when he was assailed with cries of "Traitor! traitor!" These and kindred observations and shouts raised an uproar which continued till the unhappy cause of the confusion consented to take his seat.

AN effort has been made in the Legislature of this state to secure the passage of a bill to legalize lotteries and raffles at church fairs. Should this bill pass, the next in order will be one authorizing the sale of oyster stews with no oysters at all in them, instead of one or two as at present. Following on this would, with similar propriety, be a law permitting the picking of pockets by the ushers on church step and in the aisles; and still another statute should allow ministers to kiss the wives of their parishioners without being troubled, as the Rev. Mr. Miller was, to explain whether the embrace was a holy or an unholy one.

"AN INFIDEL ABROAD" is the title of a neat volume of 846 pages, which has been sent us by the publisher, Mr. D. M. Bennett, of 141 Eighth street, New York. The author and publisher is editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and last summer was sent as a delegate to an International Congress of Freethinkers held in Brussels. This volume is a compilation of letters written to his paper, and describes in a comprehensiv manner the author's impressions of the old world. It is largely historical and abounds with information, besides being highly interesting in its pen-portraitures of scenes and personages, both living and long since dead.—Chautauqua Farmer.

MR. MOODY spoke in one of his San Francisco exhortations of the fate of those who, though otherwise good persons, were not regenerated by divine grace. He referred feelingly to a dear grandmother who had died unconverted, saying: "Although she was good and kind and dearly loved by me, I fear she has met with the reward of all who die not owning Christ. I know she is in hell." At that moment a young man near the front arose and walked down the aisle toward the door. "There is a gentleman," said the revivalist, "who is tired of listening about Christ. He is going straight to hell." The object of this public rebuke turned and said, in a quiet, clear voice, "Well, is there any message I can take to your grandmother, Mr. Moody?"

THE Churchman thus formulates the apostate's creed: I believe in a chaotic nebula self-existent, evolver of heaven and earth. And in the differentiation of the original homogeneous mass; its first begotten product which was self-formed into land and water, self-organized into plants and animals, reproduced in like species, further developed into higher orders, and ultimately refined, rationalized, and perfected in man; he descended from the monkey, ascended to the philosopher, and sitteth down in the rites and customs of civilization under the laws of a developing sociology; from thence he shall come again by the disintegration of the heterogenized cosmos back into the original homogeneousness of chaos. I believe in the wholly impersonal absolute; the wholly uncatholic church, the disunion of the saints, the survival of the fittest, the persistence of force, the dispersion of the body, and in death everlasting.

THE Presbyterians of this city are greatly concerned about the decay of the down-town churches, and the lack of church accommodation for people who are moving into the new up-town localities reached by the elevated railroads. It is among some of the most densely populated neighborhoods that the down-town churches hav failed. Immense sums of money are spent to carry the gospel to the heathen of the Pacific islands, while for want of churches most of the closely-packed tenement-house population of this city is allowed to go without any gospel. The tendency has been to build churches in fashionable neighborhoods, where persons of culture and means can go to them. The poor people hav had to be content with what are called "missions." Many of the moderately poor consider it a degradation to go to these, and would rather stay away from all religious privileges than compromise their dignity by patronizing anything short of a stylish church. The Presbytery of New York is trying to solve the very difficult problem of what is to be done and how to do it. The necessity for wise counsel is calling for the best thoughts of some of the ablest clergymen.

A JERSEY clergyman has recently revived the slander, long since disproved, that Thomas Paine said on his death-bed, "I would giv worlds, if I had them, if the 'Age of Reason' had never been published." The well-established fact is that when Thomas Paine was dying two clergymen endeavored to get access to him, but he peremptorily declined their obnoxious attentions. They then set this story afloat, which has rung from thousands of pulpits since that time, though recognized as utterly false and groundless by every one who has made any efforts to ascertain the truth. The "Age of Reason" was partly written while its author was confined, momentarily awaiting a summons to the guillotin. It is not probable that the man who could write the book under such terrifying circumstances would hav wished to recall it when peacefully passing away in his own house. Thomas Paine believed the sentiments he wrote, and, what is better, hundreds of thousands of others believe them to-day. Believing them as he did, it is impossible that he should hav desired to recall their publication. At any rate, it is well attested that he never expressed such a desire. Would it not be more manly of the clergy to attempt to answer some of Paine's arguments—arguments that strike every reader with their force—than to slander his memory and by falsehoods intimidate their credulous and superstitious auditors from becoming familiar with them?—Truth.

[From the National Reformer.]

Report of a Debate

BETWEEN THE REV. A. HATCHARD AND MRS. ANNIE BESANT, AT THE HALL OF SCIENCE, LONDON.

SECOND NIGHT.—CONTINUED.

MRS. BESANT.

Let me say at once that in dealing with my opponent's speech I shall not take up to-night the question of the likeness between Chrishna and Christ. Our subject for debate to-night is not "The historical character of the Jesus of the Gospels," but "That the influence of Christianity upon the world has been injurious." The proper place to hav dealt with Chrishna, about whom my reverend opponent has told you so much to-night, was in last week's debate. It is out of place to do so in the present debate, and I trust he will not think me wanting in courtesy if I entirely leave the question of Chrishna in presenting to you my view of the subject at issue. There are various points, however, which distinctly challenge my position. We are told about the moral change that Christianity has wrought in the world. You may remember that my fifth proposition was that Christianity has not purified public morals. Therefore, I hav come prepared to deal with that part of the subject. I will first take the allusions to slavery which we hav heard, because I hav not quite finished what I was about to say on that subject. Mr. Hatchard has urged that it was the custom, dealing with a remark of Horace's, to crucify slaves in Rome for very slight faults. I do not think it is fair to say that because a Roman poet says that a master would be mad to crucify his slave for a small fault, therefore crucifixion of slaves for small faults was general.

Allow, as I do allow, that wherever you get slavery you get the brutalization of the masters as well as of the slaves, yet I will ask you to contrast the words of the Roman poet, stamping cruelty as madness, with the words of Jehovah, the God of the Jews: "If a man smite his servant, or his maid, with a rod, and he die under his hand; he shall be surely punished. Notwithstanding, if he continue a day or two, he shall not be punished: for he is his money" (Exodus xxi, 20, 21). I think Horace was a better moralist than Jehovah. But I am told that Christian feeling opposed slavery in the Southern states of America. I shall hav to deal with that in a moment, but I will now take up the question of slavery where I laid it down.

So far from Christianity discouraging slavery, if you turn to Hallam's history you will find the following. I quote Hallam because he is often called the judicious Hallam, and it throws a halo of respectability over my arguments: "It is a humiliating proof of the degradation of Christendom that the Venetians were reduced to purchase the luxuries of Asia by supplying the slave market of the Saracens. . . . This trade was not peculiar to Venice. In England it was very common, even after the Conquest, to export slaves to Ireland, till, in the reign of Henry II., the Irish came to a non-importation agreement which put a stop to the practice" (Europe During the Middle Ages, pp. 613, 614). And in a note he adds: "William of Malmsbury accuses the Anglo-Saxon nobility of selling their female servants, even when pregnant by them, as slaves to foreigners. I hope there were not many of these Yaricoes; and should not perhaps hav given credit to an historian rather prejudiced against the English, if I had not found too much authority for the general practice." That is the testimony of Hallam, that Christians were wont to sell slaves, and female slaves, not only to their fellow-Christians, but even to the Mohammedans, the Saracens, and sold them in a condition which at least should hav aroused a feeling of humanity.

I pass from the testimony of Hallam, and I draw your attention to the very different way in which the Mohammedans, who were not Christians, were taught to treat their slaves. Every one who knows the history of slavery in America knows how the female slaves had their children, born to their masters, torn from them, and how you absolutely thus found the father selling his own daughter, and the brother selling his own sister. If you turn to the false prophet, Mohammed, you find him saying: "Whoso among you hath not means sufficient that he may marry free women who are believers, let him marry with such of your maid-servants whom your right hands possess, as are true believers. . . . Ye are the one from the other; therefore marry them with the consent of their masters, and giv them their dower according to justice" (Koran, chap. iv). And again: "And unto such of your slaves as desire a written instrument allowing them to redeem themselvs on paying a certain sum, write one if ye know good in them; and giv them of the riches of God, which he hath given you. And compel not your maid-servants to prostitute themselvs, if they be willing to liv chastely" (ibid, chap. xxiv). This is not Christian teaching, but it is the teaching of the heretic; but I will ask you to contrast that with the teaching you will find in the book of Exodus. You will find there that a man may sell his own daughter, and that having taken a wife from those who may hav been taken captiv, he may, if it suits him, send her away if he does not care for her any longer. And then you find Moses saying that the slave is the owner's "money." There is a striking resemblance between the teaching of Moses and the practice in Christian lands; but it is alleged by Mr. Hatchard that it was Christian feeling and Christian teaching which opposed slavery in the Southern states of America. That is rather a rash statement to make in a hall which is filled with those who know that Christians were opponents of the abolition of slavery, and are acquainted with the general testimony which comes to us from all directions.

I take a quotation from an admirable article lately written for the National Reformer by one of our vice-presidents, Mr. Symes: "The Charleston Union Presbytery, April 7, 1836, 'Resolved, that in the opinion of this Presbytery, the holding of slaves, so far from being a sin in the sight of God, is nowhere condemned in his holy word: that it is in accordance with the example and consistent with the precepts of patriarchs, apostles, and prophets,' etc. The Missionary Society of the South Carolina Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, by their board of managers, said: 'We denounce the principles and practice of the Abolitionists in toto. . . . We believe that the holy scriptures, so far from giving any countenance to this delusion, do, unequivocally, authorize the relation of master and slave.' The Hopewell Presbytery, South Carolina, said: 'Slavery has always existed in the church of God, from the time of Abraham to this day.'" This I admit to be true. "The Presbyterian synod of Virginia, 'Resolved, unanimously, that we consider the dogma, that slavery as it exists in the slave-holding states is necessarily sinful, and ought to be immediately abolished, and the conclusions which naturally follow from that dogma, as directly and palpably contrary to the plainest principles of common sense and common humanity, and the clearest authority of the word of God." That was the view, not of individuals, but of the churches in America, when the slavery question was in agitation; and I will ask you to remember one terrible proof of the Christian opposition to all those who argued for slave abolition. The name of William Lloyd Garrison is identified with the struggle against slavery. Remember how he went to Boston and found that every church there closed its doors against him, how he could find no place to speak in, until the pulpit of Theodore Parker was opened to him—Theodore Parker, who had been expelled even from the Unitarian body for the rank heresy which he thought it his duty to preach.

I urge Mr. Hatchard to be good enough to giv us some proofs of the statements he has made, to point out to us the resolutions of one church or of one sect tending to show us that the Christians were foremost in the trial to get abolition, to show that they preached abolition from their pulpits, when to preach it involved danger of life. I know that they joined in afterwards, when the battle was over and won. I will ask you to remember that the opposition to Clarkson's bill came chiefly from the Christians in the House of Commons and the House of Lords, and that Lord Chancelor Thurlow, speaking from the woolsack, stigmatized it as a "miserable and contemptible bill," and as utterly "contrary to the word of God." These are quotations which can easily be verified, and I will ask my opponent, when he next rises, to explain how, with this evidence before him, he can say that Christians were in favor of the abolition of the slave trade. I submit to him that this is absolutely unsupported by any kind of evidence, and is directly negatived by what I hav laid before him. Remembering the general mildness of Greek and Roman slavery, remembering how the slaves were the teachers of the young, and how freedmen often rose to places of honor and dignity, I allege "That Christianity has upheld and aggravated slavery."

We now come to the curious statement which my opponent makes to us that Christianity is consonant with science; and I propose here to put the argument in the hands of a very capable writer, one of whose works I will bring before you. I notice that my opponent the other night in his last speech to which I had no right of reply, laid very great stress upon German authority; but that, in pity for our ignorance, he refrained from quoting a single German writer to us. I will ask your patience for a moment, because I think it as well to meet the challenge. I will read a passage of Strauss, so that we may see whether he, a representativ German Freethinker, shares Mr. Hatchard's opinion with respect to Christianity and science being in harmony with each other. I hav here a German edition of a work by Strauss, and I propose to read the extract in German, asking your pardon for doing so. Strauss deals with Christianity and science in a very interesting way, and it is an extract from him by which I will answer this part of my opponent's speech. The title of the book from which the quotation is given is "Der alte und der neue Glaube," that is, "The Old and the New Faith." [We giv the translation.—Ed. T. S.:]

"The position and order in which the creation of the heavenly bodies is given furnishes the most decided contradiction. These come, according to every consideration, too late. The sun is first created on the fourth day, after and notwitstanding that the change of day and night had already taken place for three days, a change that is impossible and unthinkable without the sun. Moreover the earth is created several days before the sun, and both it and the moon hav only an attendant relation to the earth. The stars too are only thought of afterward as an appendix. This is a complete reversal of the true relation of the order and rank of the heavenly bodies, and one which is sadly unbecoming in an infallible revealed record."

I hav a word to say about one part of my opponent's speech which was most startling. He told us that, in the first chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, the language was so bad that he would not defile your ears by reading it to you. I would ask Mr. Hatchard to remember that these words are read in the churches when the first chapter of Romans happens to be the lesson for the day, unless, indeed, the clergyman be better than his creed, and feels that he ought not to read it before decent men and women. Does not my opponent know that there are passages in the Bible infinitly worse than this chapter which he refuses to read before you on account of its language? Does he not put this Bible into the hands of little children, though he will not read it before grown men and people to whom the world has taught the knowledge of evil? Not read the New Testament aloud before women because of its foulness! But oh, sir (turning to Mr. Hatchard), that I would not defile my little daughter's ears with this foulness was one of the charges against me when your creed took away from me my child.

MR. HATCHARD.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies, and Gentlemen: Before I go on with some of the remarks which Mrs. Besant has made, I wish to say distinctly that we both came to discuss the influence of Christianity, and a far as I am concerned I hav distinctly kept to the subject. I say that I hav not wasted a word from the subject, nor wandered a word, because I know this subject moderately well. I did not come here to discuss the Old Testament; I came here to discuss Jesus Christ and his teaching and his influence on the world. I know perfectly well that it is a very cheap argument, indeed, about what is related in the books of Moses about slavery; but I want to see the same thing in the New Testament. I find nothing in the teaching of the New Testament about this treatment of these slaves, about the women and such like. I hav cut off that part of the argument——[laughter and interruption].

[The Chairman: I shall be obliged if our friends will remain perfectly quiet except so far as they may applaud during Mr. Hatchard's speech.]

I did not come here to discuss slavery, and I allege most distinctly that it has nothing to do with the subject of the influence of Christianity upon the world. It would take too long to giv you the evidence, chapter and verse, how Christianity did ameliorate the world. But down to the time of Constantine—roughly, three hundred years—it was Christian sentiment and Christian teaching that taught the doctrin of Christian brotherhood that put down the slavery that existed in the ancient world. With regard to what Mrs. Besant has told you about persecution, the unfortunate thing is that I agree with every word she says; and if I had to come out on this platform to lecture on what has been called Christianity in the world, I should say the same thing as Mrs. Besant. I say when not only the Romish church, but the Protestant church likewise, persecuted and burnt people at the stake, or did all the other awful things that we read about in history, that they were not acting upon Christian principles in any sense whatever. They were acting in the same intolerant way that an ancient heathen nation acted when they compelled Socrates, as you hav so often heard, to put himself to death. I find that all sects and parties hav in their turn persecuted those that opposed them. I find a most extraordinary history of persecution with regard to Protestantism. I find that Elizabeth burnt a large number of Catholics, and I find that Mary persecuted a large number of Protestants. When I go to India I find a similar display of intolerance. Why did not the Brahmans let the followers of Buddha alone in India? How comes it that they persecuted each other? Why, ladies and gentlemen, the story ought to be well known to you. It was because of the persecuting spirit of the Brahmans, who could not tolerate the free spirit of the Buddhists; because the Buddhists opposed the followers of Brahma the Buddhists were driven out and persecuted most fearfully. I say most distinctly—and let this be my answer in full whether you think it is a good answer or not—when the Christian church was guilty of persecuting various persons and burnt them at the stake, that it was not acting upon Christian principles; it was not acting upon the principles of the New Testament.

Lest you should go away from here to-night without hearing the truth, let me hasten on. I told you that I had here in my hands these testimonies by various great Indian authorities. These men are witnesses—witnesses to the truth. I know Sir Bartle Frere does not meet the approbation of some people; but I tell you most distinctly that as an officer of the government he is a competent witness to what has been done. [Interruption.]

[THE CHAIRMAN: If any interruption is offered I shall allow Mr. Hatchard time for it.]

Thank you! Mr. Bradlaugh is certainly one of the fairest chairmen I ever met.

These men are competent witnesses of what takes place under their own cognizance and their own observation. But you will say, "After all, these testimonies are only the testimonies of single men;" but, ladies and gentlemen [holding up a blue book], I hav brought you a document which nobody can challenge. Our chairman knows what it is. I wish to read this with all the earnestness that my strength will allow me. This one was broken like this for a printer; but, friends, I hold here a blue book. The covers are gone. It is called "Statement Respecting the Moral and Material Progress of India During the Year 1871–2." I hav here the next volume, I believe, showing the progress of India morally and materially during 1873. These are, of course, official books, and I take the trouble to get these in order that I may show that my statements can be supported by indisputable evidence. I find here five pages with respect to the progress of missions, Christian missions, in India, and what they hav done; and I may tell you the Church Missionary Society had these reprinted to take about the country to read to the people. I only hav time to read briefly, so to speak, an extract, the last extract. It is called "General Influence of Missionary Teaching." This is not the word of a missionary deputation; it is not the word of a single official governor. It is the word of the official report in the blue book; and it says this (ladies and gentlemen, I ask you to remember these words): "But the missionaries in India hold the opinion that the winning of these converts, whether in the cities or in the open country, is but a small portion of the beneficial results which hav sprung from their labors. No statistics can giv a fair view of all that they hav done. They consider that their distinctiv teaching, now applied to the country for many years, has powerfully affected the entire population. The moral tone of their preaching is recognized and highly approved by multitudes who do not follow them as converts. The various lessons which they inculcate hav given to the people at large new ideas, not only on purely religious questions, but on the nature of evil, the obligations of law, and the motivs by which human conduct should be regulated. Insensibly a higher standard of moral conduct is becoming familiar to the people, especially to the young, which has been set before them not merely by public teaching, but by the millions of printed books and tracts which are scattered widely through the country."

Christianity, they tell us, is opposed to education and knowledge!

"On this account they express no wonder that the ancient systems are no longer defended as they once were; many doubts are felt about the rules of caste; the great festivals are not attended by the vast crowds of former years; and several theistic schools hav been growing up among the more educated classes, especially in the presidency cities, who profess to hav no faith in the idol-gods of their fathers."

Now, there is much more that I might hav read, and if I might be allowed to publish it in the National Reformer, I should like to do so. Now, perhaps you would like to see what things were in India before the introduction of Christianity. I think I hav about three minutes left, and I will show you some pictures I hav brought with me of the gods they used to worship in India. That [showing the first of a series of large colored diagrams fixed at the back of the platform] is one of the idols. That is Siva. That represents Kali or Durga. She has a thousand names, and it used to be that human sacrifices were constantly offered to her. It would take me a full night to tell you of the horrors of the worship of that most horrible and disgusting goddess. That is one of the old things which hav been put down. There you hav what is called the "swing festival;" and I tell you here to-night that the swing festival—one of the most horrible things—has almost entirely died out because of what Christianity has taught.

Here is another thing, the exposing of infants by the banks of the Ganges. That is dying out. Here we hav the festival of Juggernaut; and I stand here to-night to tell you that this festival, which used to be attended by say 250,000 Hindoos, has now only about ten thousand. I cannot tell you all that Christianity has done in India during the last eighty years. Is it dead?

Here is another picture. Here you hav the burning of the Indian widow. Was it not Christianity and Christian sentiment which put that down?—and you know how deeply rooted it was in the Indian mind. The testimony with regard to what Christianity has done in India in effecting a moral change, a moral alteration, a moral revolution, is something wonderful. I hav testimonies in this book (Indian Missionary Manual, 1870, John Murdoch) which are enough to convince anybody. I say distinctly, what I hav told you about the moral progress in India, the alteration in the public mind, has been brought about by Christian teaching and Christian preaching in the land.

The late Miss Mary Carpenter was a friend of mine, and she and I and Sir Mutu Coomaru Swarmy, with some other friends, established a "National Indian Association" in Manchester, some years ago, to make known in this country what was being done in India. You say, perhaps, that you don't take my word for it; but I can bring forward chapter and verse to prove all that I hav told you. Well, then, you hav seen what I hav tried to do to-night. I hav tried to show a parallel between these two things—what Christianity effected morally in the Roman empire during the first three hundred years down to the time of Constantine and what Christianity has effected in India in the last seventy or eighty years.

The Wandering Christian.

The wandering Jew is historical. Throughout the ends of the earth he is world-famous. He aptly typifies humanity in its suffering, its heroism, and its eternity. What shall we say of the wandering Christian? The latter is conspicuously typified by the notorious Moody, the revivalist, who at present honors this city with his valuable presence. For over eighteen hundred years the wandering Christian has lived on the credulity of mankind. From the days of Peter and Paul to the days of Moody and Sankey he has fed and fattened upon the foolish fears of humanity. He toiled not, neither did he spin, and yet the lilies of the field were not arrayed like unto him. He has robed himself in costly and funeral black and adorned his "sacred" person with the spotless choker like unto the fair white snow that crowns the everlasting hills that sit amongst the clouds. He has never soiled his dainty hands with honest and honorable toil; he has wandered about the earth a sponge and parasite, absorbing the dollars of the rich and the poor alike, and clinging with ferocious tenacity to the hulk of superstition. With a cunningly-devised fable he has gone amongst mankind, and, assuming an air of piety that would deceive the devil himself, succeeded in decoying innocent children and hysterical women into the fold. Women and children and weak-brained men hav ever been the material from which the wandering Christian priest, preacher, revivalist, evangelist, or colporter has sought to procure converts. With these alone has he been successful. He preys upon human weakness. The emotional element in mankind has been the harp of a thousand strings upon which he has played with consummate ability. This has been his stock in trade, and through it the wandering Christian has easily procured his bread and butter, laughing all the time at the curse which condemned men to earn a living by the sweat of their brows.

The wandering Christian loves ease and comfort. He even goes so far as to delight in having his bread buttered by a lovely convert, while he sits and praises the Lord that he is not like unto others; that is, in plain language, that he does not hav to work for a living. He can sing psalms all day with unction; but ask him to cut a cord of wood, or hold the plow for an hour, or even feed the chickens, and you insult him, you commit a heinous offense against the dignity of "the cloth." Labor is not divine with him; honest toil is not a blessing. He is not at home in either. But place the wandering Christian in a big church, with handsome pews and well-carpeted floors, giv him a big organ and a nice choir composed principally of pretty lady singers, light the gas and turn on the heaters, so as to make the atmosphere deliciously semi-tropical in its temperature, place a bushel of Bibles around and about him, giv him a mixed but lively congregation of saints and sinners, then start him on "I Love Jesus," and the way that wandering Christian will "play fantastic tricks before high heaven" will even "astonish the Jews." That is where he is at home. The work is congenial to him. He is an immense card in this kind of business, and if you don't believe it go and hear Moody and Sankey at Dr. Stone's church. The great talent of the wandering Christian is to talk most about that of which he knows the least. For an hour at a time Mr. Moody will talk about heaven. The unsuspecting hearer, like the writer, for instance, would imagin that the revivalist had been there a thousand times. He has made charts of the whole route, and talks as flippantly about the way to get there as he would about taking a trip to Red Dog Gulch or San Leandro. Now if Mr. Moody could see through a tombstone farther than any other man, we might hav some faith in following his directions along the road that leads to heaven. But we know that he is as blind as a bat in that matter, hence we are not astonished that other bats should believe in his ravings.

The means employed by Mr. Moody to "bring souls to God" are those used by the wandering Christian wherever we find him. To work upon the emotions and imaginations is his great forte. If Mr. Moody, instead of lounging luxuriously in Dr. Stone's church, would make a raid on Tar Flat and the Barbary Coast and rescue the souls who are reveling there on the ragged edge of perdition, snatch them bald-headed before the throne of grace, and make good honest men out of them, then the Jewish Times would sing his praises until the angels in heaven heard our songs of rejoicing and re-echoed back the glorious refrain. If Mr. Moody would go about and labor in the houses of sin and corruption, if he would visit the dens of infamy and call men and women unto repentance and righteousness, then could we sing peans in his praise. If he visited the jails and the penitentiaries and moved the hearts of the hardened criminals there to love and respect for man and God, then could we chant songs of praise in behalf of the great revivalist. But we can hav no sympathy with him in the wishy-washy, namby-pamby, milk-and-water pabulum he expectorates at Dr. Stone's church. There's nothing in it, and every sensible man, regardless of his religious bias, knows this. Yet Moody's ranting is a perfect picture of the wandering Christian the world over. There are thousands of good and honest citizens, sincere in their opinions and kind in their conduct toward their fellow-creatures, who are heartily sick and tired, if not disgusted, with the wandering Christian as typified by the wind and fury fanatics of Moody mold.

Rev. Mr. Isaacs Loomis' Remarkable Seance.

Liberals, gentlemen of education and mental culture, why is it that you and the learned portion of the church so perfectly blend in the sacred union in science, if so be what is called science may at some time turn out to be all in vain and be laid aside as useless? Because our higher education was not founded in natural things. Its statics, geometry, astronomy, and geology hav been misleading, and their errors hav been assumed as truths. And hence the anti-Copernican mists hav not been cleared away, and to this day darkness is put for natural light, and Christians and Liberals in science form one brotherhood.

MY REMARKABLE SEANCE.

I sought for an interview with the goddess of learning, and cried, For the sake of the world, help me! As I gazed on her, she said: As I move, so moves the sun, and the earth rests. As I will, God hears and answers prayer, or there is no God to hear. When I taught that gods of gold were worthy of adoration, my Israelitish pupils cried, These be thy gods, O Israel! Under my unerring guidance the educated of 1880 execute their grand geometrical march to the tune of a divine man who died, not knowing the cause of sunrise. I hav so bewildered reason and blinded faith that the most highly gifted of all classes of men believe that on a single atom there is field sufficiently large to receive the attractions of all other bodies in the solar system. On the minds of my theological pupils I can produce anything I will, for it is the accident of education which makes the student the kind of minister he hopes to be. For example, I will select the divine theoren, John iii, 16, "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son," and then call on a few of superior tact to show the meaning of the quotation.

1. This man of God has studied the original scriptures with the intention to understand them, and he says, God never had a son, and hence Christ's death was without saving efficacy.

2. Equally pious, holy, and fervent, my next pupil demonstrates that God's love in the gift of his son assures us of the salvation of every man.

3. I lead in the way of Newton, and taught him, in the Section VII. of his Principia, to describe how bodies rise and fall in appearance, not how they really rise and fall.

4. The profoundly sublime J. W. Draper, M.D., LL.D., charmed by my virgin beauty, and doing homage to the mistress of the intellectual world, dared to hav a conflict between religion and science. Dear man, so moral, that I am glad to know it, having the divine qualities so richly inhering, I call you to a reconsideration of the facts of nature.

Yours, REV. W. ISAACS LOOMIS.

SUPPOSE that any tyrant could establish so complete a system of espionage as to be informed of every word which any of his subjects might utter. It is obvious that all criticisms upon him would be laudatory in the extreme, for they would be all pronounced, as it were, in the presence of the tyrant, and there we know that no one dares to express even dissent of opinion. The unlimited agency of the Deity is equivalent to this universal espionage. He is conceived as the unseen witness of everything which passes our lips—indeed even of our thoughts. It would be madness, therefore, to hazard an unfavorable judgment of his proceedings while thus constantly under his supervision.—Philip Beauchamp.

Paine's Monument at New Rochelle.

A little over forty years ago a monument to the memory of Thomas Paine was erected on the farm he owned, about two miles north of the village of New Rochelle, in Westchester county, and some eighteen miles from this city. It is a square column of granit, in the Grecian style, with a life-size medallion of Paine surrounded by a wreath. The four sides of the monument are covered with quotations from Paine's work, neatly cut in the granit. It stands in a small square lot by the side of the road leading from the New Rochelle to White Plains.

Thousands of persons hav visited this monument, and from a spirit of desecration or from a desire to possess a piece of Paine's monument, considerable depredations hav been committed. Persons hav taken boulders and knocked off the corners of the monument as high up as could be reached, often interfering with the lettering. This givs the monument a ragged, damaged appearance, in which condition it should not be suffered to remain.

It is proposed to round the corners and recut a few hundred of the letters so as to make the monument look as good as new and prevent its being damaged again in the same way. An estimate has been made by stone-cutters as to what these repairs will cost and the sum is set at one hundred dollars, including some needed repairs to the wall surrounding the lot whereon the monument stands. It is wished to make these repairs upon the opening of spring and to accomplish it the money will hav to be raised. A committee has been appointed to see that the work is properly done and paid for. The same consists of H. B. Brown and D. M. Bennett, of New York, and Capt. George Lloyd and Mr. Secord, of New Rochelle. Mr. Brown is treasurer. Subscriptions for this purpose are solicited from the friends of Thomas Paine, who feel disposed to thus contribute and will be duly acknowledged in these columns. The same may be sent to Mr. Brown or to the editor of this paper.

Singing Stones.

On Thusday evening of last week we attended at Steck Hall Prof. Baudre's exhibition of what are called singing stones, which were mentioned by a contributor in our issue of last week. The stones are irregular oblong flints, from eight to sixteen inches in length by one and a half to three inches in thickness, as they were dug out of the sand in France within the past twenty-five years. They were suspended by twine on a frame—some twenty-seven in number—and were played upon by the professor by striking them with oblong stones of a smaller size, when beautiful tones were drawn out. He played upon them much as a pianist would upon his instrument, and discoursed beautiful music, rendering in the most artistic manner several popular airs. By the most patient search and testing among many hundreds of stones, a sufficient number giving tones were found from which enough were selected to make up the regular music board or octaves, chording perfectly in tone. It is a wonderful thing that unattractiv flints should possess such sweet musical sounds, and that a man should be able to play upon them as on an organ or piano. Nature doubtless possesses many wonders not yet discovered.

Legal Opinion of Comstock.

Before Judge Gildersleeve's court in this city a case was recently brought against Zachariah E. Simmons, the lottery dealer. His counselors, John Graham and H. M. Whitehead, moved that the indictment be quashed on the ground that a preliminary examination had not been had in the police court, but that it had originated in the grand jury room at the instance of Anthony Comstock. They contended in their argument that there was no legal evidence before the jury, and that the grand jury never passed on the different counts of the indictment, but passed on them by one vote. In the course of his argument, Mr. Graham expressed himself very freely, characterizing Comstock, among other things, as a "hound" and a "hireling." Truth givs the following report:

Mr. Whitehead contended that the indictment could not hold good on the evidence or information of a hired informer of the Society for the Prevention of Crime, and Comstock was no other than an informer who went about and devoted himself to attempting to seduce persons into the commission of crime. There had of course to be a buyer, and it was agreed by the society that Comstock should be such buyer. He further argued that when this man became a buyer he participated in the crime, and his testimony or whatever he said before the grand jury should go for nothing; it had no legal weight. Mr. Whitehead alluded to a bill that was now pending before the Legislature to giv this society more power—to form it into a sort of court and to make Comstock the prosecuting officer.

Mr. Graham interrupting, said that when such detectivs as Comstock were put on the stand they ought to mount them and tear them all to pieces. (Laughter.)

Mr. Whitehead, continuing, further argued that Comstock was particeps criminis in this crime, if crime there had been committed, and that in this case his testimony was insufficient for the grand jury to find a bill of indictment. The nature of Comstock's calling was such as to destroy his credibility as a witness.

Mr. Graham said that this matter should be sent before a police magistrate for investigation. This society say they know of what stuff Comstock is made, and we want to know also of what sort of stuff he is made. We want to lay him on the anatomical table and dissect him and see the sort of stuff he is made of.

District-Attorney Bell argued that the other side had not advanced a single ground upon which the motion could be sustained to quash the indictment, and held that the court had already decided that the grand jury could take up a case without it having been before a police magistrate.

Mr. Graham, interrupting, said they wanted the other side to build their house upon their foundation. They had considerable more to say than they had said. They desired to hav an examination of the grand jury or some of its members, and to hav the records of the grand jury before the court. A greater outrage than the indictment of Mr. Simmons had never been presented to a court, and they desired to know from the records of the grand jury just precisely what Comstock had testified to, if any testimony he gave. His client was an innocent man, he contended, and maintained they would show that the indictment was not worth the paper it was written upon.

Mr. Bell said that there was no authority in the state for calling for the proceedings before the grand jury.

Mr. Graham still maintained his belief that Comstock gave no positiv evidence to the grand jury; that he merely haranged them and told them he was engaged in the suppression of crime, and the grand jury rendered indictments, not knowing what they had indicted his client for.

Mr. Bell contended that the proposition of the learned counsel to summon and examin the grand jury was preposterous, and to go into the grand jury room would seriously affect their work in the future. It would be dangerous to establish such a precedent. There was no irregularity on the face of the indictment, and he maintained that the court should dismiss the motion.

The case was here laid over till another day, Mr. Graham stating that he should require over an hour in his final argument.

Book Notices.

THE BIBLE BALANCED; or, THE INFIDEL'S TEXT BOOK. Comparing some of the best teachings and sayings of the Bible with those of sages and philosophers who lived previous to the authors of the Bible; and also a partial exposure of its errors. By George C. Darling, Charlotte, Mich.

This is a very convenient and useful publication of 124 full pages. The quotations from the Bible are in the left-hand column of the page, while quotations of a superior character from pagan sages, philosophers, and teachers are in the right-hand column. The work is divided into chapters, each treating a different subject, and the whole followed by a collection of the various imperfections in the character of the Bible God and of the book itself, consisting principally of biblical quotations. It is a valuable compilation and a grand aid in obtaining a bird'seye view of the fallacies of the Bible and its deity. Sold at this office. Price, 50 cents.

INGERSOLL IN CANADA. Second edition. Revised and enlarged. By Allen Pringle.

When Col. R. G. Ingersoll visited the Dominion in the spring of 1880, and delivered at several points his inimitable anti-theological speeches, the orthodox of the entire country were thoroughly alarmed, and the church was greatly disturbed that people should flock to hear the great Infidel. It was felt incumbent on the faithful that the Colonel's arguments should be answered, and consequently several answers and refutations duly appeared, notably those of Wendling, Archbishop Lynch of Toronto, Bystander, a Rationalist, Mr. Bray, and others. Mr. Allen Pringle, of Selby, Ont., wrote a reply to these, of which 2,000 copies were published and readily disposed of. To meet the demand he has just issued 4,000 more, revised and enlarged. The little work is extremely well written, and the refuters are thoroughly answered. It contains arguments and facts most interesting to Christians and Freethinkers. Price 20 cents. Sold at this office.

KNIGHT TEMPLARISM ILLUSTRATED. A full and complete Illustrated Ritual of the six degrees of the council and commandery, comprising the degrees of Royal Master, Select Master, Super Excellent Master, Knight of the Red Cross, Knight Templar, and Knight of Malta, with a sketch of their origin and character. Ezra A. Cook, Chicago. 341 pages.

The numerous illustrations show the initiations, signs, grips, and symbols. Not being a Knight Templar, a Mason, or a member of any secret order, we are not able to say whether the book tells the truth or not, but we presume it is mainly correct. The reader will hav an opportunity to judge for himself.

New Papers.

The Rights of Man. A weekly journal devoted to its name and published at Salem, Ohio. It has a good name and seems to be a good paper. Three numbers of this sixteen-page paper hav reached us, and from the slight reading given it we pronounce it ably conducted. It is largely devoted to political and financial subjects. Price of the sixteen-page edition, $1.50 per year; eight-page edition, 50 cents per year.

The Scientific Investigator. Devoted to scientific and Spiritualistic philosophy. Published at Portland, Or., at $1 per year.

The Old and New. By E. Searl, Morrison, Ill. Published semi-monthly. This neat little four-page journal, at 50 cents a year, well filled with original prose and poetry, ought to find patrons enough to keep it alive. It is of a Spiritualistic character.

CEPHAS B. LYNN lectured before the Second Society of Spiritualists in this city last Sunday evening, on the relation between "Spiritualisum" andthe church. The same truths, he said, lay at the foundation of both, only they were differently interpreted. He urged Spiritualists to dissociate themselvs from the adherents of Materialism. He disavowed his own intention of joining the church, but in effect advised his hearers to do so, considering church members a little nearer worthy their fellowship than Materialists. Adopting a figure of speech, he said that Spiritualists should capture the machinery of the church, and then use the unexplained phenomena—the "winnowed residuum"—of their own philosophy as a lever to draw inspiration from. This startling metaphor drew forth applause. He closed his lecture with an invocation which was very painful, and remarked that he would speak again next Sunday.

Communications.

Dr. Winterburn.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of Jan. 29, 1881, I notice an article headed "Death of an Old and Dear Friend. Dr. Charles Winterburn was found dead in his bed last Sunday morning, having died of heart disease."

It is not with the intention of being contrary that I beg to differ in opinion to the report of the cause of the death of Dr. Winterburn, although that report is probably as near the truth as the alleged cause of death of nine-tenths on record at the Bureau of Vital Statistics of the city of New York.

Having the time of birth of Dr. Winterburn at hand, I wish to show from his nativity that it was an impossibility for him to hav died of heart disease. In the first place, he had no planet whatever in his nativity in the sign Leo, which sign governs the heart, neither was the sun (which is part ruler of the heart) in any way afflicted.

The real cause of death in his case was paralysis of the brain, which is shown by the planet Mercury in the sign Aries (which sign rules the head), leaving an opposition of Jupiter, and being in exact square to the cusp of the first house, and the evil planets Saturn and Mars are both in conjunction in the ascendant (the ascendant, or first house always rules the head and face).

The Doctor's death is shown by the evil planet Saturn transiting the sign Aries and coming to an opposition of his moon, the moon being the "giver of life," or the main supporter of life in his nativity. At the time of his death Saturn was within eleven minutes of an exact opposition to the moon. Also Mars was on the very degree and minute of his ascendant and within four minutes of an exact square of his Mercury in the sign Aries. Nothing could be more marked in indicating that the cause of death was not in the heart but in the head, and that his brain became paralyzed. There never has been known a case of a person with such a nativity dying of heart disease.

One week before his death, or when Mars came to the cusp of his ascendant and in square to his Jupiter, that night he was lying in bed and he became blind and unconscious, remaining so for possibly an hour or two; that does not show anything like heart disease.

The very next aspect, which occurred on the 23d of January, was the final stroke. He appears to hav been conscious that he would not liv by these influences, and mentioned the subject at breakfast to his family on the morning of the 22d.

That he had premonition these aspects would end his life is indicated by his showing his nativity to a friend, who is an amateur in astrology, on the night of the 22d. He asked his friend what he thought of those aspects which were about to take place in his own nativity. This friend told the doctor that he thought they would giv him a shaking up before they went by. He did not hav a long-lived nativity, and it is probable that nothing could hav been done to hav prolonged his life.

Some years ago, when speaking with me as to the various causes of death in nativities, he told me he expected his aspects would cause paralysis, and that would be the final cause of his death.

Outside of my own family there is no death that could hav brought greater affliction to myself. He was one of those few men who the more you knew him the better you appreciate him, and his original manner of thinking made him always an interesting companion. One could never hav a few minutes' conversation with him without learning something. His knowledge of homeopathic materia medica was truly marvelous, and "he was a man, take him all in all, we shall not look upon his like again."

He became interested in astrology while attending a course of lectures given on that subject by myself some fourteen years ago in this city. He was a diligent student in astrology, and it was of infinit advantage to him in diagnosing and prognosing diseases in his practice of medicin, and, as you say, when he was called to see a new patient he tried to procure the time of birth of the patient, and prescribed his remedies with direct reference to the planetary positions in the patient's nativity, and you say that his success in the treatment of disease was not surpassed by any physician in the city, but should you talk to his patients you will find there was no physician to be compared to him in making cures. For many years he was the only physician that I hav called in consultation in difficult cases or serious attacks in my own family. Had it not been for astrology I doubt if he would hav been any more than an ordinary physician, although he was a man of uncommon intellectual powers.

Had it been his fortune to hav studied astrology and medicin in early life, there is no doubt he would hav made a second Hippocrates, judging by the rapid progress he made in the short time he was acquainted with astrology. Indeed, Hippocrates would never hav been the "father of medicin" had he been ignorant of astrology, and Galen's name would hav fallen into oblivion had it not been for his knowledge on the same subject. Galen declared "anatomy to be the right eye of physics and astrology its left." Hippocrates says that "the man who did not well understand astrology was rather deserving to be called a fool than a physician." If he had said that the man who did not well understand astrology was rather deserving to be called a wholesale murderer than a physician, he would hav been much nearer the mark.

The persecutions astrologers hav had to endure for several hundreds of years, thank heaven, are now coming to an end, and the ridicule against astrology appears to be dying out.

In the preface to a pamphlet I published some time ago on "Astrology and Astro-Medical Botany," I said:

"The revival of the ancient science of astrology is now assured beyond a doubt. Twenty years ago, when I first commenced publishing Broughton's Monthly Planet Reader and Astrological Journal, at that time the only publication of the kind in the world, the word 'astrology' had to be spoken in polite society with 'bated breath; the astrologers were relegated to the category of fools and knaves, and the ministers of the gospel consigned them to the torments and tortures of the infernal regions. The newspapers, lecturers, and periodicals of that day mentioned the word 'astrology' only when they wanted to create a laugh, or to hold up its votaries to public ridicule; and I know from dearly-bought experience that astrologers had no more rights, either in the community or in a court of justice, than a 'nigger' had 'away down South' in the days of slavery. But thanks to the lectures and writing of Profs. Tyndall, Huxley, and Darwin, the scales are dropping from people's eyes, and they are beginning to find out that the world is governed by fixed laws, and that 'miracles' are at a discount. Ministers no longer preach sermons against astrology, and on account of public attention being drawn to the near approach of the perihelion of the planets, almost every newspaper, both in this country and Europe, has contained articles advocating the belief in the influence of the planets.

"The London Evening Standard of July 6, 1880, in commenting on Mr. B. G. Jenkins' paper on meteorology and planetary influence, read by him before the Dulwich College Geological Club, said:

"'From the lofty hights of modern science we hav been accustomed to look down with pity and contempt upon the astrologers of the middle ages, the weak dabblers in science who were foolish enough to believe that the stars had an influence upon man. An allusion to astrologers was always good to raise a laugh at a science meeting, and the astrologers and alchemists were classed together as either dreamers or charlatans. Of late years, however, a certain reaction has set in. The astrologer is becoming rehabilitated very rapidly. The influence of the planets upon the earth is now admitted to be very distinct, and fresh proofs of their disturbing influences are constantly cropping up.'

"A few scientific men having made observations on the coincidence of the sun spots with extraordinary features of weather, and also discovering that the sun spots were caused by the influence of the planets, and in this way having gradually led the thinking public to recognize that the master minds of former generations were not entirely mistaken in tracing the mutations of weather and of mundane events to planetary influence, the day is now fast dawning when astrology shall again take rank with the physical sciences, and the predictions of the astrologer will go hand in hand with the calculations of the astronomer.

"Although the approaching perihelion of the planets has not as yet produced any particular famin except in Ireland and certain parts of Russia and Turkey; nor any noted pestilence except the yellow fever in 1878 and 1879 in New Orleans, Granada, Vicksburg, and Memphis; the black pest and diphtheria in Russia and part of Turkey, and the cholera in India; yet every one knows that long droughts are becoming more common; the heats of summer are felt to be more oppressiv and destructiv to human life, more people dying from heat in cities with the mercury at 85° than in former years at 95°; malarial fever was never before so common among all classes, and steamboat and railroad accidents are almost of every-day occurrence. These are some of the effects of our earth not getting its usual share of life and magnetism from the sun, on account of so many of the other superior planets being in their perihelion and drawing more than their usual share of life and magnetism from that body."

When the large superior planets are in their aphelion circuits, far removed from the earth, we get along pretty well, there are no—or comparativly very few—epidemics, pestilences, or famins; but under the perihelion or proximations of the superior planets organized life struggles and succumbs, long drouths, epidemics, pestilences, and famins abound.

The anxious physicians hav sought in vain for two thousand years among the fogs and fens of earth for their cause; hav explored diligently the air, the water, terene emanations, the forces of catalysis, zymosis, and eremacansis, and they now hav supposed in these latter days that they hav found it in malaria, animalculæ, and contagion; in fine, they hav projected hypotheses, launched forth theories, discoursed sagely on occult qualities, and explored faithfully all the avenues and sources of disease this world of ours contains, and are as far removed now, in this day, as they were in the days of Hippocrates, the father of medicin, from a true and satisfactory explanation of the cause of epidemics. Some physicians hav long since given up the search in despair, and assigned it to be the will of God or the vengeance of God for our sins.

The scientists of Europe having paid particular attention these late years to the sun spots and making faithful and close observations, and having discovered that those large sun spots only occur when the large superior planets are in their perihelion, we are more likely to hav a more rational hypothesis of the cause of epidemics, etc.

I cannot better close this article than with a clipping from one of the New York dailies of Jan. 31, 1881, showing that the scientists, even in this country, are now making observations in the right directions:

"This has been a stormy month on the sun. Tempests powerful enough to sweep every living thing from the face of the earth hav spent their force upon the great glowing orb, and their effects hav been visible at the distance of ninety odd million miles. Those who hav not looked at the sun through a telescope since 1878, when its broad disk was as free from spots as the polished gold case of a watch, would be astonished at the change in its telescopic appearance. It is now like the shield of a warrior, dented and pierced by many fierce strokes. On some days an opera glass powerful enough to define the curve of an actress' eyebrow has sufficed to show the dark nucleus of a solar cyclone. Spots larger than this earth hav appeared and vanished. Day after day the whole surface of the sun has been mottled and wrinkled under the strain of forces so tremendous that in comparison with them the strength of a volcano seems puny.

"There hav been only three clear days during January when, with an ordinary spyglass, the sun's disk appeared unspotted. These sun storms are not likely to decrease in fury for some years yet. The new spot period is just beginning, and before it passes astronomers hope to hav learned far more about this interesting and puzzling subject than they know now. The weight of evidence shows that there is a close relation between the condition of the sun and the earth's meteorology. Hundreds of telescopes are daily turned upon the sun from all quarters of the earth, and careful records of observations are kept. There has been a vast advance in our knowledge of the great luminary since the second Herschel suggested, only some twenty years ago, that the curious bright spots in the sun known as willow leaves might be gigantic living beings, whose intense vitality made them glow so dazzlingly. Yet what has been learned is slight in comparison with what remains to be learned."

A Model League.

Nestled among the hills at the confluence of three rivers is the neat, picturesque village of Port Jervis, N. Y. It seems to hav imbibed free principles from the mountains around. Though there are several churches, yet its largest, fullest, happiest meeting of citizens every Sunday night is its Liberal League. They hav a fine hall hired by the year, and they provide a speaker for every Sunday night, whom they contrive to pay when pay is required. At the opening of the lecture season the leading members subscribe liberally as a basis to go upon during the year, and then they are unanimous in adopting one church usage, they take up a collection after every lecture. And what is more, it is a collection, a liberal one, amounting to nearly or quite $10 every Sunday.

A valuable feature, which is always interesting and always draws, is the music of the orchestra. This is inexpensiv, as it is furnished by the members themselvs.

Mrs. H. S. Lake is a favorite speaker with the Liberals of Port Jervis, as she well deserves to be. She has occupied their platform one or two seasons for courses of lectures, and is there this season. To fill a disappointment in her absence last Sunday night, January 30th, this League sent to New York for Mr. Wakeman, the Treasurer; but as he could not go, they fell back on the Secretary. He went and told them what he knew about "Social Evolution," and he improved the opportunity to see with his own eyes and hear with his own ears how outspoken, courageous, enterprising citizens could manage an auxiliary League and make it a success. It seems to be easy enough to do. All successes are easy. Only failure makes a hard road to travel.

The leading members of the Port Jervis League are, Joseph Weed, President; R. A. Conklin, Secretary. The orchestra is composed of James Rhodes, violin; Wilmot M. Vail, flute; Wm. T. Bush, bass viol; E. Wickam, piano. The brothers W. M. and R. M. J. Vail, prominent members, are old and successful merchants in the place. There is no flinching about them on any demand of Liberalism. The Comstock legislation gets no quarter from them nor from any others in the League. The Vails remember and speak kindly of Brothers Mendum and Seaver, who hav visited there; also of those other two good fellows, W. H. Burr and "Antichrist," and hav anecdotes and reminiscences to tell of them all.

The secretary left Port Jervis with a gladness that there is one such League, but with sorrow that all are not like unto it. There are a few, and may their tribe increase. With the whole 206 auxiliaries alive and flourishing the National Liberal League would be a power that the opposition would no longer find it profitable to lie about. T. C. Leland.

League Man for February (No. 4), organ of the National Liberal League, double number, sixteen pages, will contain the whole of the address of the "National Association for the Secularization of the State," issued by the committee, B. F. Underwood, R. C. Spencer, and Van Buren Denslow. Price, 5 cents single; 6 copies for 25 cents; 13 for 50 cents; 30 for $1; 100 for $3. Every Liberal ought to take one hundred, and every Liberal should send for a dozen or more to circulate.

League Man, monthly, per annum, 25 cents.

Debate.

Elder Clark Braden and W. F. Jamieson will debate in Linesville Station, Crawford Co., Pa., Feb. 14th, 15th, 16th, and 17th, on the following resolution:

"Paine was infamously untruthful, totally wanting in integrity, utterly unreliable; expressed remorse and regret for his Infidel writings; expressed his determination to correct his attacks on Christianity; abandoned a good woman forty years before his death.

"I, Clark Braden, hav clear proof, proof beyond the possibility of all doubt, that my charges against Thomas Paine are true. Signed,

"Clark Braden, affirmativ.
"W. F. Jamieson, negativ."

Four days' debate, two sessions each day, affirmativ opening, negativ closing each session. Speeches twenty minutes each, two hours each session. Hedge's Rules of Logic to govern the debate. Address all letters to W. F. Jamieson, Linesville Station, Crawford Co., Pa.

George Chainey's address is No. 3 Union Park, Boston, Mass.

Mental maturity, at what age do we attain it, that is to say, those of us who are not predestined to perpetual greenness? It has been said that a man may be a fool at thirty, and yet die a sage. Rather questionable, that. The fool at forty is admitted by metaphysicians to be a hopeless case. Let him who has learned nothing by experience at that age stand from the world of action; he is not fit to play his part in it. His only safety is in being dry-nursed by some stronger nature than his own. Dull youths, or youths called dull, sometimes mature, however, into great men. Sheridan, we are told, was a particularly stupid schoolboy. Perhaps the fault was in the schoolmaster, not in the pupil. There was in Sheridan's days, and there are yet, multitudes of bad teachers. Pedantic pedagogs of the Doctor Bilimber class are as plenty as blackberries, and the mill-horse system of education is still in vogue. Overcrammed students rarely turn out well, while those who cannot be crammed generally do. If there be anything that is unpromising it is precocity. It is better to be comparativly ignorant at five-and-twenty than to be a prodigy at thirteen. We entirely agree with the doctrin that the most useful part of man's education is not that which he receives in schools and colleges. The world is the university in which the grandest and most useful lessons are taught, and in a way which fixes them indelibly in the memory. The Groves of Academus are not to be despised; but let him who desires to be a man among men beware of neglecting those paths of wisdom which lie through the marketplaces of mankind. Wisdom is not a thing that can be injected into us with a scholastic forcing-pump. It can only be acquired by observation, reflection, and the independent exercise of the judgment.

Truth's Sunday Sermons.

I.—The Creation.

TEXT.—And God said, Let there be light, and there was light.—Gen. i 3.

Our preacher is not a Hebrew scholar, as are his orthodox contemporaries; and he is, therefore, like the majority of mankind, compelled to absorb his share of divine revelation from more favored servants of deity.

If any confidence can be reposed in students of the language, the text, as quoted, is not correctly translated from the Hebrew. They tell us that the Hebrew equivalent for "God" in the text is plural, and that therefore the rendering should be, "And the gods said, Let there be light, and there was light."

This, however, is a matter of slight importance. It only shows that the author of the beautiful poem, which the first chapter of Genesis truly is, was not a believer in one only God.

Following the chapter further down, the reader cannot but be impressed with the sublimity of the power that could produce light from darkness by a mere command, without the aid of the sun. The sun was not created until the fourth day, while the light was separated from the darkness on the first.

This, too, is of slight concern, for with God all things are possible. And, though day and night are now produced by the revolution of the globe upon its axis, whereby a constantly changing portion of its surface is always in the shadow, and the remainder under the rays of the sun, it is in no wise remarkable that the Almighty should hav originally made day and night without the operation of this now unyielding natural law. His powers rose to the necessities of the occasion, for he had a hard week's work before him. He could not be expected to create the firmament (separating the waters below it from those above it), or the dry land, or the seas, or the grass, or the herb, or the fruit tree, or the moon, or the sun itself, without light to work by. Therefore, he made the light first.

Still, one can hardly resist the thought—no doubt a wicked thought—that the author of this poem had not yet learned that the sun is the fountain of light for the earth, and that the regularly recurring darkness is caused by the earth's revolution. The impression is naturally very strong that if he had, he would hav caused the god (or gods) to construct the sun first of all. Had he done so, he would at least hav saved modern theologians much vexation and mental worry in their efforts to rationally explain the separation of light from darkness, and the growth of grass, herbs, and trees, without the radiant and warmth-giving sun, for three whole days—indeed, for three long and indefinite periods, if we are to accept recent explanations of another theological difficulty.

But, as we said before, this is of no moment. In fact the whole chapter is of little value except for its poetic merit and its exposition of an ancient religious belief, which are enjoyed by Homer's Iliad to quite as great an extent. As a history of the creation it is the veriest fudge. We may believe that in the beginning God (or the gods) created the heaven and the earth. But who believes that day and night were distinguished on the first day before the creation of the sun; the firmament created on the second; the waters and the dry land separated, and grass, herbs, and trees brought into full growth on the third; the stars, sun, and moon made on the fourth; fishes and fowls on the fifth; and beasts, reptils, and man and woman on the sixth? And all less than six thousand years ago! No one.

The story evidently refers to days as periods of twenty-four hours each; but modern geology has so effectually knocked the bottom out of the narrativ thus rendered that theologians hav fallen upon the theory that these days are long periods. Whereby they make a greater mess of it than ever.

This explanation is a good enough Morgan for the faithful now; but if it does not soon giv place to a better, the whole narrativ will go into the limbo where many another sacred story is moldering.

An intelligent and candid man has only to read the account to perceive that it is purely of human invention. It tells the story of creation as an ignorant and barbarous people would tell or receive it. The natural laws which giv us day and night, make changes in the seasons, produce grass, herbs, and trees, and separate seas from the dry land were unknown to the ancient Jews. They evidently believed that the blue ether above was a solid substance through which lights large and small blazed and shimmered; that light and darkness were entities which could be separated like maggots from a piece of cheese; that grass could grow and trees bear fruit without the rays of the sun or the droppings of the rain; and that a mist could rise from the ground without heat to evaporate the moisture within or upon the earth.

Accordingly, the story was written as we find it. All efforts to reconcile it with the truths of science or the demands of reason are as abortiv as would be an attempt to reconcile Munchausen's exploits or Gulliver's travels with the facts of human experience.

And for the same reason.

II.—The Sabbath.

TEXT.—And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it; because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made.—Gen. ii, 3.

The human intellect cannot adequately grasp the idea of deity resting. The idea of an omnipotent God with muscles to tire, nerves to wear, and tissues to consume is somewhat beyond mortal comprehension.

We cannot understand how his limitless power could enable him to flood the earth with light, and make it disappear and return at regular intervals three days or even long periods before the sun had begun to blaze in the firmament. We can understand the ease with which such a being would collect the waters of the seas into one place and heave up the dry land in a day. We can see the trees and fruit and flowers grow and ripen without sun or rain. We are fain to be dubious when told that by a single command he instantly made the light of stars to shine upon the earth, some of which are so far away that their rays are centuries in reaching us; but reflecting upon his omnipotence, we are forced to concede it. We can even believe that he selected for his own chosen people a few tribes of nomadic barbarians, leaving the more civilized inhabitants of the earth to suffer under his displeasure in ignorance of his existence. In short, there is nothing so impossible that omnipotent deity cannot accomplish it. But when asked to imagin that he endures fatigue in his wonderful labors, our credulity is taxed to its utmost limit, unless we also ascribe to him human attributes, which would hav the disadvantage of effectually ending our confidence in his omnipotence.

We cannot understand the fatigue of God.

Nor why he should take a whole day to recuperate his exhausted powers.

Nor, indeed, how he managed to make the affairs of the universe jog along while he rested, unless he had a dormant partner somewhere who took a day on to relieve him from his toil.

The text fairly bristles with interrogation points; but we hav a mission beyond asking questions. These bothersome doubts will arise sometimes, and we cannot help it; we shall endeavor, however, to direct attention to a more practical if not more serious consideration suggested by the sacred language.

The text is the scriptural origin of the Christian Sabbath, "God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it." The Jews, for whose sole and especial benefit he originally manifested himself, therefore, and in obedience to a command he afterwards delivered them, observed it as a day of absolute rest. It was to them the Sabbath, and to them it is the Sabbath to this day. The seventh day, which, by the way, is our Saturday, they are to keep holy; on it they are to do no work. It must be devoted exclusivly to worship, all labor and pleasure being strictly avoided.

Although Protestant Christians now agree with the Jews in requiring a strict observance of a Sabbath, the authority for which they derive from the same scriptural source, they strangely enough do not observe the same day. Both sects worship the same God, and profess to find his commands in the same book; but while one obeys the command to keep the Sabbath day holy by abstaining from work and recreation on Saturday, the other professes to obey the same command by similarly abstaining on Sunday. To one it is wicked to work or play on the seventh day of the week; to the other it is so only on the first.

In this difference the Jews clearly hav the best of it, upon authority. God certainly rested from his tremendous labors of a week on the seventh day, and it was the seventh day that he blessed and sanctified and made the Sabbath. It is this Sabbath too that he commanded should be kept holy. Christians justify their practice on the theory that Christ rose from the dead on Sunday, and that in commemoration of that event the Sabbath was changed from the last to the first day of the week. But they produce no authority from either the Old or the New Testament to justify their innovation. The last words the Almighty spoke to man upon this subject are found in the Old Testament, and there he is very explicit about the seventh day.

We hav many good Christian friends for whom we entertain the liveliest affection, and we cannot contemplate the terrible tortures of hell which they are indubitably destined to undergo for their persistent disregard of the seventh day of the week without a shudder. For ourselvs we are content. We expect to find more agreeable companionship there than in the so-called realms of eternal bliss. But we know that association with Ingersoll, Voltaire, Paine, Franklin, Jefferson, and a host of other brilliant minds and true hearts, will be no compensation to them, as it will be to us, for the sulphuric heat in which they must eternally sizzle for neglecting to remember the Sabbath day and keep it holy.

When we contemplate the history of the Christian Sabbath, we cannot but wonder at the sentiment of sanctity with which it has been so recently invested by Protestant Christians. One of the signs by which the early Christians signified their contempt for the Jews who had crucified the Savior was their rejection of the Jewish Sabbath. The observance of Saturday as a special day of worship soon fell into disuse among the followers of Jesus, but Sunday, the day of his resurrection, at length came to be regularly observed among them in memory of the sacred event, though not as a Sabbath in any wise modeled after that of the Jews; and when under Constantine the religion of the primitiv Christians was amalgamated with that of idolatrous Rome, Sunday was made a Christian holiday.

From that time until the beginning of the seventeenth century, it was a holiday of the church, and with the Catholics it is little more than a holiday yet. It was observed for the purpose of public worship; but cessation from labor and pleasure, especially pleasure, was not required or expected. On the contrary, after religious services the day was devoted to amusement.

But when the Puritans arose, they distinguished themselvs from the Catholics and other ungodly people in a variety of ways, among the rest by turning Sunday into a Judaical Sabbath, forbidding labor and pleasure, calling it "the Sabbath," and applying to the first day of the week the full force of the command to observe the seventh.

This whim of these pious lunatics, in much less than two hundred years, became an indisputable doctrin of the Protestant church. What Saturday has always been to the Jews, that hav they made Sunday to the Christian.

The absurdity of regarding the day with any special veneration in alleged obedience to a divine command, in the face of its history, must suggest itself to the most orthodox mind. If there is any divine command in respect to Sabbath observance it applies to the seventh day of the week, not to the first; and the Jews are obeying it, while Christians set it at defiance. And yet the Sabbatarian influence of the Puritan bigots who worshiped God with long faces, long hair, and consciences long or short according to the emergency, has come wandering down into the latter half of the nineteenth century, closing libraries, art galleries, and theaters; forbidding all pleasures; shutting off many of life's conveniences and comforts; making Sunday a day of misery to children and a bore to men; educating tender consciences to rebel against the use of the day for rational recreation, and setting it aside exclusivly for praying, psalm singing, preaching, and discussing frivolous points of a frivolous and revolting doctrin.

Nevertheless, the Sabbath sentiment among Christians has its uses. Without it, the low paid servants of pious believers would hav their noses kept down to the grindstone in one continuous round of toil year in and year out; and an eminently respectable class of the community, Christian clergyman to wit, would find their occupation and their salaries gone.

Under the Mesmeric Spell.

In Masonic Temple on Friday night Prof. A. E. Carpenter gave further experiments with some of the mesmeric subjects whom Dr. Geo. M. Beard tested in his office on Thursday. The experiments of Prof. Carpenter were more varied, and he had as many as seventeen persons on the stage and in the body of the house in a trance at one time. Of the eight men and boys and five women on the stage about two-thirds were persons with whom he had previously experimented. The others were new subjects. Prof. Carpenter says that about one woman in three is a subject, and about one man in six. The professor got his subjects in a trance state sometimes by pressing his fingers lightly on their eyelids or temples, sometimes by twirling a cane in front of them, and sometimes by waving his hand before their eyes. To bring them out he would snap his fingers in their faces, speak loudly to them, and they would rouse with a start as though from profound sleep. Some had their eyes fixed in a stare, like a sleep-walker's, while in the trance, and others acted like a person in a normal condition.

Calling a stoutly-built lad of sixteen or eighteen to the front of the platform, Prof. Carpenter put a cane in his hands and told him to hold it back on his neck. Then he told him he could not move the cane from its position, and the lad struggled and twisted in vain to do so. Then he asked the lad his name. "Cummings," was the answer. "You can't say it again," said the professor, and the lad's lips twiched but no sound came from them. Then the professor told him to go to sleep, and laid him on the floor in a profound slumber.

A lady subject was put in the trance state, and told that she could not take her clasped hands apart. She tried it without success until the spell was removed. Stepping up to a woman seated on the platform, the professor waved his hand in front of her face and said he was sorry to say that her nose was bleeding. She jumped up, clapped her handkerchief to her nose, and tried to suppress the imaginary bleeding until a snap from the professor's fingers roused her from the dream. To another woman a cane was handed, and she couldn't unclasp her hands because she had been told she couldn't. Another held the stick until the professor told her it was hot. She dropped it and rubbed her imaginary burns until put in her natural state.

Prof. Carpenter next told all the eight men to look at him. Then he told them to go to sleep. Every one obeyed immediately. Some fell on their neighbor's shoulders, some slid out of their chairs upon the floor at full length, and others dozed while sitting nearly upright. Each was aroused by a snap of the fingers and a cry of "All right" from the professor, and rubbed his eyes in bewilderment at his position. Three or four of them were bewitched again and set to work trying to catch an imaginary something that was biting them between the shoulders. One boy got up and scratched his back against one of the wings of the stage in his agony.

One of the best subjects was a man between forty-five and fifty years of age, an employee of the American Bank Note Company. He was put in a trance by a wave of the hand, and was asked if his coat was not on with the wrong side out. He glanced at it, quickly took it off and turned it, and put it on again. Then the professor inquired if it was not somebody else's coat, and the man said it was. "That young man has your coat, hasn't he?" said the professor, leading the subject down the aisle and pointing out a pretty young lady in the audience. "Yes," said the subject, who proceeded to demand the young lady's sack. The professor waved his hand before the young lady's face, and she immediately took off the sack and exchanged it for the man's coat, which she put on. The man wore the white sacque back to the platform, and was only aware of his trade when out of the trance again.

Imaginary molasses to which the professor called the entranced ladies' attention set them all to rubbing their hands vigorously, and then they all washed themselvs in an imaginary brook to which their attention was called. One of the ladies, the wife of a federal official in Brooklyn, threw finger rings and bracelets recklessly about the stage in her desire to get the molasses off her hands. When they were handed back to her with the remark that they were hot, she declared that she could not hold them in her hand.

The young lady who exchanged her sack for the man's coat was persuaded that she had a toothache, and an elderly gentleman in the audience was mesmerized and convinced that he was a dentist. He was told that the cane the professor handed him was cotton, and tried to put it in the young woman's tooth.

Seventeen persons were next mesmerized and told it was terribly hot. The women took off their wraps and fanned themselvs, the men divested themselvs of coats and vests and mopped their brows with their handkerchiefs. The Bank Note Company's employee while in a trance was told that he was a ten-year-old schoolboy, and the Brooklyn lady was convinced that she was his mother. The two had a serious time when her attention was called to the mud on her imaginary son's trousers. She washed his face in imaginary water and he squalled because he got imaginary soap in his eyes. A game of marbles in which mesmerized old men became boys, a proposal of the professor's to two mesmerized boys to going in swimming, which they proceeded to carry out by taking off their clothes, and the fright of the entire mesmerized company when the professor told the members that the cane he threw among them was a snake were other amusing scenes. The exhibition closed with a grand political mass meeting in which one entranced man supposed himself to be Gen. Butler, another Senator Blaine, and so on. Four or five subjects were speaking at once, each oblivious of the others' presence.

After the experiments Dr. Beard, who was present, invited some of his subjects to visit his office next week. He expressed great satisfaction at the tests he had seen.

An Infidel Abroad.

Lying before us is D. M. Bennett's last book, entitled "An Infidel Abroad," which my discerning wife says she would rather receive as a present than a diamond, and I rather appreciate her taste. It is a book of 846 pages, and contains Mr. Bennett's admirable letters while in Europe last fall. The book is full of interesting matter descriptiv of men, manners, places, peoples, in a way peculiar to Mr. Bennett, who has the happy faculty of telling all about all things in the most simple and pleasing manner possible. It contains more facts of interest pertaining to the old country than any other book of the same size we know of. Price, $1.50.

MR. R. FRANK, Mill, Wisconsin, writes: "The Darwins" and "John's Way" will hav a powerful influence for good. Mrs. Slenker is very able; her stories are clothed in an attractiv garb, and in such plain language that they are brought within the comprehension of all of us. I love and venerate her writings.

True Freedom.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: There is a vast amount of spiritual and mental luxury in the possession of that freedom that is independent of all theological and ecclesiastical fetters, and the attainment of this condition was not the work of a day or a year to the greet mass of us that were indoctrinated with the importance to our eternal welfare of a belief in and a compliance with their teachings and demands.

Many of us can remember how timidly and fearfully we first listened to opinions or read statements that called in question their truthfulness and use. The influence of early teachings, and the still more potent factor of living examples by those we were led to love and reverence, became ingrained and imbedded so deeply into the very marrow of our being that no trifling cause or causes could induce us to change our opinions or convictions. To hear what we had been taught as sacred termed nothing less than the result of superstition or distorted imagination was a shock to the sensitiv nerves of many who to-day are among the foremost of those who are in the possession of the largest and truest liberty.

The right to question all principles and opinions that concern humanity is one of the inherent rights and privileges that true freedom confers and rational Liberalism claims and defends.

The persistent advocacy of this right, as well as the sturdy blows dealt right and left against the citadel of superstition, has imparted courage to the weak and been a light and joy to those desiring escape from their prison-houses of mental and spiritual degradation.

The largeness of the liberty that the rational Liberalist enjoys as compared with those that continue to worship creeds and theological formulas is as the light of noonday to Egyptian darkness. In the case of the former, reason and intelligence exercise their highest functions in discovering the causes and uses of whatever will aid in human culture of body and mind; while the latter must follow a beaten and contracted path at the bidding of those that fear reason and who dread to face the conclusions of unfettered intelligence.

When and while the church ruled the world true freedom was impossible. It was sacrilege to call in question its right to dictate opinions and control thought. It was blasphemy to ridicule its absurdities and abominations. No crime was greater than heresy, and naught but the most severe capital punishment could atone for so grave and impious a misdemeanor.

True freedom is broad, generous, and ennobling. It seeks to embody into our daily lives the largest measure of toleration for all honest differences of opinion. Still further, it rejoices that there are differences of intellectual conclusions on almost all topics that present themselvs before the human mind for solution and analysis.

Universal agreement would soon produce mental stagnation. The agitation of thought is not only the "beginning of wisdom," it is the steady culture that is essential to its health and growth.

As no two pairs of eyes can see any material object at precisely the same angle of vision, so no two minds can understand or appreciate any particular mental question in its general principles and details at the same exact angle of thought.

The measure and quality of any person's mental freedom do not consist so much in what he believes as in the spirit he manifests toward those who materially differ from him; and therefore those principles that develop within us the most catholic spirit of toleration confer upon us the largest measure and best quality of true freedom.

The rational Liberalist and Spiritualist should possess this spirit in an eminent degree, for the simple reason that they are conscious that it is not only their right, but also their duty to examin in the most fearless and critical manner all matters that come within the range of their comprehensions, and to deny, doubt, or accept as to them seems true or false. No fear of a future hell, or a present one, weighing a feather's weight to warp their judgments or modify their conclusions.

How different with the creed-bound serf! He or they must first see whether it is in harmony with the creed. If so, all right; if not, however reasonable it may seem to his better judgment, and how well sustained by popular science, the mental eyes must be closed and honest conviction stifled.

It is not possible for true freedom to flourish in such on atmosphere, or to germinate in such a soil. I often wonder how it is possible for our opponents to be as generous as they are; and the fact that they do exhibit continually a good deal of toleration toward us who handle so unmercifully their pet theories is a positiv demonstration that their doctrin of total depravity is a theological falsehood. No system of creeds, however bad, can utterly destroy the elements of justice, love, and freedom in the human soul.

We are continually seeking a larger measure of liberty than we possess. Our ideals keep us under whip and spur for this simple purpose, assuring us that the object of our desires is attainable. Toleration for the opinions of others will not deter us from using good Anglo-Saxon words to express our honest convictions regarding their useful or baneful influence. While I would not willingly wound the feelings of any human being by treating with levity opinions he deems sacred, I must in justice to him and others, as I understand it, assert what I deem true and useful, and expose what seems pernicious.

In according others the largest measure of right to criticise and exhibit any defect in opinions I entertain, no principle of justice or generosity is violated by me in subjecting the opinions of others to the most exacting and searching investigation. Less than this would mar the basic element of true freedom, the possession of which is all-important.

There is an untold inspiration in the freedom that is based on high moral and mental justice. We should at all times be more ready to court the opinions of others than parade our own, for certainly our true growth depends very much on the support it receives from the best that other minds impart.

True freedom, like true love, would soon degenerate were it not continually sustained by its readiness to receive and impart. The cultured soul, like the well-cultivated soil, yields a generous harvest. Freedom, generosity, and love are a "trinity in unity," and to keep ourselvs in harmony with these is to attain and enjoy the highest possible measure of true freedom.

GEORGE LYNN.

The National Liberal League.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: When getting my chattels insured I always prefer a stock company to a mutual one, because I abhor a dun at an inconvenient season. I find it easier to pay a debt of five dollars when I hav the money than one dollar when strapped.

Now, as I wish to join the National Liberal League I respectfully beg leave to offer a suggestion for the consideration of those who run the machinery of the institution. It appears that the framers of its Constitution did not make the best use of their knowledge of arithmetic, either in figuring up the number of dollars or the number of memberships. If the fee for a life membership had been fixed at ten dollars instead of twenty-five, I hav no hesitancy in saying that the membership would be ten times what it is. Its exchecquer would be better filled, and the Liberal army would begin to look formidable to orthodox vision.

Mr. Leland was quite right when he remarked that "life memberships would of course be few." If the League aimed at aristocracy by fixing the fee at twenty-five dollars, which is beyond the reach of the plebeian orders, and excludes them from its benefits, then it has missed its calling. Liberalism, like religion, ought to be cheap enough for the poorest, because its creed aims to promote the welfare of all humanity. How to utilize its scattered forces is the all-important question to be considered. These must be organized, or mustered into service, and the only feasible plan is to open the doors of the National League wide enough to admit the commonalty as well as the nobility. There are doubtless thousands of isolated Liberals who would like to become identified with this noblest of human institutions if the terms were not so unfavorable.

The annual membership, which does not entitle the holder to vote, is simply equivalent to no membership at all. But says some one, "You can be an annual member and vote as a proxy." This kind of subterfuge is not admissible. I pay for the privilege of voting my own sentiments, not those of somebody else. Let the Constitution be so amended as to giv annual members the right of franchise, or reduce the life membership fee three-fifths, and hundreds destitute of congenial home associations will flock to its standard. Old orthodoxy will soon be compelled to "yield its yams," which will in turn be converted into nourishment for the green bay-tree of Liberalism.

I attribute the split at Chicago mainly to that characteristic of humanity which a late correspondent has denominated "stuck-upitivness." It seems quite as natural for the man to feel stuck up who believes that he has evoluted from some lower type as it is for the man who believes that he was created a little lower than the angels.

In the inauguration of a new reform it is high time for Liberalism to cease squinting in the direction of the church to see whether its action shall be approved by those whose respectability is only a mockery founded upon time-honored superstitions. Heresy is never at first considered respectable, but when the heretics become sufficiently numerous, recognition is compulsory. Therefore, whoever believes that Liberalism is vital not only to the establishment but the perpetuity of individual liberty must be given a chance to conscientiously express his convictions, for thus only can the stupefying influence of an ignorant prejudice which sits like a mighty incubus enthroned upon the minds of the people be counteracted.

What Objections to Christianity?

You count Buddha a sinner and insist that Jesus did nothing wrong, and made no mistake. Your partiality for your favorite undoubtedly leads you to make such remarks. You have little authority for what you say. The story of Buddha shows him to have lived a life as sinless as that of Jesus. That the latter gave way to anger and cursed; that he beat and scourged the money-changers in an unmerciful manner; that he instructed his disciples to take a man's ass without permission; that he strolled into the cornfield on the Sabbath and plucked corn without the owner's consent; that he commended cutting off the right hand and plucking out the eyes; that he encouraged idleness and mendicancy and recommended his followers to make no provision for the future; that he consigned fallible mortals to everlasting fire; that he exhibited want of courage and fortitude in the hour of death, cannot be denied; and it all proves that he was not faultless.

You compare Buddha's belief or want of belief in a God with Jesus's, but fail to show wherein the belief of Buddha in that respect is not as rational and true as that of Jesus. If the Buddhists do believe in a hell or hells the same have the good quality of not being eternal; there is a possibility of getting out, while the hell of Jesus and his followers is everlasting. If the Buddhist's hell has worms and reptiles, it cannot exceed in horror the eternal fire of the Christians'. Nothing can be conceived of more painful and horrible than being plunged into a perpetual, unquenchable fused lake of brimstone and fire, and to have to endure its agonies for ever and ever. Give me a Buddhist hell, a Brahmanic hell, a Persian hell, an Egyptian hell, a Grecian hell, a Roman hell, or any kind of a hell, in preference to a Christian hell.

You accuse me of garbling in the quotations I made from Malcom regarding the Buddhistic people of Burmah, but your charge is unjust. I quoted correctly, and did not garble nor misrepresent. You should not make false accusations. I was under no obligations to quote all that Malcom had to say in his book because I chose to give his evidence touching a certain point. I never heard it called "garbling" to quote a single verse, even, from any chapter in the Bible, though it might be vastly more just than in the somewhat lengthy quotations I made from Malcom.

If some of the people of Burmah lie and steal, it must in truth be admitted that the tendency in that direction is much less than in all Christian countries. If their thieves were equal to Christian thieves, their frail houses and insecure fastenings would not protect their valuables. I have conversed with several persons who have traveled in India, China, and Japan, and their uniform testimony is that the people of those countries are more moral, less inclined to stealing, robbery, etc., than the people of Christian countries. It is very common there both in the town and the country for houses to be left unlocked and unprotected. That custom would hardly answer in any Christian country I know of. A few months ago, Professor Morse, a man of extensive scholarship and information, a native of New England, but for many years a professor in a university in Tokio, Japan, while on a visit to his native country, delivered a lecture in Cooper Institute upon the character of the Japanese believers in the Buddhistic religion. He described them as very affectionate, polite, genial, temperate, clean, and moral. He said they never used intoxicating liquors, used no oaths, or what is termed "swearing" words, the strongest word in their language used as an invective being equal to our word vexation. He gave them the credit of being the most cleanly in their persons of any people he ever saw, and theft and robbery were almost unknown among them. They would make a strong contrast with the Italians, the most devout Christians in the world, who are often extremely filthy in their personal habits, and greatly addicted to taking what does not belong to them. This trait is far more conspicuous in Christian countries than where the Buddhistic and Mohammedan religions are in the ascendant. Mr. Malcom says, as you show, that no religion is comparable with Buddhism, excepting, of course, Christianity. Being a Christian priest, he could not admit that any religion is equal to his own. He condemns Buddhism because it teaches dependence upon personal merit. In the view of many sensible people that enhances its value. It would at least seem as sensible and as honorable for men to strive to excel in good deeds as to depend upon the merits of another.

I do not greatly object to your imputing to me ignorance of your scriptures and attributing my inability to understand some things as you do to my want of knowledge of the Bible. It is a characteristic of Christians to insist that Infidels know nothing of the Bible, but the rule is the opposite of this. Infidels are usually better acquainted with the Jewish and Christian scriptures than are Christians themselves; but you use some terms that common courtesy would seem to disapprove. "Disgusting levity," "bastard learning," etc., would look better omitted, for they are uncourteous. To say because I referred to the nursery tale of Jack and the Bean-stalk that I "filched it from Thomas Paine" is quite uncalled for. I did not remember that Paine ever alluded to it; but whether he did or not it is pretty common property, and and anybody can venture to refer to Jack and his bean-stalk without being charged with filching. I am a much older man than yourself, and though you think your religion much better than mine it does not warrant your being impolite or untruthful.

I agree with you that the gods of the Egyptians, as well as of other nations, were personifications of the elements and forces of nature, and I must confess it difficult to understand how the dignity of those gods is thereby lessened. As the Jewish God represented all the forces of nature and was a personification of all nature itself, it is hardly fair to deny to pagan gods the same privilege. That the Jahveh of the Jews was little more than a nature-god there is an abundance of proof in the Jewish scriptures. That he was a fiery god or a god of fire is seen by many passages, among which are the following:

"And there came a fire from the Lord and consumed the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense" (Num. xvi, 35).

"Get you up from among this congregation that I may consume them as in a moment" (Num. xvi, 45).

"I will come up into the midst of thee in a moment, and consume thee" (Ex. xxxviii, 5).

"And the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a flame of fire out of the bush" (Ex. iii, 2).

"And Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire" (Ex, xix, 18).

"And there came out a fire from before the Lord and consumed upon the altar the burnt-offering and the fat" (Lev. ix, 24).

"And the sight of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire" (Ex. xxiv).

"The mountains melted from before the Lord, even that Sinai from before the Lord God of Israel" (Judges, v, 5).

"His throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire" (Dan. vii, 9, 10).

"For our God is a consuming fire" (Heb. xx, 29).

That he was regarded as light or the sun the following quotations will show:

"There is none like unto the god of Jeshusun, who rideth on the heaven in thy help, and his excellency on the sky" (Deut. xxxiii, 26).

"Extol him that rideth upon the heavens by his name Jah, and rejoice before him" (Ps. lxviii, 4).

"Who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters; who maketh the clouds his chariot; who walketh upon the wings of the wind" (Ps. civ, 3).

"His going forth is from the end of the heavens and his circuit unto the ends of it, and there is nothing hid from the heat thereof" (Ps. xix, 6).

"Yea, he sent out his arrows and scattered them; and he shot out lightnings, and discomfited them" (Ps. xviii, 14).

The idea of fire and light is as conspicuous in these and other passages as anything that can be found about Ra or Osiris of Egypt, Agni of India, Ormuzd of Persia, or Baal, Chemosh, and Moloch of Babylon and Phœnicia. The latter passages give in figurative and poetic language a fair idea of the sun in the heavens, considering the limited amount of information the Jews possessed of the motion of the heavenly bodies. It is pretty clear that Jahveh was as much a crude idea of the sun as anything—an imperfect conception of nature.

You seem much interested in the recital of the highly improbable stories of the plagues of Egypt, and I could not help wondering how you could have confidence enough in those silly tales to take the trouble to repeat them. Can it be possible that you believe that the waters of the river Nile and all the other waters in Egypt were converted into blood; that the dust of the country was changed into lice; that a fatal murrain was sent by a merciful God upon all the cattle of the country, killing every one not belonging to the Jews; that unheard-of flies and locusts were sent to torment and kill vegetable and animal life already destroyed; that next after this a thick and dense darkness covered the land for three days, through which the light of the sun could not penetrate any more than through a solid stone wall; that the next movement of a merciful God was to destroy all the first-born of the land, not only including the first-born of all the Egyptians, but also of their cattle as well, which had been so unfortunate as to be killed twice before? This killing of poor innocent dumb animals the third time over was the hardest piece of cruelty ever narrated. It seems strange that you can believe that a wise, good God would alternately harden and soften Pharaoh's heart, at one time disposing the monarch to do what was wished of him, and then directly preventing his doing so, and keep this up day after day and week after week, that he might have greater opportunity for showing what feats he could perform. To you these tales may appear godlike and probable, but to me they seem the idlest of imaginary fables. As, however, miracles are set down as a separate thesis, I will not further enter into a consideration of them now.

I think you make a lame effort to account for the discrepancy between the stories of Matthew and Luke about the miraculous and divine conception of Mary, the mother of Jesus, and for the total silence of Mark and John upon the momentous subject. If a god was begotten by the Divine Father and the Holy Ghost upon the person of a young Jewish damsel, and if the same divine being employed four scribes to narrate for the salvation of the world the origin and work of the individual thus begotten, it would seem that he should have given the correct information equally to the four, so that they could relate it in the same manner. But, to the contrary of this, we find that all Matthew has to say about it is a clumsy statement of a dream that Joseph is claimed to have had, when he had no possible way of knowing whether Joseph had a dream or not, or if he did dream whether he dreamed the truth or not. Mark has not a word to say upon the subject, probably not knowing anything about it, or if he knew, considering it not of sufficient consequence to mention. Luke narrates a vision which Mary had, and for which there is no authority save this recital. He certainly had no possible way of knowing what kind of a vision Mary had from fifty to a hundred years before the time of his writing. He does not tell us how he found out that Mary had an interview with the angel Gabriel; he does not even hint that God told him anything about it, nor any more than does. Matthew does he intimate that he was inspired to write as he did. Had he even set ud such a claim we should be at liberty to believe him or not, the same as with Joseph Smith when he tells us an angel informed him where to find the golden plates on which the Book of Mormon was engraved. John is as silent as the grave about the miraculous conception, and from this we are at liberty to infer that he knew nothing about the Holy Ghost having an interview with Mary, or of his being the father of Jesus. Although the salvation of the world is believed to hinge on this very little circumstance, the Evangelist John, who you believe wrote by direct guidance from heaven, has not a word to say about it. This should be remembered.

But granting for a moment that the miraculous conception did take place, we are left in great doubt as to how it was done. We know very well how ordinary conceptions are accomplished, and that certain laws have to be complied with, certain means adopted, or the result cannot follow. You seem much opposed to my thinking that if Mary did conceive by a spirit of the masculine persuasion, it was by the same procedure employed in all other cases, but what reason you have for such objection I do not know. It is well understood how males of the animal kingdom, including man, are able to beget offspring, and there is no other known way possible. If then a male of divine existence wishes to beget an offspring, it is only reasonable to suppose that he would be governed by the same law of necessity controling all other males in the universe. You have no grounds to be shocked at this inevitable conclusion, which must be arrived at. If he found it necessary for a female to perform her special function, a male would be equally necessary to perform his, and you have no reason to offer to the contrary. If, as you suggest, the operation could be accomplished different from the universal mode, you might as well dispense with the female altogether. If it was God's purpose to have the affair wholly miraculous, he could, perhaps, have accomplished it without the services of a woman; he could have brought his son bodily from heaven or have spoken him into existence. I must insist that if a female was necessary in the enterprise, a male was also necessary, and that both had their special functions to perform.

Before leaving this subject altogether I wish to say a word or two more of the discrepancy between the two statements of Matthew and Luke. The former, in attempting to describe the birth of Jesus, says that Mary was found with child of the Holy Ghost, when Joseph, knowing he was not the father of the child, made up his mind to quietly put Mary away, which he probably would have done had it not been for the dream in which the angel of the Lord assured the old man that the child was of or by the Holy Ghost. This is all that Matthew has to say as to how the child was begotten—first, Mary was found (by whom, no one knows) to be with child by the Holy Ghost, after which Joseph dreamed, and upon such authority as that the world is commanded to believe in the miraculous conception, or go to hell. Luke's version is quite different. According to this writer Mary was not found to be with child by the Holy Ghost, Joseph was not consulted upon the subject, he had no dream, and no angel appeared to him. But the angel Gabriel made a visit to Mary and made an appointment with her for a visit from the Holy Ghost, when he should come upon her and the power of the Highest should overshadow her, and she should conceive.

Without again stopping to refer to the impossibility of knowing what conversation took place in a private interview between Gabriel and Mary, we see Luke knew nothing about the angel appearing to Joseph while asleep, and that Matthew knew nothing of Gabriel's visit to Mary, and nothing about the Highest overshadowing her. As neither corroborates the statement of the other, and as neither is supported in what he says by any other witness, the world has the clear right to decide that the dream story, the vision story, and the miraculous conception story are not proved.

If in modern times, in any civilized country in the world, such a remarkable, impossible event was attempted to be established upon the assertion of a single witness, and he not present when the event occurred, there is not a court in existence that would harbor the tale for a moment. If a thousand young women in a condition likely to become mothers were to assert that no man had cohabited with them, and that the child was begotten by God, the Holy Ghost, or the Holy Spirit, not one of them would be believed for an instant. But either case would undoubtedly be just as true now as in the days of Joseph and Mary. What God did nineteen hundred years ago he does to-day. If Mary could become a mother without the office of a man, so can the Marys and Sallys of our own time.

Allow me to say that the Christian system rests upon extremely weak, unsatisfactory, and unsustained testimony. There is no jury in the country which could find a verdict upon such unreliable evidence. And what makes it worse is, as I will hereafter endeavor to show, that the two books from which the story of the miraculous and divine paternity of Jesus is taken were not written by the parties whose names they bear—that Matthew was not written by Matthew, and Luke not written by Luke. It is bad enough to have to believe that Matthew (whose gospel is not claimed to have been written less than fifty or sixty years after Joseph dreamed about the Holy Ghost) could know anything about that old dream, but when it is found that it was not Matthew who wrote it, that what passes for his gospel was not known to be in existence till the middle of the second century, and that at best it is made up of unreliable legends and from a kind of folk-lore of the country, it is at once seen how unreliable the basis is upon which Christianity rests, and how little foundation there is for believing that the girl Mary became a mother by a process different from all the other instances in the world. In the first century and a half of our era, when the new religion of Christianity was forming and being made up by the scraps and dogmas having a previous existence—some perhaps of Asiatic and some of Egyptian origin—it would have been extremely easy for some of the early fathers or priests to have written out the story ascribed to Matthew, taking existing legends and traditions as a basis, and drawing upon his own imagination as necessary. This theory is far more probable than that Matthew wrote the story, or if he did write it that his hand was any more moved by heaven than mine is at this moment. There is no grounds for believing the story true or that it is divinely inspired save that the church for sixteen centuries has demanded that it be accepted on pain of hell-fire forever. I do not accept it at the dictum of priests, hell-fire or no hell-fire. I believe it was written wholly by the hand of man, and that it conveys palpable and self-evident untruths. And the same with Luke and the other "evangelists."

It is a difficult task for you to make the different genealogies given by Matthew and Luke harmonize and appear consistent with the theory that the Holy Ghost was the father of Jesus. If it is true that Jesus had not an earthly father, when in attempting to give his genealogy how absurd, false, and misleading to give a line ending with Joseph, who, we are to believe, had no more to do with the paternity of Jesus than had the chief priest of Jerusalem! If Joseph was not the father of Jesus, Matthew unmistakably tells a falsehood. When he starts out to give the genealogy of the individual and to show that he was a descendant of David, he ends with Joseph the husband of Mary. If Joseph did not beget Jesus, why, in the name of all that is true and consistent, give his genealogy and palm it off as the genealogy of Jesus? This very futile attempt is enough to condemn the veracity of the writer, to show that he was not guided by divinity, and that he is wholly unreliable as a witness. It would have been far better to not attempt to set up the claim that Jesus was a descendant of the murderous and adulterous David than to show that the descent was through Joseph, who is claimed to have had no more to do with his paternity than with yours or mine.

And Luke only makes the matter worse. He also attempts the equally difficult task of showing that Jesus descended through Joseph from David. His dishonesty is fully equal to Matthew's. If we are to believe that Joseph was not the father of Jesus let me again ask, Why mention his name in an attempted genealogy of Jesus? Then if Matthew wrote the truth about the genealogy of Joseph, Luke told not less than forty falsehoods, for he gives the names of forty-one persons from whom Joseph descended, and only one is the same as given by Matthew, and that is David himself. Matthew states explicitly that Joseph descended from the line of Solomon. Luke just as positively states it was from Nathan, another son of David. If one told the truth the other told a falsehood, and there is no way to get around it. Joseph could not have descended from both Solomon and Nathan. It is useless for you to try to equivocate or evade. It is perfectly useless for you to try to throw dust in the eyes of our readers by presuming that I made use of "an old Infidel quibble." There is no quibble about it. If Matthew wrote the truth when he said Joseph descended from Solomon through twenty-six generations, Luke told a falsehood, and many of them, when he said it was from Nathan and forty-one succeeding generations. Or if Luke wrote the truth, then Matthew told the falsehoods. You can take which horn of the dilemma you choose, but you must not insist that both told the truth. It is you who are "quibbling" when you attempt it. It is a Christian quibble—a Christian falsehood—to say that Matthew and Luke both gave the genealogy of Joseph correctly, or that either in giving that genealogy showed that Jesus, if divinely begotten, was a descendant of David.

It is surprising how you and other sensible people can believe that such clashing stories are the word of God, or was ever dictated by the creator of millions of worlds and systems. Pertinently does Paine inquire respecting these so-called evangelists: "If they cannot be believed in their account of his natural genealogy, how are we to believe them when they tell us he was the son of God, begotten by a ghost, and that an angel announced this in secret to his mother? If they lied in one genealogy, why are we to believe them in the other? If his natural be manufactured, which it certainly is, why are not we to suppose that his celestial genealogy is manufactured also, and that the whole is fabulous? Can any man of serious reflection hazard his future happiness upon the belief of a story naturally impossible, repugnant to every idea of decency, and related by persons already detected of falsehoods?" In such a muddle, in such a mass of falsehood as this, your "divine" system of Christianity takes its rise.

Your attempt to show the truthfulness of the claim that the light departed from the sun at the moment of Jesus' death, though this impossible phenomenon was only confined to Judea, a very circumscribed country forty miles wide by one hundred and forty in length, is hardly worthy of attention. You may, if you please, believe that the light of the sun has ever departed, save in that portion of the twenty-four hours constituting a day, when the earth in its revolution turns from it. You may, if you choose, believe that the light of the sun could depart from the world so far as that fractional part of the earth's surface is concerned, while the surrounding countries knew nothing whatever of such an event. I do not care to contend with you on that point. I simply cannot believe that the light of the sun was ever withdrawn in that way, and I regard the assertion that it did as of the same unreliability as the story that at the same time the graves were opened, and the dead lying in them were reanimated and went forth into the city and mingled again with their relatives and former companions, but of which remarkable circumstance nobody knew aught save Matthew. These Munchausen tales require altogether too much gullibility on my part to accept. If my escape from the sulphurous lake depends upon my believing such yarns, then I never shall escape.

Allow me to say in this connection that I think you have hardly succeeded in demolishing Gibbon. Notwithstanding your effort to the contrary, his remarks quoted by you will still stand as sound and perfectly legitimate.

You seem dissatisfied with some of my authorities. This is not at all strange. Christians are not in the habit of approving of the testimony that condemns their system, and they fain would decry everybody, who shows that they have set up claims that cannot be verified by truth. You say neither J. F. Clarke, Sir William Jones, nor Max Muller at all upholds my views. What of that? Cannot I quote them as to matters of antiquity in oriental religions even if they do not arrive at precisely the same conclusions I do? You do not deny the correctness of my quotations from them, but try to evade it by saying they do not uphold my views. But they do uphold my views, so far, at least, as my quotations from them extend, and I think much farther. Sir William Jones adhered to the Christian system, and perhaps he had good reasons for doing so. He held good positions under his government, which is the head of the state religion, and which conferred honors and emoluments upon him. It would hardly be natural for him to turn against those who had so greatly befriended him. You can, however, hardly make me believe that Prof. Max Muller and James Freeman Clarke believe in the miraculous conception of Jesus, and that he was the Lord God, the creator of the heavens and earth. I am inclined to think they uphold my views quite as much as yours, but that is immaterial. Quotations from them must be accepted as trustworthy.

Your stronger dislike seems directed toward Godfrey Higgins and Robert Taylor. What they wrote is too damaging to your pet system, and you must needs asperse their reputation as reliable authors. I think you misrepresent them. Godfrey Higgins was an educated, intellectual, studious, candid, honest, and devoted man, who spent a quarter of a century in investigating the religions of the ancients, and gave to the world as the result of his researches most valuable information that had not before been generally known. His "Celtic Druids" is a most important work, and, so far as I am informed, has never been disproved. His "Anacalypsis" is a still more valuable work, and opens up a fund of information most important to the world, and which can be relied upon. It matters not whether its edition was two hundred or two hundred thousand. A falsehood is not made true by being repeated a million times, nor does a truth become falsehood because printed but two hundred times. Higgins was too pure, too able, and too honest a man to be effectually aspersed by John T. Perry and yourself. It is very easy to say he "had not the critical acumen to sift the wheat from the tares," but such flippancy does not disprove him. The trouble is, he had too much acumen in sifting truths from untruths for the credibility of the Christian system. He effectually showed that the dogmas and traditions of Christianity had existed in oriental religions centuries before Christianity was known. You cannot prove Higgins guilty of inability, dishonesty, or falsehood, and until that can be done you might as well leave him in the enjoyment of the reputation which a good life vouchsafed to him.

You seem to delight also to asperse Robert Taylor, A. B. and A. M. True, he once believed in the Christian system and preached it, but being an honest and intelligent man he became better informed and learned more important truths that proved the falsity of the claims set up for Christianity. He had an opportunity of not only investigating the truths of Christianity, but also of testing its mercy. Because he gave utterance to his honest convictions he was twice or three times sent to prison on a charge of blasphemy, which, by the bye, is no longer used as a pretext for sending the advocates of unpopular truths to prison. If he made a statement or two not fully correct, it should, by way of palliation, be remembered that he wrote under great disadvantages while immured in a Christian prison for presuming to think for himself and to give expression to such honest views. His works are mainly reliable, and have not been disproved. If in comparatively early life to please personal friends he returned to the support of the Christian system, he soon yielded to his better convictions and supported what he honestly believed to be the truth, though far more unpopular than the current creed. Later on, after suffering obloquy and persecution from merciless, unforgiving Christians, he married a French lady and retired to France, where he ended his days faithful to his convictions. I deny that he recanted and went back to the church in the latter part of his life, and call upon you to give proofs that he did. As for the work of his which you say you have before you entitled the "Natural History of Religion," etc., let me inform you upon reliable authority that you are entirely mistaken. Your book was not written by Robert Taylor, the Infidel, but by an altogether different Taylor. There is nothing like being accurate, you know.

Your slighty remarks about the late Dr. Thomas Inman are unworthy of a fair-minded disputant. Dr. Inman was a most respectable gentleman, brother of the founders and owners of the Inman line of steamships running to and from this port. He was a man of great education, research, and honor. Contrary to your assertion, he brought out many views and facts not previously mentioned by other writers. They were not "mere elaborations of the defunct nonsense of Volney and Dupuis." Here is concentrated unfairness and untruthfulness. Inman's works are entirely different from those of Volney and Dupuis. The writings of these are not "nonsense," neither are they "defunct." Few better writers have lived than Volney, and I have never heard of his positions and arguments being disproved. No man had the hardihood to accuse Dr. Inman of untruthfulness while living, and it hardly looks well in you to asperse him now that he is dead. As for Kersey Graves as an authority, so far as he correctly quotes Godfrey Higgins or other reliable writers, his statements can be taken in all confidence, and it does not answer him to set up a cry of his being "uncritical" and "unreliable." Had any of the foregoing writers defended the Christian system you would not have found it necessary to say a word in their dispraise.

Thomas Paine.

BY S. P. PUTNAM.

[Poem read at the Paine Celebration, Science Hall, January 29, 1881.]

Forward the hero ranges to bold strife,
Ready to venture still his dearest life
For that which makes the world most good and fair,
Ready for man and truth to do and dare!
O heroes shining on the ways of time,
Valiant and strong, resplendent and sublime!
The flower of nature that no frost can kill,
The fire of feeling and the strength of will.

Oh, how the past is lighted with your fame,
Touched by the wonder of your spirit's flame,
Swayed by the marvel of your heart and hand,
Pierced by the glory of your dauntless band.
'Tis ye that from the dark hav made the light,
Compelled the earth to show its riches bright;
'Tis ye that harnessed forces wild and rude;
Before the secret wealth of chaos stood
And wrenched the crown that each and all may wear,
The sovereign glory that the weakest share.

O ye hav trod the land of Greece elate,
Fronted the beast and scorned the tyrant's hate,
Built in the glowing air the city's pride,
And o'er the tossing sea new lands descried,
Outfaced the sphinx, and solved its riddle deep,
So that man learned to soar and not to creep.

Fair Italy has been your bounteous home;
Sweet inspirations from its heavenly dome
Hav made you strong as the Olympian gods.
Your blood has nourished its immortal sods
So that they bloom to-day with deathless flowers,
So that to-day one sees the golden hours
That haunted Virgil's soul and Dante's brain
And flushed sweet pictures in their lofty strain.

England has been your glory and your woe;
There hav ye suffered, quenched your lightning glow
Amid the shadows of the scaffold grim;
There hav ye perished with your hope still dim;
There hav ye reigned in blaze of sorrow's crown;
There hav ye struck the ruthless despot down.

O heroes! many are your words and deeds
Throbbing in sword, in lyre, 'mid bitterest needs
Of cruel war; in artist's fire divine;
In him who flung the plummet and the line
To measure deep the universal plan;
In him whose buoyant arches rivers span;
In symphonies that great Beethoven woke;
In the sweet murmurs of the organ stroke;
In thought that Shakspere, like an ocean's roar,
Flung on the heedless world, forevermore
To ring and swing with music's amplest roll,
Answering the myriad questions of the soul
With lightest note and awful thunders vast;
With storms of terror; sweetest pictures glassed
In the calm radiance of its swelling breast;
The grief of monarchs and the clown's swift jest.
These are what heroes render mighty ones,
The workers and the makers of the suns
That shine so sweetly in our heavens to-day
And fill and thrill us with unending ray.

And in this band, amid the foremost throng,
Worthy the poet's ardor and his song,
The clouds of malice shrinking from his face,
And leaving him in pure heroic grace,
In star-like majesty o'er bigot's bane,
We welcome and we honor Thomas Paine.

O royal soul! O reckless genius grand!
Spurning thy safety, ready to giv thy hand
To truth and freedom. Where they led the way
Still wouldst thou follow though all shouted nay—
Alone, with but thy conscience for thy guide,
While cowards, kings, and priesthoods are defied.

Oh, beautiful the hope that poured its star
In this new world across the ocean's bar,
Glittering against the dark of ancient years;
Man's way seemed opening into golden spheres
Of boundless effort, and new visions flushed
Upon his fervid soul; new splendors rushed,
Along his far horizon, like fair dawn
When the pale radiance of the night is gone.

Here freedom drew at last its amplest breath,
The swelling life that knows no touch of death,
From the broad rivers, mighty hills, and plains
That stretched a thousand leagues with golden grains
Of endless riches in their sparkling breast,
Hidden for this, the latest and the best,
The age when mind was shaking off its fear,
Worthy the heaven that its own force made clear,

Yet still the tyrant's chain and minions ruled,
And olden custom the weak heart befooled,
And liberty went stumbling, blind though strong.
Men feared to break the fetters linked so long;
They only dared for half-way measures fight,
Knew not the secret of their growing might.
Knew not what made their battlefields sublime
The ringing war-notes of a deathless time,
Not till the master-mind the secret blazed,
Outrayed the new and the old structure razed,
Rung the glad word that touched the future's weal,
Flung wide its doors with magical appeal.
That word was Independence, and this gain,
The heart, the mind, the soul of Thomas Paine
Launched like a whirlwind on the troublous strife,
And made it regnant with immortal life,
Kindled to hope the features of despair,
Made suffering easy, death itself most fair.
Who would not die for such a vision sweet,
A country, a republic, where the feet
Of weary millions find a resting-place,
Where man at last is clothed with sovereign grace?
This was the wealth of power Paine gave the world;
He met the crisis with bold flag unfurled,
And struck the keynote of our mighty land,
Made truth and freedom in clear union stand,
Whence progress stretches onward like a flame,
While with it burns aloft his deathless name.

O flag we love that floats upon the air
In constellated glory, ever fair,
With streaks of ruddy dawn and flashing white,
Of human hope the emblem broad and bright,
Tossing and heaving over land and sea
As if the heart of heaven outbloomed in thee,
And all the waiting ministries unseen
Of man's desire flashed in thy billowy sheen—
O happy flag: the grandest in thee wrought,
Was born of Thomas Paine's far-reaching thought!

And when the storm of revolution rolled
O'er wretched France he was the leader bold
That 'mid the tumolt saw the eternal right:
He fought the despot, but with Justice's might.
So when the multitude, to madness stung
As if by pain their conscience had been wrung
Till naught was left but bitterness and hate,
For reason's lofty voice refused to wait,
And like an angry beast would slay the king
As if he too were but a senseless thing,
Brave Paine defended him, though dungeon's gloom
And death itself appeared his certain doom.
But he was steady 'mid the awful storm—
His "Rights of Man" was not a shallow form
To let the multitude outrage the same
As despot did, and yet receive no blame
Because the many and the despot one—
Justice by many cannot be undone—
Despot and slave hav rights no law can take,
No crime can strip of and no fortune shake;
And for these rights, the rights of each and all,
Not made or unmade by a tyrant's fall,
And vested not in party, but mankind,
The rights essential to a thinking mind,
The rights that come because a man is man,
That can't be dead no matter what the ban—
No king, no priest, and no majority,
Though millions vote it, can from you from me
Take these great rights that with our manhood are Forever and forever without bar—
And for these rights Paine dared to speak and die,
Not for a friend alone, but enemy.

Still more than this, he saw the deathly hold
Of superstition, and the darkness rolled
Upon the mind of man by holy lies,
The stupid incense rising to the skies
Of hollow hearts and terror-stricken fools
Cowed by a book—the specter sheet of ghouls—
Where a great demon takes the place of truth,
And nature's coarseness slaughters nature's ruth.
He saw this giant wrong, this dreadful spell,
This fear-created despot and dark hell,
And though the fashion made its worship grand,
It's horrors covered o'er with service bland,
And though the wisest dared not speak their mind—
So deeply did the cruel fetters bind—
Yet Paine, the bravest, struck the blow that still
With sweep of ages has more power to kill
As truth and freedom make their conquering way.
He has been cursed; he will be blest to-day:
Science shall crown him with each triumph new
Because the words he spoke, though rough, were true.
And truth, though plain, is better than a lie;
Though wealth and culture giv it livery
And make it seem an angel of delight
It is a devil still, a curse, despite
The music and the eloquence it has.
Oh, giv one truth, though ugly, barren, crass,
Just dug from earth, a metal sharp and wild,
To all the falsehoods that hav ever smiled
With gold and jewels and the polished throng.
Lies may be sweet but they are ever wrong;
Truth may be plain but it is joy sublime.
Lie e'en for virtue and it is a crime,
While truth may pierce with anguish, but its knife
Is ever that which frees the highest life.
All honor then to Paine whose reckless pen
Made truth so homely, yet so rich to men.
He would not write like courtier or a slave,
And so the priesthood cursed him to his grave.

But 'tis not ended yet, the battle cry
Is sounding on, the flag floats in the sky;
While truth and freedom still must win their way,
The priests and despots see their fatal day.
Falsehood is losing all its charms and power,
Flees with the night and dreads the morning's hour;
Pale superstition finds that man is free,
And like a god makes his own destiny,
And snaps his fingers at its heaven and hell,
And knows that in his own world he can dwell
And make it beautiful; that in his arm
There lies creativ energy and balm;
That he can build his palace and his throne
And send his angels to the farthest zone.
Oh, bright the future with its full red glow
Of ardent hearts and sweeping summer's glow;
We've past the winter of our discontent,
The spring is with the golden autumn blent,
For still we plant and still the harvest grows,
We plow the soil and pluck the perfect rose.

Forward we look and clasp the happy years
That, garlanded with truth, dispel our fears
And make us patient spite the wrongs we see,
For they must vanish, many though they be.
But while we gather hope and fresh delight,
And walk with bounding step to some new hight,
While cheering prospects open far and wide,
Melting to glory in the still untried,
Let us think dearly of the wondrous past,
Its life flows with us—with our fate is cast—
And is an impulse most divine and high
In bone, brain, muscle, skill, and energy.
The past has gifted us with mighty prize
Out of its toils, its pains, and agonies.
And as we gaze upon its silent years
Sinking before the brilliance that appears
From the far-quickening bosom of to-day,
Amid the stars that shine with vivid ray,
Flooding our path with still uncounted gain,
Is the heroic, noble, splendid Paine.

Thomas Paine Defended.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The columns of your paper are too valuable to be wasted in useless wrangling by Mr. Burr and myself over the undisputed greatness and value of Mr. Paine's labors as a writer, and which has produced such mental intoxication in friend Burr. Equally I share with him an unbounded admiration for the literary greatness of the great reformer. But let us not seemingly render ourselvs ridiculous by attempting to add fragrance to the rose or another tint to the rainbow. As a reformer, exponent and champion of the rights of humanity, he certainly heads the van.

I regret Mr. Burr takes offense at my attempt to correct some of his historical errors. They are, however, unimportant, and I am inclined to let the matter drop, for, as Mr. Paine truthfully says, "when the tongue or pen [as with Mr. Burr] is let loose in a frenzy of passion, it is the man, and not the subject, that becomes exhausted."

Ah, no, Mr. Bennett. Rather than hav the valuable space of The Truth Seeker wasted, or spoil friend Burr's happiness, I am willing, to please him, to concede Mr. Paine wrote the Junius letters; that Dr. Franklin was a cunning old hypocritical fox; that Mr. Paine told a foolish, useless lie; that Thomas Jefferson was a very superficial reasoner and ordinary writer (his presidential messages and philosophical "Notes on Virginia" to the contrary); that he basely and meanly allowed himself throughout his long life to be thought the author of the Declaration of Independence; that it was no evidence of friendship in Mr. Jefferson's sending, in 1802, a war vessel to bring his friend Mr. Paine safely back to the United States after an absence of fifteen years. Although a little Quakerish, I hope Mr. Burr will overlook my addressing him as friend.

In the articles of Mrs. Slenker and Mrs. Severance I hav become quite interested, and they are fully worth their space. Mrs. Slenker's remarks on sexual intemperance must keenly strike public attention. I hope she will fully demonstrate the truth of her teachings and prove that the human family will so continue to improve through her observations and restraints on sexual imprudence that a higher type of mankind may be the product. By referring to the "divine word" we are reminded of the various attempts, experiments, and suggestions of God to the prophets, priests, and warriors of old to improve the human species to remedy his grand mistake in creation, but which, after all, proved to be wretched failures. Apparently God, seeing with mortification that all these experiments resulted in still raising crops of murderers, thieves, and madmen, conceived the idea of an "immaculate conception," and went personally into the overshadowing business. But, alas, with no better result!

I can readily perceive in the far future the possibility of a very high order of development in the human species by a judicious selection of materials, and that philosophers, statesmen, or artisans may be created, as it were, to order. David Bruce.

Brooklyn, E. D.

America as Bad as Europe.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Send me the "Infidel Abroad." It is the most interesting book I ever read, and I hav perused some thousands. I am by nature more inclined to criticise than to praise, but I must praise this book. All is found in it. It is reading for everybody; it is as pleasant as instructiv. Your statements and assertions are all right except an error about Leopold II., who is not dead, but is yet all but the reigning king of Belgium.

Well, you hav seen the friends of civilization and Christianity in the churches of Rome and in the streets of Naples, and Dr. C. De Pape and D. Brismee, whom you saw at Brussels, could hav shown to you a list of more than five hundred priests who hav been condemned for attempted rape on the chastity of thousands of children and young pupils. Well, it is because we apprehend the same degradation for this beautiful country that we European Freethinkers, or rather cosmopolitan naturists, are differing with most Americans who think that we are too radical, too merciless. It is to prevent this universal slavery and oppression that we projected the universal federation of the world's Freethinkers or Liberals.

Do you think the thing is right? Do you think that those of our American friends were right when they asked us, What do you want us to go to learn over there? Did Mr. Bennett learn nothing over there? I think every one of us can always learn something by traveling and by meditating. We think there is no other means to prevent the universal cataclysm than the universal federation of the Liberals all over the world. It seems to us that this "great free land" is nearer to servitude than freedom. Long enough hav we thought and said the contrary. Let us be sincere and see reality.

J. Petty, the old American Liberal who looks at things not only on the one side, but on all sides, lately said: "It appears to me that the sole effort of Christians is to break the little liberty we hav in this country. What better state of things can be expected when the habits of a Christian people are entirely rotten? They talk honesty and practice rascality. Men are the willing tools of priests and political bulldozing humbugs. If the people had not been corrupt there would hav been no corrupt systems or laws. If the poor people of to-day were raised to power to make laws, with their present ignorance, they would be just as big rascals and cheats as the men we hav in power to-day. Let the working people become rich and they would be about as miserable as they are at present."

In Iowa we hav H. L. Barter arrested for publishing the writing of some respectable ladies. In Kansas, the most Liberal state (say some), the bigots arrested a poor man for cutting his wheat on Sunday and had him fined $80. Here at Salina the editor of the Western Reformer, S. Paris Davis, is menaced and his paper stopped and himself put in jail because he published an article of Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker's on "Women and Their Mission."

All over the United States has been preached, prayed, and practiced during the two or three last months the corruption that they call the "electoral campaign," and such is the progress for which we are indebted to Christianity. There is but one way to bring back the people to morality and happiness. Educate them, teach them science; but scientific education is difficult if not impossible in the actual situation of society, impregnated as it is in its bones as in its books with the religious virus. Here are a dozen of churches in good condition, their priests or preachers comfortably kept, and but one scientific teacher, who is living in privation. If Liberals were as numerous as Infidels we could end this, but Liberals are very few. And now let them associate and federate and try, and if they don't succeed there will still remain but despotism, misery, suffering. Yours for the great fight,

Salina, Kan., Dec. 30, 1881. JOSEPH HENRY.

Is Mind Material, or is it a Property of Matter?

This subject has had a pretty good airing through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the last four months. First, Mr. Chapman opens the subject, in the last volume of THE TRUTH SEEKER in the affirmativ; then following him came Mr. Moore, with a very brief article, taking the negativ. Then comes Dr. H. L. Sherman, a writer who takes a still more positiv position than even his Spiritual colleague, Mr. Chapman, claiming that even thought is a material substance; then Mr. Chapman follows him as a critic. In the course of his criticism he spoke of the doctor as being the author, through spirit influence, of a book called the "Hollow Globe," and he spoke of it in a rather derisiv manner, which I did not think was exactly gentlemanly, as this had nothing to do with the question at issue; but in your last issue I see the doctor has made capital of this as an advertisment for his book, which, I think, will square up accounts all around.

Your article in reply to Mr. Chapman, wherein you support Mr. Moore on the theory of mind, I thought put the matter beyond quibble; but I notice in a later issue two more articles by different writers on this question, both in the affirmativ. This makes four on that side and only two on the negativ. Now, no two of these Spiritual disputants seem to agree between themselvs on this question, while you and your colleague seem to be entirely united, and to me hav made the question plain that mind is simply a word we use to express the function of the brain, and, as Mr. Moore says, always comports with that part of the brain that gave it birth.

It seems to me, Mr. Editor, that to any one who has made mental science much of a study this logic of yours and your colleague's is very plain. The origin of mind, or what mind is aside from matter, is something that science has never undertaken to explain and, in my humble opinion, never will, for this reason, that there is no basis in the domain of nature to build on; therefore, like theology, it is a good subject for the unscientific to theorize and speculate upon. But with your permission, Mr. Editor, I would like to submit to your readers the testimony of Winwood Reade, an eminent English scientist and traveler of the present century, on this this question as I read it in his book, the "Martyrdom of Man," pages 411 and 412; then if the affiirmativ is willing, I think we may as well leave it for the present with our audience, the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I will quote:

"We shall now proceed to describe the rise and progress of the mental principle. The origin of mind is an inscrutable mystery, but so is the origin of matter. If we go back to the beginning, we find a world of gas, the atoms of which were kept asunder by excessiv heat. Where did those atoms come from? How were they made? What were they made for? In reply to these questions theology is garrulous, but science is dumb. Mind is a property of matter; matter is inhabited by mind. There can be no mind without matter; there can be no matter without mind. When the matter is simple in its composition, its mental tendencies are also simple; the atoms merely tend to approach one another and to cohere; and as matter under the influence of varied forces (evolved by the cooling of the world) becomes more varied in its composition, its mental tendencies become more and more numerous, more and more complex, more and more elevated, till at last they are developed into the desires and propensities of the animal, into the aspirations and emotions of the man. But the various tendencies which inhabit the human mind, and which devote it to ambition, to religion, or to love, are not in reality more wonderful than the tendency which impels two ships to approach each other in a calm; for what can be more wonderful than that which can never be explained? The difference between the mind of the ship and the mind of man is the difference between the acorn and the oak." THINKER.

"Is Mind Matter?"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I find the above question often discussed in your columns. I think it is well that it is so, for I do not think that either man's body or his mind was ever "created," but that both were evolved conjointly and from something. To me the more important question is, Which of the two is the factor or the responsible motor in the product called man?

I suppose it will not be denied that matter (so called) is subject to the law of classification, and that certain classes may exist conjointly for a specific purpose, and then distinctivly for a different one.

Admit that mind is material, does it belong to the same class of material of which human brains are composed? If not, then a distinction is made. Grant this distinction to be admissible, then brain-matter and mind-matter are two distinct essentials in the composition of man.

Now should we affirm that brain-matter is the eliminator, the factor, the agent in the production of mind matter, is it not equivalent to saying that the human brain is both the father and mother of all human thoughts? But this lacks proof.

Does brain-matter reason? If not, then in the production of reason in human thought it must rise above itself. Another inductiv absurdity.

Again, does brain-matter take cognizance of virtue, of justice, of right, and wrong? If not, and yet should it unfold these qualities of mind-matter, would not the stream be about two miles higher than the fountain?

Now suppose we reason by comparison, thus: A water fountain sends forth a stream; the stream givs foliage and flower to the plain, but destruction and death in the deluge of a city. Now where lies the prime cause of the good in the flower, or of the evil in the destruction of the city? Is it in the stream or in the fountain which gave it birth?

See once more, from brain-matter there issues a stream of mind-matter filled with love and hate. The one fertilizes the plains of human sociability, the other crushes in ruins mighty empires.

Now upon which should we look to bestow our praise or blame, the brain-matter, the motor-power, the prime cause, or the mind-matter, the effect?

O man! there are questions more mighty than the simple one, "Is mind material?" Ere long the true philosopher will reverse the above predicates and wisely comprehend that pure intelligence is the real motor, the infinit lever that uplifts and builds all grosser things; that the varied whole of man's physical, visible structure are but so many feelers thrown out for the use and benefit of that wisdom, that intelligence, that spirit, which livs and dwells within, there to ripen, then unfold, and to liv forevermore.

Berville, Mich. E. B. WHEELOCK.

Obituary.

J. W. Bailett, of Salamanca, N. Y., died at his father's house in Tennessee on Tuesday last. Mr. Bailett has been for the last two years a victim of consumption and two months since left home for Tennessee, thinking the milder climate might prove beneficial to his health.

For seventeen years previous to his illness he was conductor on the A. and G. W. R. R., and during that time made hosts of friends among the traveling public. No conductor was ever more popular with the people among whom he moved than "Whit" Bailett, as he was called. The wants of mothers and children left in his care were sure to be well looked after. He had an intelligent head and a great heart. For that reason he despised orthodoxy and the orthodox God. He always expressed himself in strong English when he spoke of either. Many a pious soul has been shocked by "Whit's" denunciation of their "damnable theology."

He hated with an intense hatred tyranny, whether exhibited in a man or in a God. He had no respect for a God who would damn to eternal pain his own children.

"Whit" Bailett was the oddest genius nature ever produced. His eccentricities, which were always those of an effectiv and witty character, made him an attractiv and an agreeable companion. Whatever he said was sure to attract attention, for it was peculiarly his own thought expressed in his peculiar style.

Some years since he walked into the shop of a book-binder at Meadville with a large, fine edition of the Bible under his arm and requested the book-binder to embellish the cover of his Bible with the words, "Holy Absurdities," in gilt letters. As the binder was orthodoxically inclined it was some time before "Whit" could make him understand what he desired done.

Since then his large family Bible, lying on his center-table, has attracted much attention. As Susan B. Anthony was leaving his house a few years since, where she had been a guest one night on one of her lecturing tours, Mr. Bailett said, "I hope, Miss Anthony, you will not forget us." "No," said she, "I shall not forget you, and certainly never shall forget your Bible." I once said to my friend Bailett, "As you do not believe in the orthodox God, why do you use his name so often in your conversation?" He answered, "To show my contempt for him."

But "Whit" Bailett was the soul of honor. No one ever doubted his word, and I do not believe he had an enemy in the world. Possibly some orthodox bigot may hav disliked him for his outspoken manner on religious questions. But his words were taken by all classes as the truth. His oaths had more of humanity in them than most of the orthodox prayers. After his ill health precluded him from following the avocation of conductor our citizens by a large majority elected him police justice of the village.

And he said to me, "I do not pretend to know much of law, but I shall endeavor to decide all the cases that may come before me in accordance with justice, as near as I can." And that is what he did in his official capacity as a magistrate.

He died at the age of forty-three years, leaving a kind, intelligent wife and a bright little son named Frank, of the age of nine, to mourn his loss.

"Whit" Bailett has for years been a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and a great admirer of its editor. During the time Mr. Bennett was in prison, how often did Mr. Bailett come into my office and relieve his mind by expressing in his characteristic manner his opinions of Benedict, Comstock & Co.! I think their ears must have tingled during some of these occasions when my friend was relieving himself of his righteous indignation against these oppressors of the editor whom he held in such high esteem.

Mr. Bailett was a deep thinker and a fine writer, and if he had not been so modest might have attained distinction as such. He often read to me able and finely written articles from his pen, and I as often insisted that he send them to the Liberal press for publication. But he would decline my request by saying, "Oh, no, that is not worth printing. I only wrote it for amusement."

Personally I feel that the death of friend Bailett is a great loss to me. He was one of the few Liberal friends of my town who often visited me and with whom I felt free to converse. I always liked to see friend Bailett and his intelligent dog "Watch" call at my office or at my house. I speak of his dog for the reason that he is the noblest animal of the kind I ever saw, and Bailett loved him as a parent loves a child, and the affection was fully reciprocated.

Mr. Bailett was buried as he requested to be, and also in accordance with the wishes of his good wife, without the aid of a clergyman. If there is any truth in Spiritualism I should hav pitied any priest who had attempted to perform any of his incantations over his remains. I think "Whit's" spirit would hav made it lively for him.

H. L. GREEN.

Extract from a Letter of Elmina's.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I've just received a letter from H. L. Barter, in which he tells me his business has been broken up and his family left destitute through the unjust persecutions of Comstock and his allies. I hav just borrowed a dollar and sent him, as I feel that we all owe him a little for good work done in publishing Mrs. Follet's "Libra Dawn," a story no other paper would hav ventured to print, and yet one embodying good physiological truths that all should know and understand.

Though in great need of aid, our friend does not ask alms. He only wishes such Liberals as feel financially able to send him a few dollars each, addressed to Mrs H. L. Barter, 1616 Brody street, Davenport, Iowa. The name and address of each correspondent will be carefully registered and a copy of the new paper he intends starting will be forwarded in compensation. Relief is only temporarily needed, and asked for in deep regret that circumstances should demand it, and so I put the matter in thy hands, friend Bennett, for thee to use thy judgment as to ways and means. Thine,

January 24, 1881. ELMINA.

THE doctrin which from the very first origin of religious dissensions has been held by all bigots of all sects, when condensed into a few words and stripped of rhetorical disguise, is simply this: I am in the right and you are in the wrong. When you are the stronger you ought to tolerate me, for it is your duty to tolerate truth. But when I am the stronger I shall persecute you, for it is my duty to persecute error.—Macaulay.

Letters from Friends.

ALLEGHENY, PA., Feb. 2, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: Count on me for a "V" on the "Round the World" trip. G. W. DARBY.

BLUFFTON, OHIO, Jan. 31, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: You may put my name down for a "V" to help pay for that trip around the world. I think I will get the full value of the money if I get the books of travel. I hav "Grant Around the World," but it is not so complete as it might be. Your money is ready as soon as it is certain that you go. Respectfully, WM. HANENSTEIN.

PRESTON, IOWA, Jan. 16, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav received two numbers of your paper for 1881, which reminds me that my subscription is due for this year; hence find inclosed three dollars, which please place to my credit. I take the highest pleasure in perusing the pages of your valuable paper, containing many intelligent articles from your contributors, as well as the editorials, and especially your splendid letters from Europe. I hav read the writings of many travelers before, but none so good as yours.

I see that some brother suggests a trip around the world to which I say, Amen. If the requisit number will contribute please count me in for five dollars and the books when printed.

There is one department of your paper that I much admire, and that is the "Letters from Friends." It almost seems like meeting those friends from all parts of the country and having an interchange of thought and friendly greetings from them. I shall do my best in obtaining subscribers for you. I make it a point to solicit subscriptions for Liberal papers.

Yours fraternally, JOHN DURANT.

BALTIMORE, MD., Feb. 3, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND: I am in accord with the proposed trip around the world and shall try to hav the "V" ready when it has crystallized into a fact that you will surely set out on the mission. I will say that I very much doubt if the proposed amount named will carry you around and enable you to get up the three hundred books needed. You ought at least to be gone a year or a year and six months. We want tosee the world as it is, impartial and free from superstition, through a genuin Infidel's eyes. I think also that you ought to hav a suitable companion of like disposition and curiosity. Is there not some good Freethinker of ample personal means who would like to make this trip with you, and who will be a help and not a drag?

If you should make this journey and visit Japan and China, I hope you will not skim along the coast, but penetrate the interior, if it is possible, and giv the interior life of those countries, the habits and manners of the people.

I trust you will not fail to visit Palestine, that land of ignorance and superstition, and unmask it. Let us hav the truth about it as near as you can come at it. The thing is to get started and started right. I hav faith that you will do it up about right.

Believe me yours, C. GARWOOD.

NAPLES, N. Y., Feb. 3, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I inclose postal order for THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year. Please put my name down for $5 for your trip around the world. If you conclude to go I will see to it the money is there in time. We shall be glad to get a fair history of the "heathen" countries, and there is now no one we should be better pleased to hear from than you. It is only a short time since we knew much of the great religions of the world which the Christians call heathen. Not till recently could we get anything like an impartial report. We had supposed in our ignorance that Christianity in numbers was largely in the ascendency, but a little investigation shows the reverse; also that many of those so-called benighted heathens are far in advance of us both in morals and religion. The comparativly few who are interested will not be able to control thought much longer. The tendency now of all the ancient religions seem to be to dissolve before the rays of science and reform. Doubts are now everywhere felt concerning things which were once currently believed. Yours fraternally, J. W. PRICE.

BRO. BENNETT: I propose to the Liberals of this country for each one, so far as possible, to donate fifty cents to Bro. Hacker, which will insure him a home and the comforts of life without distressing any family. It will giv me satisfaction if this meets the approval of the friends of the cause. I will inclose my part to you for that purpose.

Yours for progress, MARY R. CHILD.

DEADWOOD, D. T., Jan. 17, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: You can count on me for $5, or $10 if necessary, toward the trip around the world. It will be a good thing for more reasons than one. I can think of several: 1. You deserve it at the hands of Liberals; 2. The cause needs your letters; 3. The project will be very disheartening to orthodoxy and quite as encouraging to all classes of truth lovers; 4. No better slap in the face could be given A B C & Co. (that B and C should be double); 5. No better means could be adopted to advertise THE TRUTH SEEKER; 6. The sum of human knowledge will be increased and human ignorance lessened to a much greater extent than could be done with the same money any other way.

There are very likely other reasons, but the above are deemed sufficient, especially when one reflects that you spent a year in prison for no reason at all, and that less than half the number has often hanged a man or made him President.

Fellow Liberals, truth demands of us more sacrifices than we hav been in the habit of making. Our cause is humanity, and it demands a free use of our money, a breaking away from parties and cliques, and the bearing aloft of our standard even at the expense of social ostracism.

Think of the gross superstition that yet covers this fair land and permeates childhood and old age. Think of boy preachers away out here in this land of gold and gloss telling sensible men and women, with a flourish of agony, that he is "tired of burying people in Christless graves!" Yes, we need to work! We need to form Leagues for truth and justice, to scatter truth-telling literature, and to send the old warhorse of THE TRUTH SEEKER abroad to write some of it from other lands.

Inclosed find post-office order for $3, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER to Charles Federol, Deadwood, for one year, commencing when you get this.

Yours for universal mental liberty,
D. P. WILCOX.

FROM A LONDON FRIEND.

LONDON, ENG., Jan. 23, 1881.

MY DEAR MR. BENNETT: I see you hav placed a new style of heading to your paper. I like it better than the old one, it is so neat, plain, and effectiv, and could scarcely be improved upon. The report of the discussion between Mrs. Besant and Mr. Hatchard will no doubt be as interesting and instructiv to your numerous readers as to myself. I think a debate does more real good to the cause of truth than a lecture or newspaper article on one side only. It shows up the strongest and weakest points of the subject in dispute, each party to the discussion being placed upon his mettle and doing his best to demolish the arguments of his adversary by bringing forward better ones. To properly appreciate a debate it should be heard, and then arterward the report read over carefully, the more times the better, so that the most prominent points may be impressed on the mind of the reader for his own use on some future occasion.

As most Freethinkers are at times involved in argument with the believers in what is very erroneously termed the Christian religion, and hav not always at their tongues' end names of authors who may be quoted with great effect, it would be a great boon to such if some one having the time and knowledge were to prepare a small work handy for the pocket, giving a list of writers on controversial topics and standard authorities on both sides, with a few lines descriptiv of the works of each. Such a book would meet with a ready sale and do much good to the cause of truth seeking.

The strangest thing to my mind is that the defenders of the faith strenuously maintain that Jesus Christ was the real and only son of God, and consequently all his teachings were divine, and while pretending to believe all this only consider the one thing needful to save their poor, pitiful, shriveled-up, paltry little abortions of souls is to believe that Christ died for them, casting on one side altogether his communistic injunctions to love one another, to hav all their possessions in common, to return good for evil, be meek and long suffering, holding him as their example, and following in his footsteps, laying up treasures in heaven, and despising all earthly things. Of course it is very easy for wealthy members of the flock and well-fed, lazy shepherds to say these teachings only applied to his immediate followers, and were not meant for all time, but it is very surprising that they can get people foolish enough to believe them and subscribe money for the purpose of keeping them in luxury and idleness. How the priests must laugh when alone at the ease with which they can gull their audiences, who may well be compared to sheep; they are simple enough in all conscience. When Mr. Moneybags goes to a particular church he will find plenty to follow him, it is so respectable to go where he does. If it were not for its respectability, the chapels and churches would soon be empty. Little the "hearers of the word" care for what has been said. I was passing a church this morning when the worshipers were leaving, and overheard fragments of conversation indulged in by some of the believers. One little party was discussing the prospects of skating during the ensuing week, and an elderly individual, apparently the owner of house propetty, was informing an ancient female that he lately lost fifty pounds by a defaulting tenant. Not a word about the tidings of comfort and joy it is presumed they had just been hearing. And these children of God howl and snivel at the earnest truth seeker and honest doubter of the infallibility of the creeds that hav been in all ages the curses of our race, and whose exponents hav caused the deepest misery to millions of their fellows! The same spirit of persecution is still rampant with true believers, and it is no thanks to them that they do not still torture and burn all who hav the temerity to think for themselvs. They go as far as they can, as we see by the church of Scotland at the present time; and we are continually hearing of various sects expelling and excommunicating those of their members who dare to exercise a little of the common sense in religious matters that they apply to secular concerns; and this spirit will never die out until people emancipate themselvs from the power of the priests. Educating the masses will do much toward gaining the desired end, and Freethinkers should fight hard for the purpose of having nothing but secular teaching in the government schools. If the Bible is read, why not also the Koran and the Book of Fo and the sacred books of the chief religions of the world? One is quite as necessary as another. No religious works should be placed in the hands of children. In nearly all of them there are many things that would not be tolerated in other books, and surely no one can maintain that it is desirable for either boys or girls to wade through accounts of murder, robbery, adultery, and mysterious conception. It is quite time enough when maturity is attained to peruse these interesting details.

The church here is deploring greatly the falling off of the percentage of conversions, and although buildings are erected and priests multiplied, and much wrestling with the spirit resorted to, still the harvest is considerably smaller than they would like to see.

We are passing through a transition period, and I find in my journeyings to and fro, and conversings with men, that there is a strong feeling of indifference to religious questions abroad. I urge all whom I can to get over this feeling and take their stand on our side, striving with all their might to drive superstition from the minds of their fellow men and women. If all Freethinkers do the same our cause of humanitarianism ought to make rapid strides. It is progressing surely if slowly, but we should all like to see it make faster headway. The great army of emancipation must not be numbered by the members of societies. There are many free lancers who prefer not to join any union, but they all do good work. The best and quickest way will be by supporting the Freethought publishers, laying out all the money they can spare in the purchase of Freethought literature, and inducing others to do the same. They may always rely upon getting their money's worth, and at the same time assist the cause of truth.

Fraternally yours, J. S. D.

ON WITH THE DANCE.

DAVENPORT, IOWA.

MR. EDITOR: Now that the last case requiring attention at the hands of the Defense Association has been withdrawn, a few remarks in regard to maintaining the efficiency of that organization may not be entirely out of order. During its existence the association has done a good work in meeting and repelling the audacious attempts of religious bigots to fasten the slavish chains of intolerance upon the press of the country. And now while a lull in the storm affords opportunity for a breathing-spell, we should be admonished that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," and relax no effort to put the association on a financial footing to successfully repel all future invasions of the rights of American freemen. That other cases will arise calling for defense on the part of the association no one can doubt so long as the obnoxious and tyrannical Comstock law remains upon our statutes. As we hav seen to our great relief during the trial just withdrawn in the U. S. Court at Keokuk, the Defense Association is exercising a healthy influence in the courts and among those who would establish an espionage over the morals of the people the most tyrannical the world ever saw. Hence we say build up and establish that branch of the National Liberal League and be ready for the next victim of church intolerance and Christian hate.

H. L. BARTER.

CINCINNATI, O., Jan. 30, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: There is very much talk all the time about souls, and millions of dollars are paid to save them from nothing. This soul business is the most extensiv of frauds, and it is something very surprising that the world is so blind on the question. What is this soul? Nothing but the intellectual outcome of a material organism, and without such organism no soul can exist. Before man's birth there was no intelligence, no thought, no consciousness, no soul. So also will it be when man becomes extinct. Death is a sleep from which no man ever awakens; and all the cant and jargon about a deathless soul is the scheme of the hypocrits to plunder their dupes. T. WINTER.

SCOTT, IND., Jan. 30, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: By the workings of an almighty, unchangeable, and just law, we hav been called to part with two beloved Liberal friends, George Ruth, who died on the 25th of this month, and Austin Ruth, his brother, who died on the 28th, aged respectivly twenty-seven and thirty-four years. They leave behind them to mourn their untimely death an aged and widowed mother, one brother, one sister, and a host of friends and neighbors.

They were men that were well respected by all who knew them, and will be missed by the entire community; men that no yawning hell nor roaring orthodox devil or lying priest could scare into the patent wash of the blood of the lamb of the old sheep; men that didn't believe that a just God ever sent she-bears to tear into shreds little prattling, dimple-cheeked school children; men who took no stock in a God that would kill a man and his wife because they kept back a part of their hard-earned money from the priest; men who would not, under any circumstances, worship a God that would, through his general, Moses, order the slaughter of all the gray-haired men, aged and middle-aged women, and little rosy-cheeked boys of a whole nation for no other plausible reason than that he might prostitute thirty-two thousand pure and virtuous daughters to the lusts of a damnable and designing priesthood. Yet notwithstanding all this, some relativ or would-be friend employed a priest of the very much sanctified city of Angola to officiate at the burial and tell a large congregation that George and Austin Ruth had both gone to hell. What a consolation for an aged mother and mourning friends!

C. H. WOODWORTH.

BURR OAK, MICH., Feb. 3, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: In my letter that appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 29th the typos destroyed the sense and gist of the piece by first omitting the three first words of said letter, comprising the whole of the first sentence, which are the following, "Stop my paper."

The second is an interloper in full of five words, and should not hav been there at all. They are these, "I shall take the paper."

The third error consists in the word "doubt," which should be "don't." But either word has bad sense or no meaning there by the omission of the first sentence at head of letter.

The fourth and last but not least error is where the typos make me bid you Godspeed, a word I hav not used in any such sense for many years past and don't intend to for the next thousand years to come. The type setter simply dropped one o and picked up a big G instead of a little one.

Yours in truth, M. P. THURSTON.

ARLINGTON, KAN., Jan. 18, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: We had Prof. M. Green here last week, who delivered three lectures. The first was on "Infidelity vs. Christianity;" the second one was "Church and State;" and the third, "Civilization and Progress the Child of Infidelity." All three lectures were very able, and the professor made many friends here. He is a logical reasoner, fully posted on all points wherein we differ from the superstition of the present and past ages. Would cheerfully recommend Prof. Green to our friends as a lecturer, and hope they will giv him a call when they wish a lecturer. He should certainly be encouraged.

Christianity is on the down grade. Here formerly were three sectarian organizations, now there is none, and ministers can seldom get a congregation to listen to them; their influence is gone never to be revived again it is to be hoped. Instead of silly dogmas we hav free investigation on all subjects, both sacred (if there is such a thing) and profane. We are in a new country, and not wealthy; therefore cannot at present contribute as much to the cause as we would like, but we hope this state of affairs will not continue much longer. There are a few who could do something if they would.

Inclosed you will find $5—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for James L. Miller for one year. Direct it to Arrington, Kan. Also "Truth Seeker Collection of Forms, Hymns. and Recitations," and "Open Letter to the St. Johns School Board," by M. Babcock, the two above-mentioned books to be sent to Henry Schiffbauer as above, and $1 to be applied to the National Defense Fund. Yours truly, H. SCHIFFBAUER.

BURTON, MICH., Dec. 20, 1880.

BRO. BENNETT: Glad to hear of your safe return from your European tour; of your devotion to cathedrals, saints, paintings, priests, etc.; of your ability to measure the hight, length, breadth, density, and value thereof; of your extreme religious awe, devotion, and piety, aroused for the first time into such intense activity at the sight of the imposing joss-houses of Jahveh. Surely the Catholics should be profoundly grateful, and ought you to raise a sonorous Te Deum for having done the thing up in such sanctimonious style, and for giving such solid shot and ironical shell in commendation of their papal, sacerdotal, pecuniary, substitutionary, celibate, indelicate, insensate, roseate, triplicate, triumvirate, cardinalate, relicate, prostrate system of unceremonial religion! With votaries of every grade of genuflexions listening to priestly mummeries in unknown tongues and receiving benedictions proportional to their ignorance, don't you see they must be blessed?

Now we all perceive why all peoples and nations and kindred and tongues should buy your book descriptiv of that ancient and wondrous system of cathedral religion which made such a profound impression upon your religious nature as to send you through all the cathedrals of Europe from London to Rome—from St. Paul's to St. Peter's—where the founder of their religion said: "Foxes hav holes, birds hav nests, but the son of man hath not where to lay his head. Blessed are the poor; the rich hav had their consolation." Of course this commends pomp and show, smoke and incense, miter and surplice, priests ad nauseum. Of course you hav seen the thing in all its richness, beauty, and simplicity, and felt its wondrous overshadowing power; and don't you never surrender one item of your heartfelt piety no matter what Infidels may say. Of course I want that book. Such piety as that can giv should be scattered far and wide. All should drink of the waters of this Pyerean spring. Who should grudge a small sum to get such cathedral religion as that?

In addition to your imported cathedral religion, do not forget the iconoclasm peculiar to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Giv no quarter. Let your bugle blasts ring with no uncertain sound. Play toady to no clique or ism. Be fearless, positiv, but shrewd, that sleuth hounds of the law do not decoy but to crush where they can.

Strike! noble friend, for our freedom and fires;
Strike to the death all infamous liars!
Strike till the beast and his image shall go
To the bottomless pit of remediless woe!
Strike, for the beast is the Catholic church;
Strike, for her image* is now in the lurch!
Strike now, for Protestantism must fall—
The beast and the image, Babylon and all;
One thrust of the lance sure never will do,
The beast of the seer must be thrust through and through,
The weapons are reason and science aflame
'Gainst arms that are puny and spotted with shame;
Asserting obedience to natural law
As means to uplift the race without flaw
To positions of gods and goddesses grand
Is our work for the future, you well understand!
So fight away, Bennett, you lead in the van,
And millions will rally to follow a man
Whose motto is Truth most pointedly spoken
Till the ranks of the foe are routed and broken;
When Comstock shall hide his dastardly head,
And all who abet him are conquered or dead.
'Tis thus that the air shall be purified well,
And the curse of the ages be cast into hell;
The smoke of their torment shall cease to arise,
For the advent of angels shall dawn from the skies;
The darkness of error shall then fade away,
And the light of true science shall roll in the day,
Of truth, peace, and love with conquering sway!
Henceforth shall the warmth of religion inspire,
And lift all unceasingly higher and higher.
The loved but not lost shall work by our side
If love and content hold fast and abide.
Be patient and firm as Hercules' gates,†
To break into foam the waves of the fates.
For truth shall be victor in conflicts of time,
And yours be a triumph that's truly sublime.

DANVILLE, Jan. 16, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Please find inclosed a post-office order for $3.00 for our paper for 1881. We do not feel like missing one number, nor do we feel like eating the bread of charity while we can help it, and you are struggling so hard to giv us good, wholesome food for the mind. We hav enjoyed reading your letters so much; you giv such vivid descriptions of all you see that one enjoys without the fatigue of travel all the grandeurs and real enjoyment of home quiet at once, while following you in your journeying. What changes a year brings forth! Your travels were far more enjoyable, probably, from the experience you had undergone at the hands of your persecutors. Liberty is dear to every soul, but never fully appreciated until we hav been deprived of it. You are doing a work that will liv after you, which will cause all lovers of liberty, justice, and equality to revere your name, while your persecutors will only be remembered in connection with the part they took in trying to destroy you and your influence. But "Ever truth comes uppermost,

And ever is justice done."

NIMISILA, OHIO, Jan. 25, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find two dollars, which please credit on my subscription.

Prof. Ebberly, of Smithville, Ohio, was lecturing here last week on "The Harmony of Science and Religion." Can't you send him something that will stop him from fooling his time away and humbugging people? He thinks that Col. Ingersoll is honest and talented, but is to be pitied. There are a num- of Freethinking men in this town whose families are connected with the church. I hav been supplying them with Liberal tracts and books until the women of this town begin to think that I and my family are the worst people in it. S. TRANSUE.

[The following letter should hav appeared some time ago, but was mislaid.—ED. T. S.]

CHARLES CITY, IOWA, Jan. 3. 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: You will please change the name of Levi Cheney to Mrs. D. Andrews. Mr. Cheney died on the 7th of April last, having reached the age of eighty-three years. He was an earnest Liberal, and for twenty-five years had been a believer in the claims of Spiritualism. He was a good, kind-hearted, conscientious man, beloved by all who knew him. He was a warm friend of yours, Mr. Editor, and defended you most earnestly when those unkind attacks were made upon you by your enemies, Abbot, Bundy & Co. He insisted that your course in the matter was right. I inclose to you his photograph, by which you can see the genial and intelligent expression of his countenance. The loss of him is so great that we feel none is able to fill his place in our community.

Though late in the day, I wish to say we welcome you on your return home. We fondly followed you in your journey to Europe and read your letters with decided pleasure. Please send me two copies of your letters from Europe when printed in book form.

Your friend, JOHN MAHARA.

NORWAY, IOWA.

TO THE LIBERALS OF IOWA: The campaign of 1881 is now open. The first thing to be done is to print the Constitution of the Iowa League, that it may be put into the hands of our county committee and township workers to inform them of our duties.

Money is wanted for this purpose and to print a church taxation petition, pay postage, etc. This petition must be at every polling-place in the state next fall. In due time the Iowa League will ask of every candidate for the general assembly his opinion regarding the taxation of church property, and upon that opinion will depend the votes of Secularists.

A small sum from each Liberal in the state will giv us all the funds wanted. But we must not wait upon one another. Now is the accepted time for work. Send all sums to our Treasurer, Mrs. Cornelia Boecklin, Burlington, Iowa, or to me if you so prefer.

Send me names of all live, outspoken Liberals you know, or know of, at the more post-offices the better. Especially do I want to hear from Adair, Boone, Buena Vista, Calhoun, Cherokee, Clay, Crawford, Davis, Dickerson, Franklin, Grundy, Howard, Humboldt, Kossuth, Louisa, Lucas, Marion, Mills, Monona, Montgomery, O'Brien, Osceola, Page, Palo Alto, Pocahontas, Ringgold, Sioux, Union, Van Buren, Winnebago, and Worth.

Push on the column! Work for a whole Liberalism—Liberalism that is what it claims to be, the Liberalism that knows no lines of belief, that fears not to face issues as they arise.

Shall Iowa be the banner state? Bro. Goddard and Dakota reach for the territorial laurels.

Send the names, stamps, money, and information that shall place Iowa in the front rank of the states.

E. C. WALKER,
Sec. and Ch. Ex. Com. Iowa League.

HEMLOCK HOLLOW, PA., Jan. 22, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: I hav been an Infidel a good many years, but never was so bold as to speak my opinion until I took your paper. I did not know that there were so many men of my belief in the United States. When I saw that there were so many Infidels it made me bold enough to speak my opinion. I say Infidels, because the bigots call us Infidels. They are all Christian bigots in our town, and they shun me as though I were a rattlesnake. They got a man of their own stamp to start a store. They wouldn't trade with me unless they were obliged to. He started without any capital and could not trust. Now they begin to come around when they want flour and pork on credit, and say if I am an old Infidel I do more to accommodate them than any man in the place. The preacher in our town said they shouldn't allow me to liv, but should kill me. For all that, I can't giv up THE TRUTH SEEKER, so I inclose money for another year's subscription.

Fraternally yours, R. C. GLOSENGER.

WEST NEWTON, MASS., Jan. 24, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed three dollars to pay my subscription to the good old TRUTH SEEKER up to January 1, 1882. I would sooner go without one meal of victuals every day than do without your paper. I hope you will make the proposed trip around this little spot of earth, and if I had plenty of the golden god, or even good health, I would chip in and help to pay your expenses. But woe is me! I hav neither health nor wealth, so you must take the will for the deed. Wishing you success, I am truly yours, CHAS. N. WOOD.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Jan. 22, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: Next month my contract expires for your valuable paper; inclosed is post-office order for $3.00 for one more year. I cannot be without your paper and can hardly wait till the week is over. I also send you an invitation to come to St. Joseph to our concert in Christ church. You might just as well go to a consecrated place and stay away from the opera house. Those grasshoppers don't know what means to employ to make money. They are running in oppositition to the theater, restaurant, ice-cream parlor, variety theater, etc. Such a thing as a theater will in time not exist. The church will be to rent at five or ten dollars a night and it will be a great economy to those engaged in that business. I expect to visit New York soon and I will bring with me a sermon delivered by the bishop of San Pete (Utah). Yours truly, L. LIETHMULLER.

TAKE good care of human nature and you take good care of religion. Out of the best human hearts grows the best religion, as largest crops grow from the finest soil. Cultivate, make rich, make broad, make sympathetic, make true and noble the souls of men, and you are sure to grow the noblest religion.—Herman Bisbee.

In scented dale
Of haunted vale,
The stars a-peeping in,
Sang nightingale
A low, sad tale,
Whose sweetness knew no sin.

In lilied nook
Of gleaming brook,
Lil' pad over his poll,
With frog-like grace
The bullfrog bass
Bellowed with all his soul.

The air was still,
And rill and hill,
And listening orbs above,
Drew near to hear,
With ravished ear,
That wondrous song of love.

Reverie of the Irish Emigrant.

BY WILLIAM COTTER WILSON.

Sweet home of my childhood, dear sylphs of the glen,
Loved sprites of the Dargle, I court ye again!
Oh, lead me in spirit thy mountains among,
Though far from the fir-crowned coverts of song,
In the wilds of Columbia, midst mountains of snow,
An alien I roam, where her wild torrents flow;
Still the silver-tip waters of Powerscourt vale,
And the scenes of my childhood loom up through the gale:
The streams of the Vartry purling on to the town,
Where the brown heather'd mountains of Wicklow look down
On my loved Enniskerry, by the rock-severed Scalp,
Which pales in its beauty the snow-covered Alp.
When the crimson-faced sun o'er the Sugarloaf fell,
And nature in silence reigned over the dell,
On its evergreen hillocks I would stay me to rest,
With the cheek of my Maggie, love, laid on my breast.
While away in the distance the headland of Bray,
Looking o'er the Atlantic, our thoughts would betray,
And pictures of freedom, of wealth, and of ease,
Stript the glen of its beauties, our hopes to appease.
We talked of the joys in the land of the free,
And pictured in fancy our home as 'twould be;
But fate, cruel guardian, kept watch at my side,
And robb'd me of Maggie, my hope and my pride.
In the Vale of Ovoca they laid her to sleep,
And left me to wander alone o'er the deep;
Far o'er the wide ocean, o'er mountain and plain,
I hav sought me a home, but hav sought it in vain.
For where is the home without those whom we loved?
Or where can we rest from our friendships removed?
Then let me go back to the glen of the Downs,
To the sweet Dargle streams and Ovoca's green mounds.
Let me watch the wild cataract over the Fall,
Once more the glad days of my childhood recall;
Let me hear the sweet note of the skylark on high,
And the linnet's shrill song in the covert hard by;
Let me wander again through the Ballyman glen;
By the Scalp overshadowed, deep hidden from men;
Where the well of St. Kevin, low nestling from view,
Is covered by tributes which pilgrims bestrew.
Oh, how well I remember when Maggie and I
Stopp'd to drink of its waters all parching and dry;
When we split up our 'kerchief and swore to be true,
As our path by the suicide's grave did pursue.
When the remnant's we hung on St. Kevin's ash tree,
We swore then forever ne'er parted to be,
And there by the bush-covered church in the Glen
We prayed to St. Kevin again and again.
The somber-leaved holly in the vale of Glencree,
And the hills of Glencullen found pleasure for me,
While the sides of the Douce towering up to the sky,
Through its rock-channelled surface the Dargle supply
With the silver-tipped waters that danced through the vale,
Scarce touched with the sunshine, or brushed with the gale;
Through the sylvan retreats of the Dan and the Tay.
And to old Glendalough I would wander away.
Ah, bleak Massachusetts, I'll bid thee farewell,
And aback to my home in the hollybrook dell,
Where the evergreen oaks, and the cypress, and yew,
O'ershadow the ruins of Kilmacanague;
Through the dark narrow glade where the brooklet steals by
The pass in the mountains, towering up to the sky;
Where the Downs from the Sugarloaf, split by the stream,
Keep back by their shadows the sun's piercing beam—
There again I will roam at the dawn of the day,
And when labor is o'er through the valleys I'll stray
And feel myself blest at the sight of the streams,
Which enwrap me with pleasure through life's early dreams,
Through the Delgany vales and the hills of Bellvue,
And the green parks of Tinna my walks I'll renew.
E'en now in my fancy the country I scan,
From the Down's lofty mountains to the vale of Dunran;
Through the vista of time I look back on the day
When the stones in the brook of Glendaragh I lay,
Whereon I could step, as with pleasure I bore
My love o'er its waters to high Altadore.
Through thirty long years with its changes I've seen
The Hermitage still is as fresh in the scene
As when o'er its rough broken stones I would tread,
Where the cloth for our picnic between them was spread,
When the sweet voice of Maggie was heard through the dell,
As it joined with the notes of the birds as they fell
On our ears from the cone-covered pines in the glade,
'Till I felt as though Orpheus was hid in the shade.
I'll leave thee, Columbia, my long foster home,
And back to green Erin again will I roam,
And there will I dwell until summoned from men,
To meet in the heavens my Maggie again.

THE Standard Cure Company, No. 114 Nassau street, New York city, will send to any address a box of Emery's Standard Cure (Purely Vegetable Cream-Coated Pills), a never-failing remedy for Ague, Biliousness, and all Malarial Diseases. Standard Cure is pleasant to take, contains no quinine, mercury, or poisons of any kind.

Special Notice from Bliss' Chief's Band.

Me, Red Cloud, speak for Blackfoot, the great Medicin Chief from happy hunting grounds. He say he love white chiefs and squaws. He travel like the wind. He go to circles. Him big chief. Blackfoot want much work to do. Him want to show him healing power. Make sick people well. Where paper go, Blackfoot go. Go quick. Send right away. No wampum for three moon.

This spirit message was first published in "Mind and Matter," January 10, M. S. 32, with the announcement that magnetized paper would be sent to all who were sick in body or mind that desired to be healed, also to those that desired to be developed as spirit mediums, for three months for three three-cent stamps. The three months closed with the following result: 3,405 persons hav sent for the paper by mail, one thousand persons hav received it at the office; and the hundreds of testimonials that hav been received of its wonderful work in healing the sick and developing mediums prove that Red Cloud and Blackfoot hav faithfully kept promises. From January 10th, M. S. 32, to January 10th, M. S. 33, over 15,000 persons hav sent for this paper, and thousands hav been benefited by its use. That all may hav an opportunity to test the merits of the paper, the price for the future will be as follows: one sheet, postage paid, ten cents; twelve sheets, one dollar. Send a silver ten cent piece if you can. Address James A. Bliss, 713 Sansom street, Philadelphia, Pa.

A Proposition.

I am prepared and will send to any one address, direct from my office, one sheet of "Blackfoot's" Magnetized Paper, postage paid, every week for one month for forty cents; two months for seventy cents; three months for one dollar. Address, with amount inclosed, James A. Bliss, 713 Sansom st., Philadelphia, Pa.

THE SEYMOUR, IND., TIMES

Is one of the most widely known and best heeled papers in the great Mississippi Valley. It will complete its 25th year in March, 1881, if the day of judgment doesn't come prior to that date; and it isn't at all likely that even Gabriel's toot horn can set it back much.

The Seymour Times has but few principles. Most papers are bothered and hampered with principles; but the Times having but few of 'em, and not one solitary politic to its name, is free to slip in a word for Truth, Justice, Mercy, and Humanity whenever it can get a chance.

The Seymour Times is for light and for useful knowledge, and it has no faith in humbuggery and superstition. It is the only paper in the great West that is able to run without a god or devil or ghost.

The Seymour Times is paying $4,000,000 (four million dollars) a head for ghosts, though, and it wants all it can get. It is also paying the same figure for virgins who are mothers, or sons who are their own fathers, or fathers who are their own sons.

The Times makes it a business to defend the holy ministers of the Lord from the slanders of the wicked. Those good men, full of the love of God, can do no sin. They are constantly tempted, however, of the women and of Satan, and according to the wicked they fall often and hard. This the Seymour Times denies on the general principle that the love of God shed abroad in the heart leaves no room for sin and none can get in or could stay there a minute if it did.

The Seymour Times is a large six-column quarto, beautifully printed in bold type.

If you are a Freethinker, you want it; if you ain't, you want it.

Price, $2.15 a year; 6 months, $1.10; 3 months, 60 cents. Stamps received for change. At least send two red stamps for sample copy. Address J. R. MONROE, M.D., Seymour, Ind.

SUPERSTITION IN ALL AGES.

BY JOHN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not eveu by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

TO MISS ANNA KNOOP, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

Sixteen Saviors or None.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Being a reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examins all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other, and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and themselvs, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. Price, 75 cents, pamphlet; $1, bound.

CONSULT

Your Case Is Curable!

You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS, Sciatica and Lumbago Belt.

DESCRIPTION OF ABOVE GARMENTS.

Each Eylet is a galvanic cell attached to a series of powerful magnets. They are light as ordinary garments, and produce a soothing yet exhilirating effect upon the system, without causing shocks or sores, as in electric belts or galvanic chains.

The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are the Despair of Physicians, and the Annihilation of Quack Nostrums and Legalized Quackery. Thousands of persons are being constantly hurried on to Apoplexy and Paralysis by the use of Cephalic Snuffs and Washes. Catarrh can be readily cured without any of these nostrums.

THE "WILSONIA" CORSET AND MAGNETIC BELT

For Ladies and Gentlemen will cure Asthma, Catarrh, Loss of Energy, Nervous Debility, Bleeding at the Lungs, Kidney Disease, Tumors, Rheumatism, Gout, Paralysis, Bronchitis, Dyspepsia, and every form of Female Weakness.

SEND FOR PRICE LIST Containing THOUSANDS OF TESTIMONIALS.

The "Wilsonia" appliances are not mere plasters which become useless after a few weeks' wear, but they retain their curativ powers for twenty years, and can be worn by any member of the same family from time to time.

Persons who read this notice may wonder that I had not advertised my discovery before. The fact is, I determined when I arrived in America not to publicly advertise until I had five hundred patients in one city, to whom I could refer as evidence. I hav now over one thousand persons in the city of Brooklyn ready to testify that my galvano-magnetic belts will remove and cure every malady known to man, except a rotten lung, and even where the lungs hav begun to decay, my appliances will arrest the decay and heal them.

Here in the city of Brooklyn the paralyzed hav been restored; patients suffering from inflammatory rheumatism hav been taken off their crutches; nerve maladies, bearing on mania, hav been completely cured; martyrs to varicose veins, whose legs hav been bound in elastic stockings for twenty years, hav cut away their bandages, and are now as free from varicose veins as the healthiest person living; children who had never walked from birth up to three, eight, and twelve years of age, are now walking about as other children. In short, the cures effected by my appliances seem so miraculous that the above statements sound like an Arabian Night's tale. Nevertheless, these facts can all be substantiated, and my open letter to the physicians and the Charities Commissioners of Brooklyn must convince the most incredulous that my invention is the most wonderful on record.

My offer of five thousand dollars to the physicians and Charities Commissioners of Brooklyn is still open, and will continue so to be for six months.

I am prepared to go into the hospitals and will only take their incurable cases, suffering from paralysis, locomotor ataxia, inflammatory and chronic rheumatism, congestion of the kidneys, pleuro-pneumonia, or any disease their medicins hav failed to reach—less an absolutely decayed lung.

If the citizens of Brooklyn continue to suffer from any of the above maladies, they hav themselvs to blame.

The cost of my appliances, though seemingly expensiv, is one hundred times cheaper than the present method of purchasing physicians' prescriptions and paying for their drugs.

Send to me for price lists and testimonials, and make full inquiries of those who hav been cured, before you waste your time in calling upon me.

I court the fullest scrutiny, and prefer not selling you goods until you hav inquired of those who hav been cured.

To you who are suffering, and are now under the care of your physicians, prevail on them to call upon me, and acquaint themselvs with my invention before making any statements in regard to the same.

Note the address, 465 Fulton street, Brooklyn.

Male and female assistants always in attendance from 10 o'clock, A. M., till 8 o'clock, P. M.

My appliances are being used with as marked success in England as in Brooklyn and New York.

Gems of Thought.

THE free man thinks of nothing less than of death; his wisdom consists not in the meditation of death but of life.—Spinoza.

DISTRUSTFUL sense with modest caution speaks,
It still looks home, and short excursions makes;
But rattling nonsense in full volleys breaks,
And, never shocked and never turned aside,
Bursts out resistless with a thundering tide.
—Pope.

OUR greatness will appear
Then most conspicuous when great things of small,
Useful of hurtful, prosperous of adverse,
We can create; and, in what place soe'er,
Thrive under evil, and work ease out of pain
Through labor and endurance. —Milton.

LIKE the baseless fabric of a vision,
The cloud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve,
And, like an unsubstantial pageant fadèd,
Leave not a rock behind. We are such stuff
As dreams are made of, and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep.—Shakspere.

IF state appropriations of public money are made for the support of chaplains in the army and navy and other institutions, is not this enforcing the Christian religion by law? Are not laws made enforcing regulations and rules for teaching the Christian religion in our jails and prisons, and in nearly all charitable institutions and sectarian schools? This government is emphatically a Christian government, and even the President himself dares not go in direct opposition to church decrees and church demands.—Elmina D. Slenker.

WHEN I asked him if he believed in personal immortality, he said he thought no one had a right dogmatically to deny. No one knew that we were not immortal and there were rational theories of it that could be held. But he was inclined to doubt. He questioned whether life, thought, consciousness were not results of organization, as the perfume was the result of organization in a rose, or music in a piano. But he is no dogmatic denier on this point, and thinks that at present it is beyond us.—Talk with H. Spencer.

WHAT has Rationalism to say to us when we stand face to face with the mighty destroyer of all living things? "Your creed may be good enough to liv by," say objectors, "but is it good to die by?" A creed that is good in life must needs be good in death, and never yet was a hero-life closed by a coward-death. What can better smooth the bed of the dying man than the knowledge that the world is the happier for his living, that he leaves it better than he found it, that he has helped to raise and purify it? What easier pillow to rest the dying head on than the memory of a useful life?—Mrs. Annie Besant.

PERSECUTION is a wrong inflicted for opinions; and surely assaults on character fall under this definition. Some persons seem to think that persecution consists in pursuing error with fire and sword, and that therefore it has ceased to exist, except in distempered imaginations, because no class of Christians among us is armed with these terrible weapons. But no. The form is changed, but the spirit livs. Persecution has given up its halter and fagot, but it breathes venom from its lips and secretly blasts what it cannot openly destroy. —Dr. Channing.

NONE claim "immortality" for the brightness of the steel when oxidation has so disfigured the surface that rust has superseded all brilliance; none claim "immortality" for the sweet odor of the rose when the vegetable mass emits only unpleasant smells and exhibits unsightlv rottenness; none claim "immortality" for the color of the beautiful lily decayed and withered away. Those who claim immortality for what they call the soul should first clearly define it and then at least try to prove that the attributes they claim for soul are not the attributes of what we know as living body.—Bradlaugh.

THEN infant reason grows apace and calls
For the kind hand of an assiduous care.
Delightful task! to rear the tender thought,
To teach the young idea how to shoot,
To pour the fresh instruction o'er the mind,
To breathe the enlivening spirit, and to fire
The generous purpose in the glowing breast.
Oh! speak the joy, ye whom the sudden tear
Surprises often, while you look around,
And nothing strikes your eye but sights of bliss,
All various nature pressing on the heart.
—Thompson's Seasons.

THERE is the same diversity in Rationalism as in Christianity, because human nature is diverse, but there is also one bond between all Freethinkers, one great saving truth of Rationalism, one article of faith, and that is that "free inquiry is the right of every human soul;" diverse in much, we all agree in this, and so strong is this bond that we readily welcome any thinker, however we may disagree with his thoughts, provided only that he think them honestly and allow to all the liberty of holding their own opinions also. We are bound together in one common hatred of dogmatism, one common law of liberty of thought and speech.—Mrs. Annie Besant.

WERE the same pains taken to impress truth on the mind in early infancy that is often taken to inculcate error, the great principles of our conduct would not only be juster than they are, but, in consequence of the aid which they would receive from the imagination and the heart, trained to conspire with them in the same direction, they would render us happier in ourselvs, and would influence our practice more powerfully and more habitually. There is surely nothing in error which is more congenial to the mind than truth. On the contrary, when exhibited separately and alone to the understanding, it shocks our reason and provokes our ridicule; and it is only by an alliance with truths, which we find it difficult to renounce, that error can obtain our assent or command our reverence. —Dugald Stewart.

Odds and Ends.

"YOU are now one," said the minister to the happy pair he had just tied together with a knot that they could never undo. "Which one?" asked the bride. "You will hav to settle that for yourselvs," said the clergyman.

A GALVESTON woman, just married, wishing to impress her husband with her ability as a housekeeper, bawled out to the servant as she entered the door, "Matilda, bring me the washboard; I want to wash the potatoes for dinner."

SHE was a big, buxom lass, and when her small beau called one evening, she said,

"Good evening, Lilly."

"I'm no lily," he replied, surprised at the idea; "you're the lily; men are never lilies."

"Yes, sometimes they are; and you especially are a lily."

"How's that?"

"Lilliputian."

He then looked as if he wished he were an elephant.

A BOSTON man besought his wife, he being but three years married, for the privilege of a night-key. "Night-key!" she exclaimed, in tones of amazement, "what use can you hav for a night-key when the Woman's Emancipation League meets Monday night, the Ladies' Domestic Mission Tuesday, the Sisters of Jericho Wednesday, the Women's Science Circle Thursday, the Daughters of Nineveh Friday, Women's Progressiv Art Association and the Suffrage Band on alternate Saturday nights? You stay at home and see that the baby doesn't fall out of the cradle." He stays.

COLLEGE SKETCHES.

Who strides the streets of Boston town
With such majestic tread?
Whose lip is covered o'er with down?
Whose hat-band is dark red?
Who, when he walks upon the street,
Of jockey club doth smell?
Whose hair is parted, oh, so neat?
He is a Harvard swell.

Then who is this, with winning smile,
Whose whiskers are jet-black,
Whose overcoat's the newest style,
His trousers ten years back?
Whose wicked eye is full of sin,
Who drinks much beer and ale,
Who wears a skull and cross-bone pin?
A masher he, from Yale.

But no, who's this, who, full of strife,
Yet still is pale and sad,
Whose greatest comfort in this life
Is in his ague pad?
Who, when his Faculty say No.
Is gentle, meek, and mild,
But positivly will not go?
'Tis Princeton's fevered child.
—Acta Columbiana.

PASS IT ROUND.

A little love,
A little glove,
A little rosebud for a token;
A little sigh
For days gone by
A little girl heart-broken.
—Boston Courier.

Another man
Woes Sarah Ann,
With bank-book well extended;
A social crown,
A house in town,
And Sarah's heart is mended.
—New York Commercial.

A little boot,
A little foot,
A little hugging closer;
A little tap,
A thundering rap—
Down the stairs he goes, sir.
—Reading News.

A little kiss,
A little bliss,
A little ring—it's ended;
A little jaw,
A little law,
And lo! the bonds are rended. —Truth.

THE ICE.

Now the men are on the ice—
Crystal ice—
And they'll fill up their houses in a trice.
How they giggle, giggle, giggle,
In the frozen air of day,
While the mercury runs lower
And their saws go never slower,
But up and down alway,
Like the stocks, stocks, stocks,
Or like Jacky-in-the-box,
Through the crystal congelation that hides the ponds so nice
With the ice, ice, ice,
Ice, ice, ice,
Through the frozen aqua pura, through the ice.

In the summer, oh, how nice,
Cooling ice!
On the table what a blessing is a slice,
In the heated air of noon,
When the butter sinks in swoon
And the water is lukewarm
And hard to drink,
And the flies about you swarm
Like the chickens on the newly-planted farm!
Oh, to think,
As you hear the sound so nice
Of the cart all drip, drip, dripping with the ice,
Once or twice
That the price
Does not pinch you like a vise,
A dollar for a slice
No thicker than the liquor
Of the ice, ice, ice,
Of the ice, ice, ice, ice,
Ice, ice, ice!
Oh, the ice creams! Oh, the cobbler! Oh, the ice!
—Boston Transcript.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

"The Gods and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," "Heretics and Heresies." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

"The Ghosts and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Ghosts," "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," "Declaration of Independence," "Farming in Illinois." "Speech at Cincinnati," "The Past Rises Before Me Like a Dream." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.
Both volumes bound in one, price, paper, $1.00.

'What Must We Do to be Saved?"

"Interpolations are the foundation stones of every orthodox church." Thoroughly revised and corrected by the author. Price, 25 cents.

Notes and Clippings.

THE three large Jesuit schools in Paris hav not only been evacuated, but their doors hav been walled up by order of the government.

INTERNAL dissensions in the Central Presbyterian church in Rochester resulted in the resignation of the pastor, the Rev. Dr. S. M. Campbell.

IN a heated discussion in Ireland one of the opponents of the Rev. Mr. Cain, of Belfast, spoke of that gentleman as "a lineal descendant of the man who a long time ago killed his brother."

THE Rev. J. V. Backman, of Armington, Ill., got drunk on communion wine, whipped his wife, and broke nearly all of the parsonage furniture. How that good shepherd must hav loved his Jesus!

THE reinforcements going from Great Britain and from India to South Africa show how much money and blood a great nation claiming to love liberty can expend in crushing the independence of a little far-off community, seized and annexed against its will.

PARIS has a society fashioned after the model of Anthony Comstock's, known as the Police of Public Morals. It has carried on its operations, also, after the model afforded by Mr. Comstock, until a legislativ decree has been enacted abolishing it, and that must happen here sooner or later.

THERE is a movement in St. Louis to strictly enforce the Sunday law. By a provision of the act, Jews may work on Sunday if they religiously observe Saturday. The Globe-Democrat declares that if interfered with it will employ Jews exclusivly to get out the Monday morning edition.

THE Philadelphia Times is responsible for the assertion that President Hayes drinks whisky, brandy, wine, and beer, but never in the presence of his wife except when dining out, when he excuses himself by saying "I guess it won't hurt me," or, "I'm not feeling very well to-day." He could not do it better if he were plain Deacon Hayes.

ADAM MANGLE, a farmer, of Hinckley, Ill., thirty-eight years old, who has a wife and three children, was lately crazed by religious excitement. Escaping from his family, Mangle went to church in a terrible storm Saturday night with nothing on but his shirt. He was terribly frozen, and it is thought his legs will hav to be amputated. He will perhaps die.

THE Salvation Army claim to be marching victoriously on in Newark, N. J. There is an occasional deserter from the hosts, however. One of their loudest exhorters, calling himself George W. Walters, was arrested on Friday on a charge of larcenously abstracting some jewelry and other articles from the house of Mr. Joseph Niblo, No. 98 Union street, where he had secured board.

THREE churches in Michigan City, Ind., wanted a revival, but neither one of the three was strong enough to secure by itself the services of an evangelist or promoter of revivals. So these three churches, Congregational, Methodist, and Presbyterian, united their forces and engaged Evangelist Munholl, under whose persuasiv efforts about fifty sinners were induced to leave their wicked ways and make profession of religion.

A WRITER in the Star, one acquainted with the sales of photographs, says: "Tom Paine has always sold well as long as I can remember, and sells as well to-day as ever; but I think that of all the persons whose pictures I sell, Bob Ingersoll outsells all. He is constantly in demand. It is amusing to me to hear the remarks of purchasers, who discuss, pro and con, the merits and demerits of various persons whose pictures are before them."

THE Bond-Street church of Toronto is out with the three other Congregational churches of that city. Its late pastor, the Rev. Mr. Handford, had a bad reputation, and his immoralities were frequently made public; yet the congregation stood by him, and it was only after the church had been formally cut off from fellowship that he was dismissed. The dispute now is about taking the church back into the union. A humble expression of contrition is demanded and refused.

MR. ANDREW MCLEAN, one of the editors of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, read a paper before the Spread-the-Light Club, at No. 365 Fulton street, on "The Land Question in America." Mr. McLean, in his paper, said that the dome of this great republic could not be declared completed until the land question in America had been solved. Just previous to the adjournment of the club a series of resolutions were passed setting forth that the Spread-the-Light Club of Brooklyn declares that the anti-rent and anti-interest agitation now inaugurated is the first step toward the emancipation of the working masses in the United States from oppression through capitalism and wage slavery. The club advises the workingmen of Brooklyn and all other American cities and towns to organize anti-rent leagues immediately.

ONE of the singular natural phenomena known in this section is the formation of two geysers in the strip of country known as the Sag, about a mile and a half from Mr. Patterson's ranch, on the Shonkin. They were first seen about a month ago. They are situated in a small canyon running out from the wall of rocks on the east of Alkali Lake. Two geysers hav appeared, one of them being of monster proportions, throwing up a column of hot water and steam over one hundred feet high, the other spouting about fifty feet, but with a larger proportion of water. The diameter is about four inches. The geysers are intermittent in character, and are activ during the morning hours, about eight or nine o'clock. The formation of the country is a sandstone and gneiss, and has all the appearance of being an ancient river bed. What has produced this curious phenomenon it is of course useless to speculate, as there is no evidence of ancient volcanic activity, and no hypothesis can be formed which will account for it.—Missouri River Press.

THE Society for Ethical Culture shows its sensible philanthropy in the provisions it adopts for furnishing trained nurses to the sick poor, not to make their bodily helplessness the text for canting missionary work, but to make it an excuse for doing them what good it can. As Professor Adler says, "There is no difference between Catholic pneumonia and Protestant pneumonia, and Jewish pneumonia and Infidel pneumonia, and if a man has pneumonia at all he deserves to be healed. There is no difference between Catholic suffering or Protestant suffering, or Jewish suffering or Infidel suffering, in any form. If a man suffers at all he deserves to be relieved." But you cannot insinuate that belief into the spirit of orthodox charity, and it givs, and will continue to giv, not so much to gratify those who need its benefactions as to flatter its faith in its own creeds. Consequently the hypocrit who is willing to profess anything he profits by will be its pet charge, and Prof. Adler and his Liberal kind will be the chief dependence of honest and self-respecting distress.

THE Salvation Army has suffered from the secession of several of its trusted officers. They say that Commissiomer Raillton worked them nearly to death and made them go out in all kinds of weather with inadequate clothing, insufficient food, and exceedingly meager pay. The people of this country hav never taken hold of the work of the Salvation Army with sufficient enthusiasm to provide for the payment of its bills. The Army has been driven to the necessity of getting its rations in the best way it could, and sometimes these rations hav been both few and short. It has been obliged to draw its subsistence from the cheapest boarding-houses, and to suffer from great scantiness. The officers and others who now leave Commissioner Raillton formerly gave him the homage which they would to a being whom they considered their superior, but they now regard hi n as a very common sort of a man, and threaten to show him up in ways which will not reflect glory on him. The seceders and Raillton are both in Newark, and both doing their utmost in their own way to evangelize that city.

THE German Lutheran church, occupying a hall at 666 Ninth avenue, held a fair, ending December 12th, and among the articles raffled for were two suits of clothes. The drawing was in charge of Jacob P. Dorr of 792 Ninth avenue, a trustee and the acting President of the Church Society of seventy-five members. The Rev. Frederick Heinle, the pastor, charged Dorr in the Yorkville Police Court recently with having retained for his own use one of the suits whieh had been won by Theodore Lietz. Dorr said that the clothes, together with some bottled soda and ginger ale, were not called for after the fair, and the Rev. Mr. Heinle had told him that if no one claimed them by Christmas he might keep them for himself. They were not called for. The cause of the Rev. Mr. Heinle's complaint, Dorr alleged, was that a split had occurred in the congregation, and he had sided against the minister. Dorr was discharged. In the course of the testimony it came out that the Rev. Mr. Heinle's salary was only $40 a month, and that as it had not been paid for five months, he sued the church in the Seventh District Court and obtained a verdict of $65. A marshal levied on the church property.

THE onslaught on Ingersoll made by Chief Justice Comegys at Wilmington, Delaware, was from the bench, and the remarks were addressed to a grand jury. Ingersoll had lately lectured in the place. The judge said: "Blasphemous language was used near where we are assembled by an audacious disciple of the defamers of revealed religion for the purpose of exposing its doctrins to contempt and ridicule; and, to what some consider the reproach of the people of this city, no man stepped forward to call him to account for his defiance of the law of the state. I say to you that the law of this state is against the insulting of God by reproachful or derogatory language or expressions, and exciting the passions of the people by treating their religion with contempt. No community such as ours can exist as a healthy, moral organization where men are allowed to speak without challenge against the very and only foundation upon which it securely rests—the overruling power of God. When we dethrone His Majesty and erect in his place our own notions of right and wrong, we shall soon pass into a state of life not restraining, but, in effect, promoting our inherent propensity to evil, for no candid man can pretend that our impulses are not toward the gratification rather than in restraint of our passions." His honor added that blasphemy was an ancient common-law offense, and was also made a crime by a Delaware statute as long ago as 1740. The punishment until 1826 was the pillory, the brand, and the whip. He said that Ingersoll might be arrested by any officer without a warrant, and added: "It is, I hope, hardly necessary to say to this community, and to assure the people of it, that if any one shall be convicted of the crime of blasphemy there will be no stint of the full measure of punishment the law now prescribes. And we shall in no wise be deterred from the performance of our duty by the sneers of the devotees of any other faith than that of the body of the people of this state, or the deprecatory expressions of those who think the right of free speech will be infringed thereby."

News of the Week.

FIVE million tons of ice is this year's crop.

HANLAN won the race against Laycock on the Thames on the 14th.

EIGHT cases of small-pox were discovered in one house in Jersey City last week.

THE Spanish ministry has resigned in consequence of financial differences with the king.

A BROOKLYN alderman last week introduced a bill in the Board to exempt ministers' houses from local taxation.

THE Bohemian, an English steamer, was completely wrecked off Crookhaven with a loss of thirty-five lives.

JOHN SABY, of Aurora, Ohio, has been arrested for brutally beating his little girl because she wouldn't say her prayers.

FERNANDO WOOD, the well-known New York politician, and for several terms mayor of this city, died at Hot Springs, Ark., on the 14th.

THE Illinois Senate and House hav passed resolutions condemning England and sympathizing with Michael Davitt in his tyrannical arrest.

THE House Committee on Foreign Affairs has adopted and instructed the Chairman to report a resolution affirming the Monroe doctrin.

ONE man was fatally injured and eight others bruised and burnt by a car getting off the track at Communipaw, New Jersey, on the 10th.

THE northern portion of California has been so deeply flooded that steamers floated over the submerged land, taking away the people and their stock.

GEN. HUSTED has introduced a bill in the New York Assembly to incorporate a company to supply New York city with water from Lake George.

A JOINT resolution of the two Houses of Congress has been passed directing Mr. Hayes to invite foreign nations to participate in a World's Fair in 1883.

THE Parliamentary Committee of the trades unions has memorialized Mr Gladstone, recommending reform of land tenure in Ireland as the proper means of repressing agrarian crime in Ireland. Mr. Parnell will sail for America in a few days.

THE Senate and House met in joint convention on the 9th and formally counted the electoral vote and declared Garfield and Arthur elected. The Senate Committee on Elections is going to investigate the story that Arthur was born in Canada.

PETER COOPER celebrated his ninetieth birthday on the 9th by presenting to the trustees of the Cooper Union a receipt in full for the $70,000 he has spent the past year on the building, a check for $30,000 to furnish further facilities for accommodating students, and another for $10,000 to be added to his "Golden Wedding Fund," the interest on which is annually given to institutions which aid poor children. The fund now amounts to $80,000.

THE Potomac overflowed its banks on the 12th, and a part of Washington was submerged. The floor of the Census Office was covered by three feet of water, the botanical gardens were flooded, and most of the hotels had from one to five feet of water in them. From all parts of the country heavy freshets are also reported. In Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Virginia, Ohio, Delaware, Connecticut, Illinois, and Louisiana immense damage has been done by water. In the Northern states great ice fields were added to the flood, and many wharves along the various river fronts were crushed and carried away. The loss all over the country will probably mount up into the millions.

Discussion.

Report of a Debate

BETWEEN THE REV. A. HATCHARD AND MRS. ANNIE BESANT, AT THE HALL OF SCIENCE, LONDON.

SECOND NIGHT.—CONTINUED.

MRS. BESANT.

I understand that Mr. Hatchard is not prepared to defend the Old Testament. Of that I am glad, although it is strange that a Christian clergyman should say so, for I find in the New Testament that Christ laid it down that any one who should break the least of these commandments of Moses, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven; and while I find Christ altering some of them, and saying that it was said "by them of old time" do so and so, "but I say unto you," do something else, yet he never said, "It was said by them of old time, you may flay your slaves nearly to death, but I say unto you, set them free."

If slavery in the old world was as abominable as Mr. Hatchard has said, that makes the conduct of the Apostle Paul in sending back the fugitiv slave to his master worse than I hav pictured it, where slaves were constantly the instructors of the young, and where freed slaves rose to the highest positions in the polity of the Roman Empire. Mr. Hatchard says that India is totally different now from what it was when we took it. I am sorry to say that I admit that contention, although I do not think it will help his argument very much. I may say in explanation of the groans with which the name of Sir Bartle Frere was greeted that he is regarded here as a man who has done more harm and shed more blood than any living man. And when I am told of the few lives rescued from the car of Juggernaut I wonder how many thousand people hav been offered up as sacrifices to the war-god to please Sir Bartle Frere. The change is indeed alarming since Christianity first made its way into India. Before then the nativs "had reared cities larger and fairer than Saragossa or Toledo, and buildings more beautiful and costly than the Cathedral of Seville. They could show bankers richer than the richest firms of Barcelona or Cadiz; viceroys whose splendor far surpassed that of Ferdinand the Catholic; myriads of cavalry and long trains of artillery which would hav astonished the Great Captain" (Macaulay's Essays, p. 502).

Instead of persecution, as put by Mr. Hatchard, Mr. Torrens draws the following picture: "Neither Moslem nor Hindoo was incapacitated for public employment on account of the belief in which he had been brought up. Mohammedan princes gladly confided to learned and astute Brahmans civil trusts of importance; and many a Mussulman rose to honor and won fortune in a Maharajah's camp. . . . The governments of southern Asia, when we began to meddle in their affairs, were strangers to the system of penal laws which were then among the cherished institutions of our own and nearly every other European state. While no Catholic in Ireland could inherit freehold, command a regiment, or sit on the judicial bench; while in France the Huguenot weaver was driven into exile beyond the sea; and while in Sweden none but Lutherans could sit as jurors, and in Spain no heretic was permitted Christian burial—Sunis and Sheahs, Mahrattas and Sikhs, competed freely for distinction and profit in almost every city and camp of Hindostan" (Torrens' Empire in Asia).

In order to strengthen that, I read again in the Quarterly Review: "Philip IV. and our own Elizabeth were the contemporaries of Akber; and while Europe was convulsed and desolated with the wars which arose out of the Reformation, India reposed in unexampled prosperity under the tolerant sway of her Mussulman autocrat. While Philip was extinguishing the last embers of industry and commerce in Spain by the unremitting persecution of Morisco, Jew, and heretic, and waging the most sanguinary warfare against the civil and religous liberties of the Low Countries, Akber was endeavoring to blend, under one peaceful and equitable government, the discordant elements of the vast Indian population" (Vol. lxviii).

We hav not only introduced Christianity, but we hav driven the people to a misery that they never knew in the old days. Hear the words of Mr. Phillimore: "There is no spot of the earth where all that is necessary for the support of its inhabitants is raised with more facility. . . . Spices, grain, indigo, sandalwood, opium, pepper, vegetables, and fruit are equally abundant. Sugar, though it requires more labor, can be raised with the same success. The cattle, though small, and yielding little milk, more than compensate by their numbers for their want of strength. Fish swarm in the rivers, the woods are full of game. . . . When we seized upon this land, the overflowing of its soil fed distant regions" (History of England during the reign of George III., vol. i). [The quotations were read from "England, India, and Afghanistan."]

Now these people die of starvation by hundreds and by thousands. Christianity has indeed progressed to a remarkable and alarming extent. But I am told that the persecutions I allege are the effect of what is called Christianity, and not of true Christianity. I can only judge the tree by its fruits. I only know that every Christian church did persecute; there was nothing to choose between one and another; and I say that wherever you get religion there you get persecution; wherever you get religion sincere, there you will hav persecution. Persecution is less to-day because Freethought is so widely spread that even Christians themselvs are not sure of the eternal damnation of the heretic, and they do not like to burn him. But the suttee is abolished, we are told. The suttee has been very much exaggerated; Abbe Dubois has told us that out of a population of thirty millions only about thirty widows a year committed suicide in that way. But I ask, are there not in every Christian country more suicides in one single month than you find in a year by this Indian suttee?

I put one other point. Mr. Hatchard admits that other religions hav gone wrong, and I agree with him. Christianity, however, claims to be what no other religion is, the revelation of an almighty God, and I urge that it is no excuse for its errors to say that it has done no worse than the other religions of the world hav done. It will be my duty in my last speech to sum up the various points which my opponent has not dealt with, but I should like him to deal with that remarkable argument from Strauss which I read to him. My fifth allegation is that Christianity has not succeeded in purifying morals, that it has not insured their purity. I am glad, however, to be able to say that the Christian scriptures are not, on the whole, as bad as Christian practice; the New Testament, at least, does not teach gross vice, although very faulty morality, but the influence of Christianity has not insured purification of morals. I know that it is urged that although Greece and Rome were great intellectually, they were very bad morally. Could not exactly the same be said of Paris and London to-day? It is not enough to say that they were bad, unless you can prove that you hav made things better. Christianity has utterly failed to improve upon the morality of paganism on most points, and while it sinks far below it in intellect, it does not rise above it in morals. I admit that in Plato's republic there is a community of women, a thing of which I utterly disapprove. But I might very fairly urge that there is plenty of authority in the Bible for the foulest polygamy.

Let us see what was the condition of society after 400 years of Christianity. Salvian, a Christian minister, writes: "Who is there," he asks with honest indignation, "who is not rolling in the mire of fornication? And what more? What I am about to state is grave and mournful. The very church of God, which ought in all things to please God, what does it but provoke him to anger? With the exception of a very few, who fly from vice, what is almost every Christian congregation but a sink of vices? For you will find in the church scarcely one who is not either a drunkard, or a glutton, or an adulterer, or a fornicator, or a ravisher, or a robber, or a manslayer, and, what is worse than all, almost all these without limit. I put it now to the conscience of all Christian people, whether it be not so that you will barely find one who is not addicted to some of the vices and crimes I hav mentioned; or rather, who is it that is not guilty of all? Truly, you will more easily find the man who is guilty of all than one who is guilty of none" (Miall's Memorials of Early Christianity, pp. 366-367). That is the purity of morals which was insured by Christianity after four centuries of work. It is extremely useful to us that Christians hav quarreled as much as they hav, for it is from the mouth of a Christian who wants to do away with Episcopacy and to prove that the early church was not perfect that I am able to bring you this very valuable testimony on my side of the argument.

Again, let us see what Mosheim says of the third century: "Many were sunk in luxury and voluptuousness, puffed up with vanity, arrogance, and ambition, possessed with a spirit of contention and discord, and addicted to many other vices" (p. 73). That is the Christian historian on the church even in the third century. And shall I not find in the middle ages that vice was literally everywhere? Shall I not find, if I want to discover the very worst characters, I must go to the center of the Christian church, to Rome under the rule of the popes? Shall I not find that the priests encouraged the people to commit crime by the sale of indulgences, by virtue of which they could do whatever their passions led them to do with impunity? Shall I not find that the first movement toward a purer morality came from those very heretics whom they put to death? There was no difficulty in the way of the sin, because there was no difficulty in the way of the forgivness; and the Christian doctrin of the New Testament has entirely destroyed the chance of stopping sin. By the gifts of the sinners the church grew wealthy. Every day brought riches to them. You find that the riches of the church are made up by the riches which came from the death-bed when men tried to buy their way to heaven; the Roman Catholic opened heaven's gate with a golden key. Later, the Protestant used the key of the blood of Christ, to be had for the asking; and so you find that Christianity did not insure purity of morals, because it did not teach that crime was unpardonable, because it taught that however wrongly you acted you might easily escape punishmeut from God by giving something to his priests before your last hour came.

MR. HATCHARD.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies, and Gentlemen: Mrs. Besant has thrown out some very bold challenges. I proceed as briefly as I can to answer one or two of them. She has drawn you a very black picture indeed of what the church was in what I call the middle ages. But the unfortunate thing is that I perfectly agree with her, because I was taught the same thing in a theological college. Let me ask you another question. During the dark ages, as they are called, when the people were many of them very profligate, and I regret to say that many of the clergy were not much better—I say, where were the scriptures, and whose was the New Testament? I do ask you most distinctly to carefully read over some good ecclesiastical history. There are a great many small histories which you can easily buy, if you do not care to read the large work of Mosheim, as Mrs. Besant has done. You will find this unless I am greatly mistaken. As the ages rolled on from the time of Christ, say to that of Constantine—take the year 325, the Council of Nice—gradually it appears to me that the Bible was laid aside, the people were very little acquainted with it, and we to-day cannot understand the ignorance of the clergy of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The truth is that when Martin Luther found the Bible, and read it, it was like a revelation to him. The New Testament, as far as the intelligence of the people was concerned, was non-existent. Now, therefore, it appears to me that true religion—such as we read in the New Testament—gradually declined during the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh centuries, and so on, over a large part of Europe.

Curiously enough, learning died out in Europe in the same way. With the rise of Christianity in the earliest times there was a new school of Greek learning; but, as the ages rolled on, curiously enough true religion died out; I freely admit it; and gradually it seems that learning died out as well; and curiously enough again at the Reformation they came back at the same time; at least, that is my version of it. I hav here "The Life of Leo X." I learn here that learning and true religion—that is, New Testament religion—came in together. I am surprised that Mrs. Besant brought in the Epistle of Paul to Philemon. What do I find here? I read in the sixteenth verse, with regard to sending this slave or servant back again, these words: "Receive him not now as a servant, but above a servant, a brother beloved, specially to me, but how much more unto thee." This man, the poor, broken-down slave, who fled to the Apostle Paul for refuge, was sent back to his master, not simply as a slave to be crushed and beaten and trodden down, but as a beloved brother to be treated well, honestly, and kindly. I hold in my hands a book which I dare say Mrs. Besant knows well, "The Education of the Human Race," by Lessing. Of course I don't put Lessing forward as orthodox by any means whatever. Lessing has been discussing the education of the world and the various systems of the world. I hold myself that the human race has been educated—educated in the same way as you educate a child—and Lessing here says: "A better instructor must come and tear the exhausted primer from the child's hands. Christ came! That portion of the human race which God had willed to comprehend in one educational plan, was ripe for the second step of education. He had, however, only willed to comprehend on such a plan one which by language, mode of action, government, and other natural and political relationships, was already united in itself" (Education of the Human Race, pp. 46-47, ed. 1858). And then he goes on to discuss Christianity.

My version of it is this, that the world in various ways, by modes of government, by systems of philosophy or science so-called, educated itself up to a certain point. Christ came into the world, and when he came he made a moral change, or rather, the beginning of a change; because Christianity has not effected a violent revolution in the world and a violent change. I am not afraid of any comparison between Jesus of Nazareth and Buddha. It is only those who don't know about Jesus and about Buddha who are afraid. I will come here some night and show you the difference and the relation. Jesus of Nazareth left his words upon the world in the minds of his disciples to produce fruit. In the early ages they did produce this fruit. Then, unfortunately for the world, the world disregarded them, till by and by, at the time of the Reformation, Martin Luther arose. There was John Wiclif, Jerome of Prague, and others, who helped the Reformation forward; and by and by there comes Martin Luther, and he was followed by a great number, as you well know, throughout Germany and throughout Europe, perhaps with the exception of Russia. You had this New Testament—the words of Jesus of Nazareth—again brought to the front, which our friend Strauss, in his "Life of Jesus" (of which I make Mrs. Besant a present), tried curiously enough to upset, but failed. Strauss was driven away completely out of the field by Neander and such-like writers. There is hardly a single thing which Strauss has put forward that even the very Freethinkers of to-day hav not given up. I say that Strauss as a power has died out. I made it my business to inquire of one of the best German houses, a publishing firm, as to what was the influence of Strauss in Germany now. They told me that Strauss was practically dead, that only those who put forward Strauss-and-water—i. e., Strauss disguised—had any influence with the public.

I proved to you beyond dispute and against the cavil of all the Freethinkers in Europe, Strauss included, that Jesus of Nazareth, the Jesus of the gospels, actually lived as a historical character; that the gospels and epistles are substantially a true account of what he said and did; and in consequence of the teaching of the early Christian teachers, that Christian churches were established in the East certainly and in a large part of the Roman empire. By the teaching of these disciples and Christian teachers a great moral change was effected. Now, then, I say most distinctly, and I wish you not to go away from thisplace and forget it, that I don't stand here to-night to defend persecution. I also say distinctly I know some little of what such men as Professors Huxley and Tyndall put before the public, and I hav yet to learn that there are any real contradictions between the highest science as taught by these men and Christianity as taught in the New Testament.

Mrs. Besant is, I hav no doubt, sincere in the view she has taken of Christianity, and which she has published to the world in her books and various writings. But I say she has drawn you one picture to-night—the picture which you Freethinkers most like to hear—but I stand here to paint the other picture, that there is no real contradiction between the highest science as taught in the present day and true religion as taught in the New Testament. I deny emphatically that the highest intellects are against religion. I ask who is Professor Owen? Who is Dr. Carpenter of the London University? Dr. Carpenter believes as much as I believe in the historical existence of Jesus of Nazareth, and also that Jesus of Nazareth was the teacher which I put before you last week.

Ladies and gentlemen, answer me this if you can. You Freethinkers are indebted to Christian scholars for the very knowledge that you hav of the Bible, and of its past history in Europe during the last eighteen centuries; and it is out of the armory of Christianity that you hav got the weapons that you hav turned against me.

Mr. Mair in Error.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. Mair has got himself into another hole. Shall I call it a Mair's nest? He says he has a book entitled "Natural History of Religion; or, Youth Armed Against Infidelity and Religious Errors," and that it is written by Robert Taylor, author of the "Diegesis," after he became reconverted to Christianity. The book is "By the Rev. R. Taylor, Curate of Hart, in the county of Durham, and author of the 'Key of Knowledge and Nature' (London 1832)."

It is an abridgment of a larger work then unpublished, and evidently the fruit of many years' study. Robert Taylor the Infidel never recanted, so far as I can learn, but in consequence of a quarrel with Mr. Carlyle he ceased to preach Infidelity, and having married a lady of wealth he retired to France, where he spent in tranquillity the remainder of his years. This was soon after his release from his second imprisonment in 1829, when he wrote his masterly work, the "Diegesis." So far as is known he wrote no work afterward. I suspect that in marrying a wealthy woman he agreed to be silent on theology; and I further suspect that being impecunious in spite of his great success as a lecturer and author, his marriage was a bribe to silence him.

His lectures were reported and sold by the hundred thousand, but probably he derived little or no profit therefrom.

His "Diegesis" is full of newly-discovered facts, and though it has been denounced by Christians (and, I am sorry to say it, by some Infidels) its main positions cannot be refuted. And I undertake to say that it contains no essential errors of fact.

Mr. Mair says Godfrey Higgins was "an imaginativ, credulous old English gentleman." He was a worthy magistrate, and died suddenly at the age of sixty-two, just after completing the two volumes of the "Anacalypsis," upon which he bestowed twenty years of study and research, averaging nearly ten hours a day. He frequently quotes largely from "the learned and ingenious Deist, the Rev. Robert Taylor," who, he says, has superseded him in one part of his work, to wit, about the Essenes.

The "Bible in India," by Jacolliot, has been denounced by Professors Max Muller and Fiske as a "disgraceful piece of charlatanism." But Jacolliot's chief Catholic opponent in Paris says it is written "with good faith, of absorbing interest, a learned work on known facts, and with familiar arguments." Ten years' residence and study in India surely ought to hav fitted Jacolliot to know more about Indian antiquities than college professors in England or America. Jacolliot is still writing in Paris, and his volumes number over twenty. In one of them, "Les Fils de Dieu" (The Sons of God), he professes to prove by astronomical records that Brahmanism existed fifteen thousand years ago, and that Christna was born 4,800 years before Christ and died 4,760 B.C. ANTICHRIST.

Paine Celebration at Linesville, Pa.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: To cheer the brotherhood of Freethinkers wherever they may be, I send the following notice of a Paine celebration which was brought to a close in this place on Monday night, Jan. 31, 1881. The celebration was of three days' duration, and was closed with a grand ball, in which over seventy couples participated. The principal speakers were Mrs. H. S. Lake, who is temporarily located at Port Jervis, N. Y.; Moses Hull, of Boston; W. F. Jamieson, of Chicago; and Rev. A. A. McMaster, a Universalist minister who is fast outgrowing the trammels of his church.

The celebration was in every way a great success. The attendance was as large as could be accomodated with seats in the largest hall in the place, and the last evening every foot of standing-room was taken and scores went away unable to get inside the hall.

Mrs. Lake gave great satisfaction here. It is hardly too much to say that she completely captured the heads and hearts of the whole Freethought community. Mrs. Lake can tear down and she can build again. She can set forth the true as well as expose the false. An effort will be made to hav Mrs. Lake come this way again.

Messrs. Hull and Jamieson convinced all that they are in their proper place in life, doing much good in agitating thought, which is the beginning of wisdom. Mr. Hull had never been here before, and he surprised our people by his wit and daring genius.

Mr. McMaster did some good work in the meeting by his onslaught on the orthodox hell, and by showing that some parts of the Bible at least could not possibly be true. Mr. McMaster formerly preached in this place, and has many friends here who were delighted to hear him; but there are a few Universalist bigots here who giv him the cold shoulder because he is man enough to avow his honest convictions and come out on a free platform and take a step in advance of some other Universalists. Shame on such bigots! for while they do not enter themselvs, they will not permit others to enter, like they of old.

Several Christians took some part in the meetings and did what little they could to uphold the great myth of the past eighteen hundred years. These zealous gentlemen succeeded in but one thing, and that was in increasing the attendance at each session.

Friends of mental liberty everywhere, let the success that has attended organization at Linesville be an encouragement to you. Six years ago six women and their husbands, or the other way if you like it better, six men and their wives, met in a gunsmith's little shop and agreed to organize a Liberal League in this place. It was accordingly done, and now we hav some fifty-five members, representing as much moral worth, brains, and cash as any church in the place. We rent a hall, hav it furnished with our own furniture, pay our rent in advance, own a set of dishes to use at our suppers and festivals, hav a balance of over one hundred dollars in the treasury for future lectures and activ work. Our League is unanimous in standing by the National Liberal League, in whose support I hope something will be done the present month.

Messrs. Hull and Jamieson are holding a discussion on Spiritualism and Materialism this week. I hear the opinion expressed that the one who speaks speaks last will win the discussion, so evenly do they seem to be matched. The good that will come of it is in the agitation of the subject. G. W. B.

Thomas Paine.

CELEBRATION IN ST. JOSEPH, MO.

The Turn Verein Society and St. Joseph Liberal League duly celebrated the 144th Anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine, the real savior of man, at Turn Hall, on Saturday evening, Jan. 29, 1881.

Owing to the sudden thaw, which produced a great slush, there was only about seventy-five gentlemen in attendance.

The Morning Herald gave a report which was very fair and manly, and a great improvement upon any notice that we could get a few years ago.

The Gazette, of this city, also gave a very fair notice, and contained a well-written and learned editorial on the morning of the 29th of January. So likewise did the Herald.

These facts show conclusivly how rapidly Freethought is directing the public opinion of this country. Priestcraft is melting away like fog before the morning sun. The audience was well pleased with Mr. Remsburg. Yours, P. V. WISE.

A "Terribly Wicked Man."

Scene—The post-office in Mount Vernon, Ohio.

Dramatis personæ—Two pious citizens and the reporter waiting for the mail to be changed.

1st P. C.: "Jim Irvine is dead."

2d P. C.: "Indeed! That is sudden. What ailed him?"

1st P. C.: "Well, you see, he drove out to his farm last Sunday, caught cold, and now you see the result."

2d P. C.: "I reckon it was a judgment on him. There is never any good comes of Sabbath-breaking. It will be a hard blow on his family. Jim was a terribly wicked man. He has not been inside of a church for years."

1st P. C.: "Yes, that is too true. But more people than Jim's family will miss him."

Getting interested at this point, I ventured to remark: "You say that Mr. Irvine was terribly wicked. In what did his wickedness consist? Did he abuse or fail to provide for his family?"

2d P. C.: "Oh, bless your soul, no! He was good to his family, but—but he swore terribly."

Reporter: "Did he cheat his creditors?"

2d P. C.: "No, indeed. No one can say that Jim cheated him, if he did know how to make money. When it comes down to principle, Jim had more of it than many better men, and it's a pity he never joined the church."

Rep.: "I understand he was wealthy. Did he ever oppress or distress the poor?"

1st P. C.: "Not he. He was really kind-hearted, and no poor man ever went to Jim in distress that was turned away empty. But he didn't believe in heaven, hell, God, or the devil."

Rep.: "By your own account he was a kind, upright, honorable, and benevolent man, and his death a loss to society. Then how can it be that he was so terribly wicked?"

1st P. C.: "Well, you see, for a man of his wealth and influence, it was an awful thing for him to set such an example of unbelief."

Here, Mr. Editor, you hav the difference between church morality and Infidel morality.

Yours for the latter, REPORTER.

The Late Charles H. Phelps.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am instructed by the Rochester Liberal League to send you the inclosed slip cut from the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle, with request for publication in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Respectfully yours,
A. E. TILDEN, Sec. R. L. L.

The following resolutions were passed by the Liberal League of Rochester, January 31, 1881:

WHEREAS, We learn through the public press, and more specifically from THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 22d instant, that Chas. H. Phelps died in the prison hospital at the Albany Penitentiary on the 11th instant, of consumption induced by cruel and inhuman exposure during a confinement of about six years for an offense justly meriting imprisonment, and after having endured great mental as well as physical suffering for the single error of an otherwise unblemished life and character, and after having been denied a pardon by the governor of the state of New York upon petitions and requests that rendered such pardon eminently proper and reasonable; therefore,

Resolved, By the Liberal League of Rochester, that the refusal of the governor to exercise the executiv clemency invested in him, in the case of Charles H. Phelps, thus denying him the consolation of passing to another world amidst the kind attentions and loving care of a faithful wife and sincere friends, was impolitic, unwise, inhuman, unreasonable, and an act that the true historian of the present age should denounce in like explicit terms.

Resolved, That such refusal justly characterizes the executiv deficient in one of the best and most ennobling phases of humanity, a wise and considerate sympathy which should form a prominent element in the character of the governor of this or any other state in whose hands the pardoning power and the liberty of the citizens are placed for wise and humane purposes.

Resolved, That it is a sad comment on the civilization of the nineteenth century when we feel impelled to believe that death, to many a dreaded monster whose icy touch will paralyze in time the unfeeling heart of the state's highest official as well as the misguided subject of these resolutions, was to him more kind, considerate, and humane in opening the prison door than was the titled functionary that sought to keep it closed; and we hope that he may never be compelled to feel that the measure he meted to Charles H. Phelps has been measured to him in return; and we commend to him this proposition as a safe guide to all his future executiv action: "In all things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them."

Resolved, That the kindest sympathies of the members of this League are hereby tendered to the widow and friends of the deceased, and that a copy of these resolutions be presented to her, and to the press for publication.

AMY POST, Pres.,
A. E. TILDEN, Sec.

MRS. H. S. LAKE, who is re-engaged by the Port Jervis League for the month of February, would like to make engagements in New York, Pennsylvania, or Vermont for the months of March, April, and May. Address her at Port Jervis, N. Y.

The Latest from Jahveh.

A REVELATION GIVEN SEP. THE 5TH, 1881, TO D. M. BENNETT.

Behold; Verily, Verily, Saith the Lord your God nnto you D. M. Bennett I am the Lord God who hath commanded this Revelation to be written that you may know the Lord liveth who hath created all things which hath been created even from the beginning of the world. Wherefore I the Lord God command you to repent for I am angry with those who keep not my commandments which are written in the holey Bible. Nevertheless I the Lord forgive those who repent of there evel deeds and do them no more, but if they repent not, and continue to do evel they shall not enter into the Kingdom of God. Behold Verily, thus Saith the Lord to you D. M. Bennett if you will repent and keep my commandments the Spirit of the most high Shall rest upon you and you shall be a mighty insterment in my hands for the acomplishment of a great and marvelous work in thease days which I have already commensed to performe. Verily I say unto you those who claim to be Christions have not kepe my commandments therefore mine anger is kindeld against them and if they repent not they shall be cast into a lake of fire and brimstone to suffer eternal punishment whare they will be constantly tormented by the Devel who hath power over them. For they contend one aganst the other when neath of then are right. And they testefy of me when they know know not the truth Therefare I will pore out my spirit upon th ungodly and cause them to set an example for those who call themselves Christions. Fore Behold the time is at hand when all Churches shall become as not, and even th Infidel shall be honerable before me Saith the Lord, and I will cause him to speak th truth and contend against the Churches that they may reseve th truth from those who hath no Faith in me. Verily I say unto you Robt G. Ingersall is a mighty instrament in my hands for He boldly declairs the truth allso Kersey Graves, and Thomas Paine, have boldly declaird the truth to the Churches who profess to be Christions but are not. Therefore I the Lord God will cause destruction to come upon the Churches untill there shall not be one left upon earth except thy reseve commandments from me, to restore a perfect knoledg to the inhabetents of Earth of the things pertaining to eternal Salvation.

Union, Utah. A. A. TANNER.

[We are much obliged to Jahveh, as we presume we should be, for his remembrance of us off here in this benighted city, where we are trying to do about as well as we know how, though we cannot more than half believe that Jahveh wrote the above. We are inclined to think it is more Tanner than Jahveh. But then it sounds rather natural, a good deal as Moses used to talk for him, and probably with about the same amount of truth. The "verily, verily" sounds very familiar. Why should not Tanner talk for Jahveh just as much as Moses, Solomon, or Joseph Smith? He is out there in Utah where Jahveh for twenty-five years has been in the habit of coming down and getting the prophet Brigham and brother Heber to talk for him. Possibly brother Tanner may hav come into possession of a little piece of the prophet Brigham's mantle. If, however, Jahveh did write the above communication, we would say he is not well enough up in spelling and capitalization to obtain a certificate to teach in a good country school. We would just observe for Jahveh's benefit that p-o-r-e does pretty well when used as a noun for the very small apertures through the skin, but when used as a verb indicativ of emptying out the fluid contents of a vessel, it will not quite do. Probably it has been a good while since Jahveh went to school. We would advise him, between his other odd jobs, to pay a little attention to spelling and grammar.

It is gratifying to learn that he is at last beginning to hav a just appreciation of Christians as well as Infidels, and that the former stand a good chance to "catch it" in the next world when the "devel" fully gets his own. We shall in that day shout, with a loud voice, "Go it, Splitfoot! giv those pious hypocrits a good warm corner!"—ED. T. S.]

He Wants to be a Mason.

It is pretty well known that Comstock has been very anxious for six months or more to gain admittance to the order of Masons. He seems not fully content with the backing which the Christian church affords, and to increase his power and the number of supporters, he wishes to become a Mason. About half a year ago he made application to one of the Brooklyn lodges of Masons, but some of the members deemed him a man not honorable enough for that order, and he was blackballed. According to the rules of the fraternity, he could not make application again until after a lapse of six months. He has now made application again and to another lodge. Committees hav been appointed to look up his record and see if the Masons can afford to saddle themselvs with such a load. They are learning that the man bears a very unenviable character, and it is doubtful if it will be deemed advisable to take him into fellowship. It is very sure that by doing so they will not increase their own respectability. If masonry has to be saddled with all the iniquities of Comstock it will hav a heavy load indeed. The following is from Truth:

AMBITIOUS ANTHONY.

To the Editor of Truth: It appears that Mr. Anthony Comstock is a very activ man in certain walks of life, for which he may thank his backers, probably. He has chosen his vocation and should be contented to follow it without attempting to drag into his service an ancient and honorable society, as he is doing in his attempts to gain admission to the order of Free Masons. He was rejected last year, and has renewed his application this, but to another lodge. There can be only one motiv in his seeking to enter the lodge, which is to use its good name as a means of introduction in his business of spy, informer, deceiver, and defamer. His work may be necessary to a certain extent, and in the hands of an upright, conscientious man, omitting the two latter items, would only benefit society, but when it is prostituted to the uses of private vengeance or self-glory the injury is unquestionable and extensiv. It is to be hoped that the fraternity of Free Masons will not hav this extra load to carry. The police are alive to the attempt he is making to get additional powers for mischief-making in his proposed bill at Albany, and some of them consider it would work a usurpation of their duties, and be a threatened danger to individual liberties, especially as Comstock is backed up by a religious society which cannot be trusted with powers that rightfully belong to the police. CAUTION.

Comstock's Show.

[Comstock & Colgate's vice society held their annual meeting on the evening of the 15th inst. The following appeared in one of our dailies of the 14th:]

We are in receipt of the following invitation, accompanied by tickets of admission for "gentlemen only" to the meeting referred to, for which we hereby acknowledge our indebtedness to Mr. Comstock:

DEAR SIR: We again send our personal appeal to you, and bespeak your presence at our seventh annual public meeting, to be held in Association Hall, corner Twenty-third street and Fourth avenue, Tuesday evening, Feb. 15, 1881. The foes of purity and corrupters of our youth are massing their forces against the laws and the highest interests of the community. Laws are set aside and defied because of the lack of a healthy public sentiment. We seek to reach business men with the facts. Will you kindly assist us by distributing the inclosed tickets to your gentleman friends.

Very respectfully yours, SAMUEL COLGATE, President,
ANTHONY COMSTOCK, Secretary.

It would hav been less offensiv to our sensibilities had the invitation been signed by some other name than that of Samuel Colgate, who will be remembered as the head of the business house which some time ago mailed circulars containing a prescription for accomplishing an unlawful purpose—circulars such as are excluded from the mails under penalty of long imprisonment and heavy fine, and for the mailing of which more than one man has served a term between stone walls. Mr. Colgate was fortunately friendly with the United States District Attorney Woodford, who squelched the prosecution that was instituted, although his first assistant pronounced Colgate's act clearly criminal, in which he was sustained by the precedents created by Judge Benedict.

Nor do we like the inscription on the tickets, "For gentlemen only." But that we can pass, inasmuch as the tickets were prepared by Comstock, and it is not strange that his mind should hav become somewhat affected by the congenial occupation in which he has been so long engaged.

We shall, however, attend the meeting, for we should like very much to know who those "foes of purity and corrupters of youth" are that exist in consequence of a "lack of healthy public sentiment." It sounds very much to us like an insult to the community to thus intimate that any impurity or any corrupters of youth are sustained by public sentiment.

We shall take pleasure in presenting to our readers this new discovery of Comstock and Colgate.

[From Truth.]

Check for Comstock.

Tony Comstock has been lobying in Albany for his outrageous bill to confer upon the society he represents and its agents a power which would render it absolutely autocratic. To concede the privileges he claims of making arrests without warrant and irrespectiv of the courts or the police, and of putting the regularly constituted officials of the law under the orders of the society and its agents, would be to elect the single will of a private individual, whose past record is a strong indorsement of his irresponsibility, more potent than the law itself, whose violators are the excuse for his and his society's existence.

Fortunately for the public Tony Comstock does not enjoy the field by himself. A more disinterested reformer has a bill to provide for the clipping of this outrageous society's pinions instead of the expansion of them. Col. Murphy's measure requires that in cases where decoys hav been used to lead men into the commission of an offense against the laws in order to punish them, the evidence of the decoy shall not be received by our courts.

The logical reason for such a law is too evident to need any comment from us. But Tony Comstock does not view it in that light, and even Col. Murphy's liberal offer to help Comstock's bill along if he permitted Murphy's measure to be grafted on it met with by no means polite refusal. The Society for the Suppression of Vice has no use for such a law, or rather those who make their living off it hav none, for when it passes their occupation of leading men into temptation and delivering them over to evil will be at an end.

They can be spared, however. So the sooner Col. Murphy's bill becomes a law the better.

CEPHAS B. LYNN spoke again last Sunday before the Second Society of Spiritualists of New York. He was not, as much as on a former occasion, annoyed by the restlessness of some of the younger people in his audience. Humanity, he said, would outliv all the creeds and dogmas which had afflicted it. Spiritualism, as a religion, would go with Christianity, Buddhism, and the rest when its work was done. Immortality was a fact in nature, and not the property of any religious sect, though some sects claimed to be its sole proprietors, and offered it as a sort of spiritual chromo to such as would accept it at their hands and take their creed with it. This to Mr. Lynn seemed ridiculous.

"How," asked the speaker further on, "is crime to be abolished? How is a proper adjustment of wealth to be secured? How shall poverty and misery be relieved, and the kind amenities of friendship be made to bud and blossom in the ecstacy of love? Will the average Spiritualistic lecturer accomplish these results? Not much. Will the Christian minister do it? Far less. No, the legal scientist is the person we must look to. The coming man will be a lawyer, not an evangelist." The services were closed by the audience singing a selection from one of Charles Mackay's poems to the tune of "Auld Lang Syne."

Parker Pillsbury Down East.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Perhaps a word from "down East" may be acceptable to you and your readers.

Liberalism in its more extended sense has hardly yet taken root in the "Pine Tree state." I cannot hear that a League exists in any part of it. Antislavery of the Garrisonian type never flourished, excepting in Portland, Bath, and a very few other places. The Liberator was not much more patronized than is now THE TRUTH SEEKER, and some of our very fiercest proslavery mobs occurred in Portland. Of course the present activ and acting generation are not responsible for them; know little about them except as history, and the history of the country from 1830 to 1860, really, in some respects, our most heroic period, is little taught or read, and so very little known.

But I am sorry to say the woman suffrage problem finds almost as little favor here to-day as did antislavery thirty and forty years ago. This very week the Senate has passed adversely upon it, and doubtless will again next year and the next, and perhaps till some political party can prolong its power by the woman vote, as did the Democrats with the Hibernian and the Republicans, afterward with the emancipated Ethiopian.

Still, there are some liberal, noble-minded and large-hearted men and women here. I was invited to assist with an oration in a little observance on the 144th anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine, on the 29th of last month. Before crossing the New Hampshire border, our train was wrecked by the terrible snow-storm and tempest, detaining me from Saturday noon till Monday morning. On Sunday my fellow-passengers, learning of my destination and disappointment, asked if we might not hav the Paine address where we were. We were very comfortably quartered and cared for at a large farmhouse, and the family, one of whom is a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, uniting in the request and proposing to invite in the neighborhood, it came about that on Sunday evening we had a Paine celebration and oration in spite of the elements, and probably the first ever held in the "Granite state." And it was well approved, too.

On Monday I reached Portland, and on Wednesday evening delivered my lecture. That night brought a delegation from Cape Elizabeth, across the ferry, that could not hav come over on Saturday had I arrived. They were so well entertained that they invited me over to their town for the following Sunday. On that day I gave two Liberal lectures in the Union Hall, and on Tuesday evening following, by special request, I delivered my Paine oration, and the hall then, as on Sunday, was filled with appreciating and apparently approving audiences, and I think a Liberal League will very soon be organized here, as the first fruit of the labor so unexpectedly, accidentally, and, the good people might say, so "providentially" bestowed. PARKER PILLSBURY.

Self-Stultification.

A correspondent charged me with "malevolence" and "ill nature" toward Jefferson. I proved the charge baseless and false. His first duty, if he replied at all, would be to apologize for the injustice to me. Instead of that he assails me again in the same offensiv style. He professes to regret that I should "take offense at his attempt to correct my historical errors," when every reader of my article knows I hav made known. But conscious that it is himself who has blundered, he now pretends to say that the errors are "unimportant," and he wants "to let the matter drop." Well, why then didn't he drop it instead of going on to pettifog his case and cast further reflections on me? He tries to make me out a libeler of Franklin, Jefferson, and Paine, and in the same breath stultifies himself by squarely charging that "Paine told a foolish, useless lie" when he said he never published a syllable in England. His "Plea for the Exciseman," in 1772, was not published by himself, and "Common Sense" was indeed his first publication. But he knew that the style would betray the practiced writer; and in keeping the secret which Junius promised should perish with him, if he resorted to a little artifice to avert suspicion, how thoughtless for a professed admirer, how malevolent for a pretended defender of Paine, to characterize it as a "foolish, useless lie!"

W. H. B.

Paine Commemorated in Flint.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

Judging from myself, you and your readers will be glad to hear that we had a Thomas Paine celebration in Flint, Mich., Jan. 31st. It was an impromptu affair. We had but little time to think or do. The Lord or something else sent Bro. Burnham our way, and we were happy in securing his attendance. A few of us hurried up some decorations of flags, evergreens, and mottoes. "Reason before Faith," "Knowledge versus Superstition," "Liberty," "Justice," and "Truth" were among them; and over an ancient sword that served in the Revolutionary days we put an inkstand and quills, and surmounted it it with "The pen is mightier than the sword."

I opened the exercises by reading a poem dedicated to our hero, and then J. H. Burnham, of East Saginaw, entertained us with one of his stirring, logical, and important lectures, which was highly enjoyed by the large audience. Justice to him forbids me to attempt even a synopsis. In response to a call, I concluded the mental exercises by an impromptu poem. Then came a basket picnic and a dance. All seemed to enjoy themselvs. I don't see how they could help it. Michigan cooking givs any one an appetite. This is the first time the bright little city of Flint ever celebrated Paine's birthday, but I hope it will not be the last. Some Liberal books were sold by Mr. Royce, a well-known Liberal.

Go around the world, Bro. Bennett, if you can; and if you do I will take two of your books, to be paid for before you go.

"An Infidel Abroad" is superexcellent. All ought to read it for its solid information.

I am to be in Detroit and Flint two or three months longer, working for the melting away of creeds, that humanity may blossom.

And oh my, such a picture! It was taken by E. A. Chapman, the great artist and advocate of Spiritualism. The law givs me a two-third interest, and I hav bought her third interest and offer this magnificent picture for twenty-five cents, and should anybody want my picture they can hav it for ten cents. Spiritual and Liberal Convention.

The Michigan State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists will hold their annual convention at Fenton Hall, Flint, Genessee county, Mich., commencing on Wednesday, March 23, 1881, at 2 o'clock P. M., and continuing over Sunday. All speakers in the state and adjoining states are invited to be present. Also all mediums and all interested in the Spiritual and Liberal cause are invited.

Arrangements will be made for the accommodation and entertainment of all who attend at reasonable rates. Further notice will be given in due time.

LECTURE FRIDAY EVENING BY THOMAS CUSHING ON COSMOGONY.

The audience room of Science Hall, in Eighth st., near Broadway, was crowded to hear the celebrated lecturer, Thomas Cushing, upon his favorit subject, "Cosmogony."

The lecturer being introduced by Vice-President Wakeman and received cordially by the audience, said: "The science of geology has, within a comparativly recent period of time, become one of the branches in the curriculum of study in our higher institutions, and it is fast becoming a popular science. But, while people manifest a commeudable desire to become acquainted with the structure of the planet upon which they liv and its relations to other planets, many are satisfied with the statement, In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth."

Savans of different nations hav had different theories and hypotheses concerning the manner in which the work of creation was effected.

Some were imposed by priests upon the people, while others may hav been deduced from correct and extended observations.

The Chaldeans believed that originally all was darkness and water. The Persians were taught some vague notions by Zoroaster. The Celts of northern Europe were taught from their "Edda" that the universe was a chaotic mass in the beginning, and that their deity, "Odin," produced the planetary bodies.

Among the cosmogonies of the Greeks, that of Pythagoras is worthy of attention as stating the result of scientific observation, namely: "Nothing perishes, but things merely vary and change their form. To be born means that a thing begins to be something different from what it was before; and dying is ceasing to be the same thing. Yet, although nothing retains for a long time the same image, the sum of the whole remains constant."

Aristotle speaks of great changes occurring upon the surface of the earth as the results of natural agencies capable of effecting greater changes in the future than they hav in the past. He says: "The effect of the changes of the earth are lost in the immensity of ages. As time never fails and the universe is eternal, the Nile cannot hav flowed on forever. The place where it rises was once dry, and there is a limit to its operation, but there is none to time. Seas and rivers perish, deserting some lands and invading others, and everything changes in the course of time."

During the past time it is certainly possible that the sun's axis may hav changed so as to become slightly inclined to the plane of the elliptic. All these planets rotate upon their axes and their rotation is in the direction of their circuit around the sun and of the sun's rotation. It is hardly possible that upon any other hypothesis all these coincidences could hav occurred. From without, inward, the interplanetary spaces decrease in a tolerably regular ratio from 1,062,000,000 miles between Neptune and Urania to 31,000,000 between Venus and Mercury. The time required for the completion of the circuit of each planet around the sun decreases in the same direction in a similar ratio from 164 years; in the case of Neptune to eighty-eight days, the length of Mercury's year.

All the facts tend to confirm the idea that the nebular mass which formerly constituted the planetary system has steadily increased the rapidity of its rotary motion as it has cooled and contracted, and that in proportion to the rapidity with which this rotation has been accelerated has been the frequency of the separation from it of the planets.

The changes which await the planetary system in the infinit future are matters of speculation. It is believed that after the matter of this system shall hav been completely disintegrated and its heat entirely dissipated this heat will be reabsorbed and the matter redistributed, and that thus, during the future as in the past eternity, a ceaseless round or an infinit succession of transformations may take place.

The usual discussion upon the lecture was indulged in by members of the club, and the evening's entertainment was closed by the summing up of the lecturer.

Truth's Sunday Sermons.

Under this caption we commenced last week the republication of sermons from Bible texts as they originally appeared in Truth for Sundays. They hav attracted a good deal of attention by their boldness and vigor of style, and will be perused by the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER with decided pleasure. They will be continued from week to week.

The Temperance Question.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

I don't mean to trouble you and the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER too often with my communications, but would really like to say a few words on the question which has been discussed somewhat in the columns of our paper recently. I mean the drink question. I may not meet the views of many in taking the position on this question which I am about to do. However, I beg the forbearance and indulgence of all your readers, and will endeavor to be as brief in treating the question from my own standpoint as may be.

True temperance, as I view the matter, is not necessarily confined to the use or consumption of ardent spirits. I hav seen persons who had never, to my certain knowledge, used ardent spirits even in the minutest or more infinitesimal quantities, but who were what might be called very "heavy eaters." They reminded me somewhat of Dr. Johnson, the lexicographer, in their intemperate and inordinate consumption of "meat and drink." The learned doctor was not infrequently so much engrossed with the pleasures of the table, so I hav read, as to carry his indulgence therein to such an extent as to present the striking spectacle of one whose brow was bathed in perspiration, and displaying the veins of his forehead in such bold relief that they resembled small whipcords.

Yet I suppose a case of this sort would not, in the opinion of many, subject the party who so greatly over-indulged to the imputation of being a victim of intemperance. There seems to be a mistaken idea, which is quite prevalent, that intemperance simply means an inordinate, immoderate, and excessiv use of or indulgence in ardent spirits. But having lived many years, and having closely, carefully, and impartially considered this question, I am led to reply in the following terms, "Not so, friend Plutus." I honestly and candidly and truly believe that we can, any or all of us, become the victims of intemperance to a greater degree through inordinate indulgence in "the pleasures of the table" than in any other manner.

Ask any physician how large a percentage of his cases are due to this inordinate indulgence at the table, and I am sure you will be greatly surprised when he tells how completely these cases of illness due to over-indulgence in "bread and meat," and the other items which enter into the formation of the daily bill of fare, outnumber all other cases of malady. I am not speaking at random here. Where there is one person made sick by the excessiv use of "ardents," I believe the number of those whose sickness is caused by excessiv consumption of the articles which supply our tables is far greater. I think it is time for a new departure in the manner and method of treating the drink question.

Very truly, EDWIN H. BARTLETT.

The Foreign Press on the "Elements of Social Science."

"Though quite out of the province of our journal, we cannot refrain from stating that this work is unquestionably the most remarkable one, in many respects, we hav ever met with. Though we differ toto cœlo from the author in his views of religion and morality, and hold some of his remedies to tend rather to a dissolution than a reconstruction of society, yet we are bound to admit the benevolence and philanthropy of his motivs. The scope of the work is nothing less than the whole field of political economy."—The British Journal of Homœpathy, January, 1860.

"The motto of the work, 'The diseases of society can, no more than corporeal maladies, be prevented or cured without being spoken about in plain language' (John Stuart Mill), and its dedication to the poor and suffering, are sufficient to show the tendency of the author. He uses, indeed, a directness of expression, an outspokenness, which is seldom met with in our times, and will probably in most circles of so-called refined society be styled very shocking, if not cynical, though in reality it is not so. The author only calls by their names things which we medical men also hav to discuss openly among ourselvs and with patients, but which are treated by polite society according to the Parisian proverb, 'cela se fait, mais cela ne se dit pas.' The author, as appears from the title and from his professional knowledge, is a medical practitioner. He merits, therefore, the attention of his colleagues, the more so because, in the first place, they would scarcely guess from the title that this is a book for medical men; and, secondly, because his medical colleagues alone possess the education which permits them to estimate without prejudice the aims and efforts of the author, to try the truth of the facts which he lays down as premises, and, after due consideration, either to accept or reject, or to limit and amend, his conclusions and proposals. . . . The author's remarks on the social questions in general are among the best and most deeply-felt we hav ever read."—Schmidt's Jahrbucher der gesammten Medizin.]

Thought and Mind Elements.—An Appendix.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

Your able and interesting reply to my argument on "Thought and Mind," in The Truth Seeker of Jan. 8th, calls for a few corrections, and, as an appendix, I will present a few additional thoughts, so that in justice to myself I may not be left on the field entirely hors du combat. A combatant who has the pluck to renew the contest, even against heavy odds, should not be considered totally vanquished until he cries enough. You seem astonished that I should theorize in regard to thought and mind, and press most emphatically the claim that there are and can be no elements known to man that cannot be gathered, weighed, and exhibited in their substances, like oxygen, etc., etc.

You regard my suggestion or theories in regard to the existence of etherealized or spiritual elements in space, which may or may not, as the essence of matter, hav been evolved from it, and their being appropriated to the building up of mind as an entity in man, as very absurd indeed. All this you hav a perfect right to do, and so long as we both "keep good-natured," and earnestly seek to find and promulgate the truth, only good can result. Either man and the universe are dual in their nature, or they are not. If there is a positiv, there must be a negativ, and in all matter where we find the life forces activ, we find the positiv and negativ conditions; and if in seeking to harmonize with science that which in nature the Christians call God we are to be debarred from all facts and theories but what are fully demonstrated we might as well lock up our school-houses, return to superstition, "like the sow to its wallowing in the mire," and cease to struggle.

Really, I was not aware that the world had progressed to that point where theorizing is no longer in order. I was not aware that modern Materialism was so ironclad and rock-bound that it could entertain only those facts or theories already proved. Astronomers must no longer theorize about worlds they hav never seen. Copernicus and Galileo were out of order, or would be to-day, in declaring in theory that the world is round and that it moves. Columbus, and all such who theorize about what they hav not seen, weighed, and tested, only illustrate how extremely absurd it is to rely on facts not already absolutely proved. Newton, Franklin, Morse, and Fulton were fine examples of this unfortunate tendency to speculate and theorize. We are no longer to be permitted to theorize about light, heat, or any other of the supposed inponderable elements, or of the thousand and one theories which as yet are only partially demonstrated. If the world should adopt the plan of considering only those facts or theories which hav been fully demonstrated, progression would be hung up, like "Uncle Ned's" violin.

Really, friend Bennett, I would as soon go to the Christian's heaven and eternally shout hallelujah, and play on a little harp, and throw taffy at a conceited, selfish, cruel, vindictiv, lying, hell-and-devil-creating God, as to be deprived of this blessed privilege of free thought, free speech, and free theorizing about what the blood-washed call "the mysteries of godliness," etc.

I am not and cannot be satisfied with what is already known, and, like yourself, I must hav, not faith, but evidence that will satisfy my reason. We, as a race, hav but just begun to learn. We are surrounded on all hands by mysteries. The dark clouds of superstition, which for ages hav been red with the horrid fires of eternal damnation, are rapidly rolling away, and we are just beginning to discover what a glorious universe this is. Now, with our liberated reason, we may dare to search for even God himself. The church has preached "hands off" about as long as it can, and now it is the duty of every liberated mind to assist in solving the unsolved problems and mysteries that are all about us and that we are a part of. We ought to be ashamed that there is so much yet that we don't know; and if there is any one thing that will cause posterity to loathe and hate Christianity as the most blighting curse of all ages, it will be the fact that it taught the darkness of superstition instead of the light of knowledge; that we must throttle our reason and substitute in its stead the damning principle of faith; that all knowledge of all mysteries is to be looked for, not in nature, but in an absurd, unauthenticated old book of lies and obscenity, and that the author of the flames beneath and the stars above is a liar and a bloody, obscene, torture-loving demon. It is evidently our duty when we find facts which bear upon the mysteries of nature to use them in weaving theories, as men in the past hav done, and been reviled and persecuted for it too.

In regard to thought and mind, I do not, as you seem to think, claim absolutely that I am right, nor that I hav made any new discovery. I only say, to my mind, it appears so, or I believe thus and so, and endeavor to giv facts to prove it, hoping I may be furnishing a clew that will suggest to some other mind the true analysis of these great problems.

You object to my theory in regard to the absorption of mind elements on the ground that scientists hav not as yet recognized or classsed such among the primary elements. This, to my mind, is not a strong argument. It is an insinuation that scientists hav discovered it all and know all there is to be known. There may be more elements in the universe than hav as yet been discovered. It will not do to thus stick stakes and fix limits. If man is a dual being, then nothing can be more certain than that the physical is built up of the physical, and the spiritual from and out of the spiritual. This necessitates the existence of two realms—the physical and spiritual—which act upon each other and interblend so harmoniously that with our physical senses it is quite impossible to comprehend their existence and true relation to each other. Could we know absolutely the modifying influence of the invisible and imponderable realms of matter and intelligence today upon the visible, material world about us, we, I do not doubt, would be overwhelmed with astonishment. Think for a moment. Were it not for the action of light, not a single tint of color could be found throughout this earth. All vegetation would blacken and die. The flowers would lose their tints and the fruits their flavors. The earth, in a few hours, would become one vast charnel-house of death. All life would die; not a living thing would be found. And yet light is only the manifestation of the invisible ether, or something which cannot be gathered, weighed, or exhibited. Light is only the agitation or motion of the invisible ether. Light is the condition which compels the chemical union of the two realms, just as it does the union of elements upon the photographer's plate. With this grand exhibition of the harmonious interblending of the two worlds, which, like a beautiful carpet, is spread out all over this earth, how it is possible for intelligent men and women to fail to see and comprehend is a problem I cannot solve.

Scientific men are just beginning to investigate the forces and elements of the invisible realms. Who has not heard of England's Carpenter, and his silly explanation of the power and intelligence that produce spiritual manifestations? His explanation is "unconscious cerebration." Joe Cook calls it "psychic force." Others, "mind-reading," or "will-power." The preachers say, "It is the devil." All these theories, whether born of science or theology, exceed in absurdity any theorizing I hav been guilty of. The recent experiments and discoveries of Crookes, Zollner, and Buchanan ought to convince the world that there is a realm of undiscovered and heretofore entirely unknown elements all about us, and that only by exploring, investigating, and studying the elements of these realms can we ever hope to understand the marvelous phenomena which everywhere present themselvs.

Prof. Zollner, in the dedication of his "Transcendental Physics" to Mr. Crookes, says: "By a strange conjunction our scientific endeavors hav met upon the same field of light and of a new class of physical phenomena, which proclaim to astonished mankind, with assurance no longer doubtful, the existence of another material and intelligent world. As two solitary wanderers on high mountains joyfully greet one another at their encounter, when passing storms and clouds veil the summit to which they aspire, so I rejoice to hav met you, undismayed champion, upon this new province of science."

Would it not be wise to pause when such intellectual giants and representativs of science as Crookes, Wallace, Zollner, Buchanan, and Sargent talk about new and unexplored realms of science and new worlds of material and intelligence? It is a small matter to impeach the science of men of my caliber, but when by so doing you impeach the science promulgated by such men, it is quite another thing.

In your "reply" you say it is impossible for mind elements to exist as I hav claimed, because men of science hav never discovered them; they hav not been gathered, weighed, or exhibited; and if there is such an element, "it must be homogeneous, therefore birds, animals, and human beings ought to possess the same degree and kind of intelligence."

Now what I said about magnetism and electricity may hav been so interpreted, but I did not intend to say that the spirit world was made up of a homogeneous element. I said "magnetism and kindred elements" (kindred does not mean homogeneous) were gathered, stored away, and crystallized into mind or spirit organisms, and that thinking or thought was the law by which this is done, or by which the mind or spirit organisms are strengthened and built up. We certainly accumulate mind, or grow in intelligence, exactly in proportion to the amount of thinking we do. We can take our choice. We can, as we exercise the physical or intellectual, strengthen the body or the mind. It is evident that the body depends for its sustenance and strength upon physical elements and conditions, and the mind upon spiritual elements and conditions. It is true the mind while in conjunction with the body is compelled to work within certain environments or limits. It must do its thinking and manifest itself to a physical world with a physical brain. But because mind is an aggregation of spiritual elements is no reason for supposing that matter in the spirit world is homogeneous.

In a former article I said that worlds grow old, and that the spirit or essence of all the matter of which worlds are made pass out into the great reservoir of space. This being true, there must be as many elements imponderable in space as there are or were in those worlds when living. Of course, as matter givs up its life principle or elements, conditions cease. It therefore loses its attractiv power, and other younger and more vigorous worlds, where conditions of a more powerful nature exist, receive what once belonged to it. This will explain the wonderful results that are predicted from the coming perihelion of the planets. A line of attraction will be formed, and an interchange amounting perhaps to an equilibrium of the spiritual elements of the entire solar system will take place. The younger planets will receive from the older, and henceforth we, the inhabitants of the earth, will be breathing in and assimilating to a much larger degree than heretofore vitalizing elements far in advance of and superior to what hav hitherto been found belonging to this planet. The new impetus which earth's inhabitants, as well as all nature, will here receive will enable the race to cleanse its blood and slough off the horrid ulcers of ignorance, bigotry, and superstition at a much more rapid rate than now. A crisis is evidently at hand. It will be the end of a cycle, and if Mother Shipton had said cycle instead of the world, she would hav said just what was intended.

You deny that matter possesses spirit essence or parts with it, and especially do you deny that this essence can be attracted to and enter into other forms of life. You claim that all there is of life, force, mind, or spirit is generated from these bodies or created by the processes of digestion, assimilation, and combustion in the stomach, brain, and muscles. Combustion is disintegration, and cannot occur except by the aid of an atmospheric or spiritual element. Keep away the oxygen from your fires, and your coal and wood would be a long time burning. But this is not the combustion of thought. If a simple combination of elements by the process of combustion is all that occurs in the brain, then our stoves ought to think. "Perhaps," I hear you say, "they would if they had brains." Very well; throw a handful of brains into your stove, and see if you get thought as a result. Why not get together a lot of brains, bones, ligaments, muscles, blood, etc., and introduce a little combustion into the heap, and see what will result? If thought cannot be evolved, perhaps a little yeast and magnetism might induce assimilation and digestion, and then with combustion, your theory being true, a human soul ought to be evolved and to manifest itself by exhibitions of intelligence. Of course you may be right, and consequently I be wrong, about this union and harmonious interblending of the physical and spiritual, but I can not believe it. Let us look at nature and see what we find bearing on this question. It seems to me it needs but a glance over the broad fields of earth to prove that we are surrounded by an ocean of spiritual elements that are modifying these grosser forms in a great variety of ways. No human being has ever yet told what that substance is that tints the grass, the rose, the violet, or the lily. No human being has ever yet gathered, weighed, or exhibited it.

What scientist has ever gathered the aroma of the rose, peach, apple, pear, clover blossom, or hayfield, and classified them as primary or combinations of primary elements, and exhibited them? Likewise the flavors of the various fruits? What is it that causes the bitter, and what the sweet? although these latter I believe to be only conditions or modes of manifestation. Yet what is it? It is just as pertinent to ask. Shall we deny that these subtle elements exists because science has not yet been able to place them in its scales and weigh them? Where do these elements come from? Take a heap of dirt and subject it to the closest analysis, add all the elements ever used as manure or fertilizers, analyze it again, and nothing absolutely is found approximating in the remotest degree the odor of the rose. Analyze the air; nothing of the kind is found there. If science cannot find it by its rigid materialistic methods of analysis and tests, we must pronounce materialistic science a failure, and must look elsewhere. We will try Zollner's and Crooke's new science; and as it is claimed to be a step in advance, perhaps it will help us. Analyze the nutrition and fluids drawn from the soil by the plant, also every atom of the plant, shrub, or tree, and not a trace of the aroma of the flowers or the flavor of the fruits or color is found. Whence do they come? In my last letter I spoke of condition as playing a very important part in the economy of nature, and now let us see if it will not help us in solving this problem. If we can not find what we are looking after in the soil, in the elements drawn from the soil, or in the substance of the plant itself, we, as I said before, must look elsewhere. With that wonderful law of chemical affinity, of attraction and repulsion, and knowing that the positiv and negativ both attract and repel, we will now examin some of nature's work, and see if by so doing a little light may not be found that will bear upon this subject.

The great work accomplished by the vegetable world is to liberate oxygen and store away carbon.

Carbon, which if set free elsewhere is attracted, while oxygen is liberated and repelled, exactly the reverse of that performed by the animal kingdom. We attract and utilize oxygen and liberate carbon. So the two kingdoms, by the law of attraction and repulsion, mutually interchange elements and sustain each other. Does not this prove my theory true that we attract elements thrown off or evolved from other forms? Every atom of the fluids and solids which the plant draws from the soil must pass through the leaves or foliage. Plants breathe very like human beings, and the foliage is the lungs of vegetation. In the foliage the substances drawn from the soil become carbonized, so scientists of the old school would say, but the new science would hav it carbonized and spiritualized. Light, which is but the vibratory motions of the universal ether, is the all-important condition necessary to this breathing. Without this light the plants wither, fade, and die, simply because without light they cannot breathe. While, then, the substances drawn from the soil are passing through the leaves, those not liberated are exposed not only to air elements, but also light elements. Right here is the great mystery, and right here it must be solved, for nowhere else in the whole history of the plant do we find a single clue to the origin or cause of colors, odors, or flavors, etc.

If elements from the air are attracted and utilized, hav we not just as good reason for declaring that elements drawn from the universal ether are also utilized? If the carbon of the world is drawn from the air, where do the colors and odors come from? It seems that light is just as necessary as air, and light is only the vibrations of the universal ether, which, by its varying law of vibrations, exhibits all the tints and colors of the spectrum. At this point new and needed elements are taken on, or breathed in, while those that are no longer needed are expelled. What is it that under the vitalizing or quickening power of light is here done?

If plants could liv and breathe and grow without the aid of light, we might then conclude that only air elements are needed. Here then is the presence and action of an etherealized element that is just as essential as air. If the action of the light element is as essential as air, then we must conclude that spiritual or etherealized elements enter into the combination. This then solves the problem as to where the colors, perfumes, etc., etc., of the plant come from.

With this view, friend Bennett, am I not justified in speaking of "the great reservoir of spiritual or mind elements?" If the universal ether which fills all space contributes of its elements to sustain and build up life forms on the planetary bodies, as it undoubtedly does, I hav certainly proved my theory true. It may be claimed that light is a manifestation belonging to the visible and material universe. Granted. For precisely the same reason, I shall claim that spiritual manifestations belong to the invisible and material, for they originate the same as light in the realms beyond. In order to hav light we must hav a universal ether, and we should never hav suspected the existence of such an element had it not been for its mode of manifesting itself, which is by light, imparting not only vitality but odors, colors, and flavors to material forms.

It is claimed, and with good reason, that the coal beds are, to a large extent, the sunlight of past ages. Already the world is being supplied with all the flavors of fruits and the perfumes of flowers distilled from the coal. This again proves my theory true that elements are drawn from the great reservoir of spirit-matter. The wonderful discovery has been recently made that sound will travel on and with a beam of light; that wherever a beam of light can be sent or received there sound may be conveyed and messages be sent far exceeding in rapidity and ease any system of telegraphy ever before invented. If light may be made the vehicle of sound, may not other properties and phenomena equally as marvelous attend this wonderful element? Who has not observed that every leaf or blade of grass terminates in a delicate point? These undoubtedly are electrical points, which gradually dispense the magnetism or electricity that is liberated by the grinding processes of nature's mill. Could we behold from every tree top, shrub, blade of grass, and flower the streams of etherealized elements that are passing off into space with these physical eyes as we behold the grosser forms of matter, language would be inadequate to express our admiration and wonder. Go out in the morning and examin the hoar-frost. Millions of little crystals shoot up from every point and surface. They are electrical points which nature has improvised for a purpose. Wherever a frost crystal is formed there a jet of magnetism or kindred elements hav shot off into space. This being true, what a mighty load of etherealized matter this old earth is constantly yielding up! These liberated elements undoubtedly return again and again—perhaps hav traveled these circuits out of one form into another since the earth begun millions of times, and what is the result? Every circuit that is traveled undoubtedly marks one in the progressiv scale of matter. As the essence of matter becomes, by these processes, more and more refined and etherealized, higher and higher forms of life spring into existence, and finally it becomes so highly refined and endowed with life principles that it is possible for creatures with souls to be "molded and fashioned" out of them.

Man, in the earlier ages of this earth, was not found, because the elements out of which to make his mind had not yet been evolved and perfected. This may be a seeming contradiction to what I hav elsewhere stated that mind or soul elements are drawn from the great reservoir of spirit. I hav never said I thought all of mind entity is constituted of elements drawn from the great universal reservoir. There must be such a combination of elements that the soul will eternally be recognized as a child of this earth. The spirit of matter, as it is evolved from the rocks, is ever reaching out after its affinity in space, and the fruit of the union is new forms, new life, and added energy, power, and beauty.

I certainly believe the evolving of mind elements or intelligence to be not only the principal part but the most interesting part of the great book of evolution; and those who ignore the existence and evolution of these elements are as foolish as Christians, who are content to feed on the shucks of faith. It would be well if Materialists, instead of denying these wonderful truths, would turn Spiritualists and investigate this "new science" for themselvs. Perhaps a little inspiration, under proper conditions, from those despised spirits would quicken their faculties, and they be enabled to see the truth as others do and as it is.

I will now close by giving one more theory, which I regard as pertinent to this discussion. I believe this earth is destined to become a sun, likewise all of our sister planets. I believe there are magnetism, electricity, and other kindred elements in and about this earth, both activ and latent, enough, when liberated and activ, to produce a sun as brilliant as the sun that illuminates this earth to-day.

In the auroral and magnetic displays we already hav the beginning of a self-illuminating atmosphere. Jupiter is already beginning to giv light of its own, and the time is not far distant when this system will hav two suns instead of one. Double stars or suns revolving around each other are very common. Bright, shining spots on Jupiter hav attracted the attention of astronomers of late, and much speculation has been indulged in as to what it portends. We must bear in mind that this universe is progressiv, and that the possibilities of matter are infinit. Matter is the infinit, and there is no infinit in the universe but matter.

It will no longer do for the Materialists to shut their eyes to these important facts. If the vegetable world, which combines in such a wonderful degree the useful and ornamental, the physical and spiritual, is made up of elements drawn from earth, air, and spirit, may not man, with his wonderful gifts of intelligence, be likewise made up? Surely man, with his godlike attributes of reason and thought, is not inferior to vegetation.

He who persists in looking down into the earth beneath his feet for all there is in the universe to-day has not yet felt nor entered into the progressiv spirit of the age. Be assured that Spiritualism means far more than the raps and table-tippings. It means the solution of all mysteries and all problems by the inherent principles or laws of matter in harmony with reason, and the death of all creeds, dogmas, false gods, and superstitions. E. A. Lowell, Mich.

Thomas Paine and Robert Burns.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Two articles from two gifted pens, which I hav just perused in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 22d, hav inspired me to take up my pen and write Amen.

The first is that of William Henry Burr. I am fully convinced that he has the right of it; that the immortal Thomas Paine was the author of both the Junius papers and the Declaration of Independence. Yes, I believe that Dr. Franklin became aware that Paine was the writer of the Junius articles, and that they were the foremost cause of Franklin's inviting him to come to America.

I also believe Paine was the author of the Declaration of Independence. That Jefferson was the writer (penman) there is no doubt; but that Mr. Paine modeled and gave to it its spirit and positiv character is almost self-evident, for therein is easily traceable the same indomitable will and purpose that animated the great author of "Common Sense," "Rights of Man," the "Crisis," and, I may add, the Junius productions.

But dismissing the subject of "friend" Burr's investigations with a full belief that he is in the right, I will next say that I always read what I see published in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER from the pen of George Chainey. This time he has said something right to the point about the immortal Robbie Burns, Scotland's and nature's true poet and nobleman, and that is, that his great, humane, and fraternal spirit forever rebelled against the orthodox tyranny of the kirk of Scotland. Yes, truly such a spirit as his must ever rebel against the tenets of a Calvin or a John Knox.

I was at Ayr twice last summer—

> "Auld Ayr, wham ne'er a place surpasses
> For honest men and bonnie lasses."

I strolled along the banks o' Doon, visited the Burns (Burness*) cottage, the room in which Burns was born, the Alawoy kirk, gathered clippings from the rose, woodbine, and ivy that entwine the "Brig o' Doon," over which Tam O'Shanter was flying upon his gray mare "Meg" when the de'il rushed out of the old kirk grounds and pulled off the tail of his noble charger. I crossed the "auld brig o' Ayr," built in 1252, and was feted and toasted at the "Tam O'Shanter inn," the old tavern in Ayr where Burns and his "cronies," Tam O'Shanter and Suter (shoemaker) Johnny used to resort, and where

> "The landlady and Tam grew gracious
> Wi' favors secret, sweet, and precious."

I sat at the same table at which they sat and in the same chairs that they sat in, sipped Scotch ale from the same mug that Robbie sipped from more than a hundred years ago, and in the same room, upon the wall of which hangs an original letter in a frame written by the poet to a gentleman of note at Edinburgh beggi.g his criticism upon a poem he had just written, which he didn't dare publish without counsel, as it might bring down the shafts of the church upon him. He and the kirk were like oil and water to each other. He said he chose the tavern instead of the church as a choice of two evils. Yes, nature and humanity were his first and only loves.

While in England I also passed through Thetford, where the noble Paine was born. That village has at this time three or four thousand inhabitants, and is situated exactly upon the line that divides Norfolk and Middlesex counties, and is a part of each. But Thomas Paine was born in Norfolk county. I passed through that village when en route from London to Norwich. And you and I, you will recollect, Mr. Editor, saw the table at Mr. Truelove's upon which Paine wrote his "Rights of Man," and upon which he might hav penned the Junius articles. Fraternally, DR. The Modern Devil.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In all the churches throughout our country the preachers are fulminating their anathemas against a horned and hoofed devil, who is going about like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour. The principal business of the churches is to fight the machinations of this evil one. Millions of dollars are expended every year, and hundreds of sermons are preached in every pulpit to effect this end. But there is a devil that stalks through our country at noonday, whose influence is producing all that is deplorable. There is not a church but what treats him with the greatest courtesy and obeys all his behests. The preacher and his flock are his fast friends, and are ready to exclaim, Great is thy influence and great is thy power; for these we love thee! Yet their horned devil is no match for this one in the amount of misery he inflicts upon the human family. In every country he robs the poor to bestow great wealth on a few. He builds colleges and churches with money he filches from industry. There is not a crime in the long catalog of crimes that he is not immediately or remotely the chief cause of.

He sits in the halls of pride and feasts with fiendish delight on the poverty and suffering he has caused amongst earth's toilers below. He is welcomed in the parlors of money kings and dandled on the lap of aristocracy, yet is worshiped by the penniless wretch whom he has robbed of his labor and his manhood.

Not only do the churches and ministers of religion yield to his sway, but all governments and legislativ bodies bow submissivly to his mandates. More than half the world are his willing slaves, and bow obsequiously to his power. His legitimate work may be seen in the hovels and rags of the poor. The starving, landless Irish to-day are brought to their condition by this insatiate fiend. Yet his power over humanity is so great that the enlightened nation of England is marshaling her forces to assist him in crushing out the life and liberties of the poor, downtrodden Irish. This devil is Interest. Would it not be well to hav less to say about that old mythological devil until we rid the world of this real devil, interest?

I hav long considered the subject of interest the most important point for reformers to attack. Not that it is the weakest and most easily demolished, but because it is the strongest fortress now held by the money power. In our grapple with Shylock, this must fall or victory will be his. The Mind Element.

We are disposed to let friend Chapman hav the last word on this subject, and on this we are agreed, for he is disposed in the same direction. A column of his "Appendix" is used to justify theories, and to show that they may be properly indulged in. This was scarcely necessary. We hav not condemned theorizing nor forbidden it, but simply hinted that theories are not necessarily facts. The wildest imaginable theories hav existed since man first walked the earth, and this occupation of theory-making will doubtless be continued indefinitly. Mr. Chapman has just as much right to build up theories as any other man, but he will hav to prove them a little better than he has his theory of "mind-element" before they are universally adopted.

The main point in dispute between us is, What is mind? If we hav understood him, he holds that it is matter, an element, of which there is an inexhaustible fountain somewhere in stellar space, from which all men and all animals draw enough to do their thinking or make their thoughts. This element, being intelligence, is always thinking, whether in the great fountain or whether drawn out into animal organizations, comprising 1,500,000,000 human beings on the earth, to say nothing of the quintillions that hav left it, and perhaps a million times as many inferior animals, great and small. On the other hand, we hold that thinking or intelligence is a function of the brainal system, as motion and strength are of the muscular system, digestion and assimilation of the gastric and circulatory systems, sight of the eye and connecting organizations, hearing of the ear, etc. It seems to be no more difficult to comprehend that thoughts are produced than that locomotion, hearing, seeing, and feeling are produced, and that all are the concomitants of life and organization. We can see no proof that thinking requires a separate element any more than seeing, tasting, hearing, feeling, or life itself, which is the sum total of animal organization and functions.

Thinking is the result of the entire human organization, brain, stomach, the circulatory system, and the nervous system, quite as much as any other function performed by the body, and perhaps more; but that it is a function, a result of organization, seems proved by the endless diversity of thoughts and degrees of intelligence that men exhibit. If mind and thought are matter, an element similar to oxygen and hydrogen, they must ever be the same. Oxygen is homogeneous, always the same, always alike, though modified by its thousands of combinations. It is so with the other known elements. If mind is an element like oxygen and hydrogen it must be homogeneous, and when drawn from the great reservoir or ocean it must always be the same article; but directly the opposit is the result. No two persons hav the same thoughts or mind, no two draw the same from Mr. Chapman's stellar fountain. No two organizations being precisely alike shows why minds are ever unlike, and the same explains why the mind is affected and diseased when the body is.

We go as far as Mr. Chapman in recognizing the finer forms of matter and the subtle forces of electricity, magnetism, chemical affinity, attraction, etc., etc. We admit the importance of these—and of others perhaps not yet understood—in making up life, the grand result of the universe, but we cannot clearly see his dual system of matter and spirit. We regard the universe as a great unity—one system—employing coarser and finer forms of matter, the latter evolving from the former. These and the concomitant forces are always at work in producing the results attained.

We hav never insisted that this is the ultimate state of our existence, nor that it is not in the economy of the universe to produce continued life; but we do hold that if we hav a contined existence, if we continue to liv, move, and think, we must hav bodies, organs, and brains, as we now hav, composed of matter and within the universe, though the material be far more subtle and refined than that which makes up our present organizations. All this may be within the power and province of the universe and help to form its wonderful economy. We do not divide existence or substance into matter and spirit, but regard it all as matter, though ranging from the bank of clay to the finest ether that man has ever found. Invisible and almost impalpable hydrogen is just as really matter as the block of granit, and so of all the finer forms in which matter exists. If spirit exists, it is simply a form of matter combined with the forces inseparable from it, as in our cruder life here. It is only a question of degree; and that matter is susceptible of almost interminable gradations from the coarse to the fine is well proved. Still it continues to be matter all the time, and can never become anything else. Matter and its forces make up the universe. They are eternal, the almighty—the only eternal and almighty, in our belief, which has an existence.

Mr. Chapman's talk about throwing a lot of brains, bones, blood, ligaments, muscles, etc., into a stove, expecting to produce thought thereby, is unworthy of attention. Nature works in no such way, but furnishes all the matter, force and organizations which produce life and which produce thought.

The odors, colors, and flavors which Mr. Chapman speaks of so flippantly and propounds questions about are not primary elements, but are the results of organization, the union of many of the elements and forces in the universe, the same as man and his thoughts.

In Mr. Chapman's former articles he has talked about the mind-element as a primary or simple substance, and said that the mind or thought of man was this spirit element drawn from its capacious resting-place; but in his appendix he modifies his theory and uses the plural and talks about mind elements, soul elements, etc., and of course life elements. In this view of the case we are not so very far apart. If he givs up the idea that mind is a primary, simple element that exists somewhere separate from our world, and admits that it is a phenomenon of life, the result of the elements and forces in nature, we will not need to discuss the subject further, and other appendixes will be unnecessary.

What Objections to Christianity?

It is evident you are loth to part with Tacitus as a witness. This is not strange inasmuch as he is the only pagan authority whom you can quote who is even claimed to have mentioned the name of Christ. The more, however, the subject is investigated the more probable it becomes that Tacitus never mentioned the name of Jesus, and the claim that he did is one of those misrepresentations to which, unfortunately, too many Christian writers, both early and late, have been much addicted. It matters not very much what Gibbon's opinion upon the subject was, for he had not so good opportunities of judging as are now possessed.

The passage alluded to is found in what are called the Annals of Tacitus; and it is the Annals that is believed to have been a production of the latter part of the fifteenth century. It is admitted on all hands that such a writer as Tacitus lived in the close of the first century and that he wrote several works, among which were a Treatise on the Germans Histories, a Dialogue on Orators, etc., but it is now stoutly disputed that he wrote the Annals. If he was the author of them it is most singular that the work was not known before the close of the fifteenth century, which is asserted to be the fact. If you can show that his Annals was alluded to, and especially the passage referring to Christians, I ask you to point out when and by whom.

The reasons given by Taylor for believing the whole thing a forgery have great weight:

1. None of the Christian Fathers made the slightest allusion to it, though the same would have served them a better purpose than any other authority of the kind they were able to use.

2. Tertullian refers twice to the Histories of Tacitus, but never to the Annals.

3. Eusebius, as searching as he was to find everything that could be used to strengthen the Christian cause, made no mention of that passage nor of the Annals.

4. The language of the passage is exaggerated, improbable, and incompatible with the gentle and cultured Tacitus, who, if in his day Christianity was what is claimed for it, would not thus have characterized it.

5. Because in the genuine writings of Tacitus no allusion, directly or indirectly is made to Christ or to Christians.

Taylor makes use of this language, and instead of aspersing him I call upon you to refute it: "The first publication of any part of the Annals of Tacitus was by Johannes de Spire, at Venice, in the year 1468, his imprint being made from a single manuscript, in his own power and possession only, and purporting to have been written in the eighth century. From this manuscript, which none but the most learned would know of, none but the most curious would investigate, and none but the most interested would transcribe, or be allowed to transcribe—and that too, in an age and country when and where to have suggested but a doubt against the authenticity of any document which the authorities had once chosen to adopt as evidence of Christianity would have subjected the conscientious skeptic to the fagot—from this all other manuscripts and printed copies of the works of Tacitus are derived; and consequently in the forty-fourth section of the fifteenth book of these Annals we have the celebrated passage."

A friend of mine who writes over the name of "Antichrist," and who has undoubtedly devoted more time to the proofs and probabilities of Christianity in the first and second centuries than any other man in America, says, on page 423 of his "Revelations": "That the Annals of Tacitus were forged in the fifteenth century is now claimed to be demonstrated by the author of a book entitled 'Tacitus and Bracciolini,' London, 1878. For forty years Poggio Bracciolini was a papal secretary, and competent to commit such a forgery. In 1422, while in the receipt of a starvation salary, he was tempted by an offer of 500 sequins (nearly $50,000) to engage in some mysterious literary work. Seven years later six books of the Annals were brought to him by a monk of Saxony. Then all Christendom rejoiced to learn that the heathen Tacitus had mentioned Christ crucified under Pontius Pilate. The discovery was worth the money. Poggio, though a father both spiritually and carnally, was not a husband till the age of fifty-four. At seventy-two he accepted the office of secretary to the republic of Florence, and at seventy-nine he died, leaving five sons of his old age. Up to the last he was a busy student and writer. Fifty-six years after his death his fourth son was secretary to Pope Leo X., at which time the pope's steward, stimulated by a munificent reward, discovered the first six incomplete books of the Annals, probably the unfinished work of Poggio in his old age."

He continues his remarks by allusion to the damaging fact that a passage in the pseudo Tacitus of Poggio is closely similar to one in Sulpicius Severus, who wrote about the year 400, three hundred years after the time of Tacitus. After a quotation from a notice in the Edinburgh Review of Mr. Ross's work (who is the author who denies the authenticity of the "Annals") he closes by saying: "We are quite satisfied with the conclusion that the cloud on the title of the Annals is at least as dark as that on the fourth gospel. And as for 'long tradition' we think it will be found a little too long to prove Chr st was crucified under Pontius Pilate."

Writing later upon the same subject, he repeats: "The fact is that the existence of the so-called Annals of Tacitus, which contains the passage about Christ, was never known at all until the year 1429, when the forged work first made its appearance. Tacitus did not write the Annals, but Poggio Braccilini did. He produced the last six books of the Annals in 1429, for which he received a fortune. Then in his old age he forged the first six books, but died before completing the sixth. These were brought to light by his son a long time after the death of the father, and palmed off on the pope for another munificent reward. The father was secretary to seven successive popes during a period of forty years, and the son was also secretary to Pope Leo X. when the steward of his holiness discovered the first six incomplete books of the Annals. Further details on this subject will be found in the 'Revelations of Antichrist,' which exhausts the whole subject of the historical existence of Jesus, and proves conclusively that no such person existed in the reign of Tiberius; in other words, that the gospel Jesus is a myth, but that there was a Jesus who was stoned and hanged about 76 B. C., among whose disciples were Simon Kepha, alias Peter, and the Apostle Paul, both of whom lived and died before the Christian era." On this subject Taylor says, "I consider this celebrated passage to be a forgery or interpolation upon the text of Tacitus."

The least that can be said on this subject is that the only pagan authority upon which you can depend with the slightest confidence is thus terribly shaken and needs more help to sustain him than can be found. That the passage referring to Christ was written many centuries after the events are said to have transpired there is the strongest grounds for belief; and this is corroborated by the fact that not one of the sharp, lynx-eyed early writers in favor of Christianity made the slightest allusion to it. The fact is perfectly established that hundreds of spurious gospels, false documents, and forgeries were produced from time to time to uphold and establish the story of Jesus, the baseness of which has been fully exposed, and that this portion at least of the Annals of Tacitus is of the same character there is, as shown, the strongest reason for believing. If an early existence of this passage or of the Annals itself can be proved, it devolves upon you to do it.

But if it will be a special gratification to you to admit for the time being the authenticity of the single passage in which Tacitus is said to hav alluded to Jesus it amounts not to very much, only that the writer three-fourths of a century after the alleged death of Christ heard that his followers, "branded with deserved infamy," had been cruelly treated by Nero. If the passage were genuine, it would not deserve the appellation of historical proof, but since a very dark cloud is thrown over its genuineness, it falls hopelessly to the ground.

As to the identity of the Gospel of Nicodemus and the Acts of Pilate, the best of evidence is to be adduced. It is to be found in the Ante-Nicene Library, Vol. XVI., the "Apocryphal Acts of Revelations." The Introduction, page 11, says that "the Acts of Pilate was also entitled the Gospel of Nicodemus." To the same effect we have the concurrence of Tischendorf, one of the very best Christian authorities, and he attributes the production of the work to the second or third century, a period so prolific of spurious and false gospels and epistles. See pages 124 and 222 for the different versions of the Gospel of Nicodemus, the first part being entitled the Acts of Pilate, and the second part the Descent of Christ into Hell. In the first Latin version of the second part, chapter xii, it will be found that Pilate did write "a letter to Claudius, king of the city of Rome," about the crucifixion of the son of God; so that the assertion that Pilate is claimed to have written a letter to Claudius is not so very ridiculous after all. On page 224 is another Report of Pilate to Augustus Cæsar, and following it another version of the same. On page 231 is given the copy of another claimed document, the Givings Up of Pilate, and lastly, a little further on, will be found an account of the "Death of Pilate." In all these pretended documents, or, as you are pleased to term them, "government archives," Pilate appears as an excellent Christian, and may in fact be termed the first Christian martyr. The damaging fact, however, in the whole business is that the documents are all spurious, not one of them having been written by Pontius Pilate, and had no existence till the second century, when a certain number of Christian geniuses lived, capable of getting up gospels and sacred documents to meet the needs and demands, which fact I think I will be able to show, further on, as fully as you wish.

In the edition of the Apocryphal New Testament (William Hone, Ludgate Hill, London), in the introduction to the "Gospel of Nicodemus, formerly called the Acts of Pontius Pilate," this language is used: "Although this gospel is, by some among the learned, supposed to have been really written by Nicodemus, who became a disciple of Jesus Christ, and conversed with him, others conjecture that it was a forgery toward the close of the third century by some zealous believer, who observing that there had been appeals made by the Christians of the former age to the Acts of Pilate, but that such Acts could not be produced, imagined it would be a service to Christianity to fabricate and publish this gospel, as it would both confirm the Christians under persecution and convince the heathen of the truth of the Christian religion. The Rev. Jeremiah Jones says that such pious frauds were very common among Christians even in the first three centuries, and that a forgery of this nature, with the view above mentioned, seems natural and probable. The same author, in noticing that Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History charges the pagans with having forged and published a book called the Acts of Pilate, takes occasion to observe that the internal evidence of this gospel shows it was not the work of any heathen, but that if in the latter end of the third century we find it in use among Christians (as it was then certainly in some churches), and about the same time find a forgery of the heathens under the same title, it seems exceedingly probable that some Christians at that time should publish such a piece as this in order partly to confront the spurious one of the pagans, and partly to support those appeals which had been made by former Christians to the Acts of Pilate; and Mr. Jones says he thinks so more particularly as we have innumerable instances of forgeries by the faithful in the primitive ages, grounded on less plausible reasons. Whether it be canonical or not, it is of very great antiquity, and is appealed to by several of the ancient Christians. The present translation is made from the gospel published by Grynæus in the Orthodoxographa, Vol. I. tom. II., p. 643."

From this and all other authentic information that can be gathered upon the subject this damaging fact to Christianity is made most conspicuous, that there are no reliable records proving that such a person as Jesus Christ ever lived; that all the gospels and so-regarded sacred stories about him are forgeries, spurious, or the mere rehash of legends and unreliable traditions that cannot be traced to any real events that ever took place. In the place of all this the most reasonable conclusion that can be arrived at is that the mention in Josephus, the letter of Pilate, the passage in the Annals, and the almost uncounted number of gospels and documents of the early centuries are spurious forgeries and interpolation wholly unworthy of confidence. A cause which depends upon such evidence for proof is weak indeed.

THE SOURCE OF CHRISTIANITY.

I do not undertake to give the precise origin of Christianity, but I think I have shown, and can further show, that very similar views had been largely entertained in the world long before the word Christianity was used or known, and that there were several sources whence the Christian story and dogmas could have been derived. And it is hardly worth while to impute anything to a supernatural source when natural sources are found in abundance.

The Jewish scriptures, which Christians have adopted, tell us that man has existed on the earth less than six thousand years, and that from the family of Adam, and a thousand years later from the family of Noah, all the nations and tribes of men on the earth have descended. The same story tells how the earth, sun, moon, and stars were made in the same week that man was, before which time there was nothing, or, if something, in a very crude, chaotic state—"without form and void."

Science, which gives us far more accurate information than this contained in the Bible, convinces us that that Jewish statement of the cosmogony of the world and the universe is totally false. Geology unmistakably tells us that this earth has existed in its present form for hundreds of thousands and probably many millions of years. Man existed on it, though probably in a primitive, savage state, a hundred thousand years ago. The proofs of this I will not stop to produce unless you call for them.

Astronomy tells us of the solar system, of which the sun is the center, around which revolve the earth, seven other planets, five of them much larger than the earth, and two or three hundred asteroids of smaller dimensions. It tells us that the stars which we see with unaided eyes, and countless thousands of others brought to light by the aid of powerful telescopes, are largely suns, the centers of other systems, with smaller globes revolving around them, as the earth revolves around its sun. The writers of the Jewish Bible knew nothing of this. They knew not even that the earth was round, nor that it turned daily upon its axis and coursed yearly round the sun, millions of times larger than itself. The author, or authors, of the Jewish story evidently thought that the earth constituted the universe; that it was a flat surface, having "ends," "foundations," and "pillars," with a comparatively small body; the sun to give light by day, and another small body, the moon, to giv light by night, while the little twinkling stars were made in a hurry, thrown in for makeweights or good measure, and set up in the firmament a short distance above the earth for ornamentation or amusement.

The writer or writers tell us that from Shem, Ham, and Japhet all the nations of the earth hav sprung, and that during the lifetime of Shem large and powerful nations in the eastern part of Asia and in Egypt arose, and that kingdoms and large cities were established. Common sense and universal experience tell us that this cannot be true. The world has never advanced that far in the lifetime of one individual, and the strongest proofs exist that man lived on the earth long eras before nations, languages, or literature were established and before kingdoms and cities were built up.

Learned scientists agree that millions of years ago the earth was in a molten state, and that incomputable ages rolled away before it cooled sufficiently to admit of vegetable and animal life upon its surface. A very large portion of the earth's crust consists of chalk, which is made up of shells of exceedingly small creatures that live and die under water, creatures of the same character as at this moment are forming chalk-beds at the bottom of our oceans. A layer of chalk one foot in thickness is not formed in less than a century, and is thought to require a much longer time, so that, as the chalk beds in the southern parts of England and the northern parts of France exceed one thousand feet in thickness, it is very safe to conclude that they could not hav been less than one hundred thousand years in forming. And any table of the earth's crust shows us that there are rocks of great thickness above and below the chalk, for the production of which millions added to millions of years were required. How easy, then, for a person not blinded by superstition to see that the Bible story upon which the Christian religion is based is not only not divine, but wholly unreliable and false!

The Bible tells us that man was created upon a very high plane, perfect and without fault, and from this state he suddenly fell into the lowest depth of crime and degradation. Science and research, on the other hand, give the assurance that the primitive condition of man was very low down, but a slight remove from the animal kingdom. He dwelt in caves and holes in the earth, lived as the animals lived, and knew little more than the animals. The bones of the human species have in many parts of the earth been found side by side with the bones of animals that for thousands of years have been wholly unknown in the world, and under such circumstance as to prove that they lived together upon terms of equality. Subsequent to this state the "stone age" came on. When man slightly progressed from his original very low degree, he prepared for himself axes, knives, etc., of stone, with which he felled trees, killed and dressed game, etc. These stone implements have been found in great numbers in various places, proving that many thousands of years ago, before men knew aught of the metals, they crudely formed their implements of stone. The earlier and later stone ages must have extended over many thousands of years.

From these primitive conditions man slowly progressed, acquiring, as necessity impelled and experience dictated, more and more knowledge of language, agriculture, architecture, and social life, until ultimately he became a civilized being, building cities, constructing machinery, and writing and printing books.

The lesson to be learned from all this is that man was not created in the beginning in a high state of perfection; that he did not fall from a state of happiness and perfection to a state of utter wretchedness, but rather, instead of falling, he has gradually been rising, becoming more intelligent and better fitted to keep up the battle of life in the great struggle of existence. We infer also that as man did not fall, is not lost from the source of his existence, he needs no finding and requires no savior to bring him back to the imaginary altitude from which he fell.

It is believed that the birth-place of the human race was in some part of the earth where the climate was mild, so that before he knew how to make clothing or construct dwellings he would not suffer from the severities of climatic extremes. The precise locality where this beginning was made cannot be known. So many years have sped away since that all knowledge to be had upon the subject does not enable us to penetrate the age of dense darkness which intervenes. The farther back the geological epoch of man's first appearance on the earth, even to the Miocene period, the more cumulative is the proof of the unity of origin of the various races. But when it is undertaken to fix the site of man's first appearance it is not easily accomplished. Looking at his slender organization and the absence of any natural protection against severe cold, it is reasonable to suppose that he originated in a mild latitude, and many have conjectured it was not far from the Indian ocean in the central or southern portion of Asia. To this theory men no less learned than Prof. Sclater, Prof. Huxley, Lubbock, Tylor, and scores of the ablest writers the world has produced have given their assent.

Notwithstanding the great antiquity which is justly claimed for the American continent by general consent, priority, so far as the human race is concerned, is conceded to the opposite side of the globe. It is believed that from Central Asia came the races which have made up the civilized nations of the earth. India has been termed the cradle of the world's literature, civilization, aud religion. Its history, languages, and literature are thought to be older than those of Persia, China, Chaldea, or Egypt. While it has been the birthplace of civilization and literature, it has also been the source of the mythology, theology, and superstition which have cursed the world.

Ancient Asia was peopled by the Aryan nation or tribes, who occupied the main portion of the continent south of the Himilayas. They were a peaceful, agricultural people, and attained to a fair degree of civilization. It was this people who worshiped Indra, Agni, Varuna, Mitra, Soma, Maruts, Ushas, Yama, etc., who were personifications of the powers and manifestations of nature. Their descendants at a later period conceived and worshiped Brahma, Vishnu, Siva, and the numerous other gods which the fertile brains of the Hindoos were able to imagine. A branch of the Aryan family occupied Iran or Persia, and these were more monotheistic in their deity-worshiping proclivities and principally recognized Ormuzd as their great deity, with Mithra, the sun, and Ahriman, the arch-devil of the world. It is believed that people from Iran or Persia settled in Chaldea and Assyria, where their gods were Baal or Bel, Ra, Mendach, Nergal, Nebo, with Ishtar, Astarte, or Ashtoreth, etc. That these were all older than Jah, or Jahveh, of the Jews there is little room for doubt.

The Aryans were a thrifty, enterprising race of people, and traveled westward, settling in the western portions of Asia, Greece, Etruscia, Iberia, Gall, Britain, Teutonia, and Scandinavia. Modern Europe has undoubtedly still a large admixture of Aryan blood. Philological proofs are abundant that the present languages of the European nations are outgrowths and evolutions of the ancient tongue, of which probably the Sanskrit is the best defined representation.

The Aryans were a religious people, and regarded with worshipful veneration the various grand operations of nature. They believed that the sun, moon, stars, clouds, rivers, and the like possessed life because they moved, and they readily conceived that these had a far stronger life than their own, obeying a will more powerful than they could exercise. It was but a short step from this recognition to the belief that a living person actuated each moving body and element in nature, and that this person was a god.

"Elements of Social Science."

"The author treats, in an open and unreserved manner, the diseases of the human frame, as well as those of society, because he is convinced, with Stuart Mill, that they can only in this way be prevented and cured. In truth, we hav learned from many years' experience that such is the case. We bring, therefore, to the notice of our readers, and recommend them to procure, this excellent book.—Sonntags-Blatt, Organ fur die Friedenker Deutschlands, edited by Dr. August Specht, January 26, 1873.

Truth's Sunday Sermons.

III.—The Origin of Man.

TEXT.—And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground; and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul.—Gen. ii, 7.

This was done early in the second week of creation, unless the first and second chapters of Genesis are two distinct accounts of the same events.

In the first chapter we hav, step by step, the process which the Almighty pursued in his great undertaking, from the first day till the sixth. On the first day he created light; on the second, the firmament; on the third, trees, grass, and herbs; on the fourth, the sun, moon, and stars; on the fifth, fish and fowl; on the sixth, animals, reptils, and man.

And on the seventh day God rested from all his labors.

He seems then to hav surveyed his whole work and observed, as we are told, that there was not a man to till the ground. How such a statement can be reconciled with the assertion that man was created on the sixth day of the first week we do not pretend to explain. There are different theories, one of the most plausible being that man was created in material form on the sixth day, but that the breath of life—the soul—spirituality—was not breathed into him until after the seventh. This explanation has been used to reconcile the Mosaic account with the Darwinian theory. It assumes that man was for a time only an animal, and that not until the breath of life was breathed into his nostrils was he endowed with immortality, or in the words of the text, that he became a living soul.

There is a theory, too, that the first chapter of Genesis is only a general account of creation, the second being to some extent a recapitulation, but more in detail. By this theory it appears that man was created on the sixth day, the fact being related in the twenty-seventh verse of the first chapter of Genesis, and the details being reserved for the second chapter, in the seventh verse of which they are given.

These explanations may pass current with those who start out in their intellectual exploration with the assumption that the Bible story is infallibly true, and that all facts discovered, instead of being weighed with it, are to be cut to its measure. But to the seeker after truth who does not care what conclusions he may reach so long as they are true, and whose only object is to ascertain the truth, not to reconcile the doubtful story of an Eastern poem with inconsistent facts, such explanations and theories appear childish.

Let us look at the two chapters, and compare them with the same candor that we would compare two chapters of any other book.

In the twenty-seventh verse of the first chapter we are told that on the sixth day God created man in his own image. Then we see that on the seventh day God rested.

And at this time there had been no rain and there was not a man to till the ground. Thus we find it in the second chapter.

So goes the story, and if it means anything it means that after the creation, including that of man, and after God had rested from the labor of creation, there were yet two things lacking to make his work perfect and permanent. One was rain and the other man!

To remedy one deficiency a mist was made to rise from the earth and water the whole face of the ground. This seems to hav been a needless effort, when a few punctures in the firmament would hav given the earth a generous supply of moisture from the waters above it. But let that pass.

The second deficiency was supplied by the creation of man out of the dust of the earth.

There is, according to the text and its context, a distinct division between the labors narrated there and those narrated in the first chapter, as if the first were before the day of rest and the latter after it. And yet we find the statement in the first chapter that man was made on the sixth day, while in the second chapter it appears that after all the labors of the six days and the rest of the seventh there was not a man to till the ground.

But more. On the sixth day man was created, male and female. Man was not alone for a day. A helpmeet was provided for him at once, and apparently without the sacrifice of a rib either. And yet we find in the second chapter that when man had been made from the dust of the earth, he had no human society whatever until after the Garden of Eden had been planted and he placed in it; nor until he had performed the Herculean task of naming every beast of the field and fowl of the air.

He must then hav been without a helpmeet for a long time, a very long time.

The Lord promised to make him one before he commenced this job of naming the animals, but apparently from some notion that Adam might find a suitable marital partner among the animals or fowls, and with a view to economy in original material, the fulfilment of the promis was postponed.

After the beasts and birds were named by Adam, which must hav taken him many a day, for the Lord had already created every beast of the field and every fowl of the air, we are told that he was put to sleep, and a rib was abstracted from his body, out of which Eve was made.

These are clearly two accounts of the creation of the human species. And they go to show either that the first and second chapters of Genesis are not by the same author, or that when the author wrote the second he had forgotten the narrativ of the first.

It is very difficult to understand that the Supreme Being should hav superintended the writing of two such contradictory accounts of so important an event as the creation of mankind. In one we are told that man was created on the sixth day, before the day of rest, and of both sexes precisely as the other animals were; in the other the inference is striking that Adam was created after the day of rest, and it is irresistible that he lived a long time without a mate.

But it is not difficult to understand that an ignorant people in an early age should hav accepted these stories as genuin narrativs of the origin of all things. They knew of no animals or fowls except those peculiar to a small territory, for there were no menageries or works on natural history in those days. There was therefore nothing extraordinary to these people in the statement that one man reviewed and named them all. As they were not a critical people, it is not strange that they should hav accepted both these traditions without for a moment questioning that both came from the same author, and were one continuous and consistent story. They were a superstitious people, and it is quite in harmony with the trait that they should hav come to regard these traditions as veritable revelation of deity.

The stories, however, are evidently fictions and of different authorship. Of this they bear internal evidence. And when the two are compared, each tends to show the falsity of the other.

The ancient idea was that all things were a special creation. Accordingly these traditions attribute to the God of the Jews the creation, by special act, of everything animate and inanimate. It is not so much our purpose, however, to discredit that notion as it is to direct attention to the inconsistency of the narrativ which the Christian world regards as divinely revealed and the only true account of the origin of man. Man may hav been a special creation, but he could not hav been created male and female on the sixth day of the first week, if there was no man to till the ground in the beginning of the second week, nor any woman until after Adam—the only man—had named all the animals and fowls, which was also in the second week. If he was created on the sixth day of the first week, it is not true that there was no man until one was made from the dust in the second week; and if the first man was created after the great day of rest, certainly none could hav been created before that day. Or if on the sixth day of the first week both man and woman were created, it is untrue that man was without a helpmeet unless the almost numberless animals and fowls were named, which was not begun until after the day of rest.

And if in this respect either story is untrue, discredit is thrown upon the whole.

He must be credulous indeed who will accept as inspiration a story so utterly contradictory of itself, or two stories so utterly contradictory of each other, that any second-rate fiction writer of to-day who should make a similar blunder would be ashamed of his stupidity.

If God wrote the accounts, he is not so expert in authorship as he is the business of making and running a universe. And he has made such a mess of it that he ought to be gratified to know that there are men whom he has so imbued with respect for his greatness that they will not insult him by attributing to him the authorship of the Mosaic account of the origin of man.

"A MAN'S charity to those who differ from him upon great and difficult questions will be in the ratio of his own knowledge of them—the more knowledge the more charity." Just so; the bigot knows everything. If he is a Catholic he has the infallible church at his back, and so cannot err. If it has decreed that the earth is a flat, and that the sun and the moon hav nothing to do but dance attendance upon the said earth, he must believe, so far as he can, that such is the scheme of the universe. If he is a Protestant, of the vulgar type, he has only to swallow a text or two on any given subject, and learn, from an infallible book, what he ought to believe. The Catholic bigot and the Protestant bigot alike hav no need of inquiry, properly so called, and it is useless to attempt to enlighten them. "They are joined to their idols," and must be severely let alone. Even thus "the water-lily, in the midst of waters," as Coleridge so finely says, "gladly expands its petals at the least pattering of the shower, while the dry and arid shrub of the desert coils up its leaves and repels the waters that would fertilize and enrich it." The bigot closes his ears that he may not hear, and shuts his eyes that he may not see, but the sincere and competent student is ever scanning and discerning, ever looking out for and apprehending new truth and adding it to the ample store he has inherited from noble ancestors who did the same.

Hints Slipped between Elmina and Her Critics.

BY MARY E. TILLOTSON.

As all believe in temperance, the point at issue seems to be what transcends it. That there is much sexual intemperance is no more doubted than that there is alcoholic intemperance, and there is no more danger of lessening it unduly than that of alcoholic drinks. In discussing either it is necessary to refer to causes, for each is the great effect of many smaller causes, the turning away of which is the right remedy. The appetites for both are usually inherited, and both are created by like causes; hence, whatever abates either is likely to the other, though they do not always adhere in the same person. The abatement of both is so requisit as to justify any solicitude.

Hygiene has been showing that these causes are milder stimulants and condiments deranging the body and receiving too little attention. Tea, coffee, tobacco, pickles, highly-seasoned pies, cakes, meats, and lard in all forms, stimulate, excite, heat, irritate, disease, and produce countless abnormal states, and appetites grow clamorous. The sooner this is well known, the sooner will a proper estimate be put on pure bodies and people begin to change toward temperance in all things.

Both sexes nearly equally violate law in abusing their powers, and misery is becoming unendurable. Women may suffer more from sexual than alcoholic excess, because closer partners to it, and maybe they deserve to for doing so much to contribute to the excessiv appetite by their unnatural appearance and influence, the fashions they accept not only doing this, but enfeebling them more than all other intemperance combined. The fashion intemperance with women not only equals both the other great scourges, but underlies and overtops them, blinds and depletes men, and so disables women physically, mentally, and morally that they cannot assert and take social rights. The displacement of vital viscera by pressure, the down-dragging effects of weight and perplexity by skirts, the coldness and exposure of the lower limbs, in present costume, are sufficient to account for their sickness and make it impossible to decide what is due to other intemperance, so largely do results of this fall on the sexual system. When clothing is suited to use, being beautiful because natural and productiv of naturalness, beauty, and joyous vigor in women, and other habits are made normal, the sexual appetite will be so moderated as to admit of regulated order, not that a precise rule will apply to all; liberty here, as elsewhere, will ennoble by self-responsibility. With normal diet, drink, and attire, our many barbarous customs will disappear. Equality for women will be a mighty disinfectant, and a few generations under good auspices will so wash out the virus of past lasciviousness that, in view of present life, which makes sad wrecks of many half-grown boys, men will be surprised at their genial happiness through comfortable abstemiousness.

Conceding propagation the legitimate province of a moral force, people desiring offspring will counsel on this naturally arising question, Are our organic energies and compatibilities likely to produce best results from a single exercise? The decision of a healthy pair with equally privileged volition can be trusted. If they conclude an exercise once in two, four, or six months is temperate and power-begetting, Elmina will doubtless concur.

But it is asked, What is temperance after the prolific season of life is past? The same hoarding and cherishing of full power, is reason's response. Here are proofs that every child even should know. There is no avenue of waste and loss that so readily devitalizes and degrades, calling strength so largely into its drain from every organ. And there is no other storehouse of efficiency and alacrity like this healthy, unruffled depository of sweet composure, or that in emergency so faithfully supplies a call for aid from brain, hands, or feet. As a basis of love attraction it should possess normal, untaxed vigor. To mend habits of over-activity, it pays attendant restraint probably more fully than any appetite for foul food.

Some find it hard to abstain from articles injurious. Good Elmina don't drop sausage and pie filled with burning pepper and covered with nauseating swine's grease, nor retain hygienic dress before vicious frowns. But there are those who can easily drop any wrong. I am glad she works nobly for many things, and she may hug an endless rest till the growth of her deathless spirit fills her arms with angels.

Liberals who will work for humanity will be developing well if they don't learn they can't die till they see their flesh entombed. After freedom is achieved there may be time to enjoy discussion about it. Now let all grapple with first needs. Every word of direction or encouragement helps each other and all who hear, even those looking on to revile, bound they will not accept an iota. Truth is as contagious as error, and dullards catch atoms unawares.

The theme of what is intemperance at the fount of life is profitable and in season now as related to the whole conjugal question, which church tyranny and licentious clans are straining to suppress, and by rash, inhuman attacks hav identified with the conflict for general liberty and compelled the continued investigation.

Women's subjection is really the central point at issue. The industrial and home idea, finance and civic principles, with general individual rights, coalesce and make a revolutionary movement. If women remain long in apathy, oblivious to all this fire of words and crash of party friction, the struggle will be hard and long. It is wearisome to work for those who will not help themselvs. When they behold the significance of the strife, and, trusting their deliverers, lay their own hands on the wheels of progress, victory will follow them. THE TRUTH SEEKER and Liberal League topics ought to show them their place.

Individual Liberalism.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It is six months since I hav written you, but don't think I hav forsaken you. Certainly I hav not, for during my silence in the way of epistolary correspondence I hav been growing deeper and broader in the infinit space of Liberalism. My time has been constantly absorbed either in earthly pursuits of business or Liberal pursuits of good scientific knowledge. I hav followed you from Science Hall across the broad Atlantic, thence into and over Europe, back to your home, and much to my stock of instruction hav I added thereby. I am a disbeliever in miracles, but it seems perfectly miraculous how you could write so very much upon so many different subjects and keep up such a constant description of the many wonderful things which you hav been really an eye-witness to, and such a minute and thorough interesting explanation too. Why, it seemed just as though the reader himself were the beholder. Certainly no traveler, ancient or modern, ever wrote so much in so short a time, dispensing so great an amount of useful information. Really, Mr. Editor, those eighteen letters are a history in themselvs well worth twice the price of one year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, in whose columns they appeared. Let me say, it was with the greatest interest and wonder that I waded through them. Even my dear wife, who is tinged with Calvinism, though rapidly receding from it, was struck with astonishment and highly interested while I read to her the wonders of Europe as given by an eye-witness in the personage of an Infidel abroad.

I thirst for more knowledge. My soul yearns for more real wisdom. I am not satisfied to let you remain where you are. Go ye into all nations and proclaim unto us a new gospel founded upon science, art, literature, and civilization; bring to us glad tidings of great joy. First form a trinity, by making incarnate truth, reason, science; then let knowledge be our savior, ignorance our destroyer, nature our preserver, progressiv investigation our redeemer; a gospel proclaimed by one apostle, not four, leaving no chance for one to call the other three liars, and the three the other one a hypocrit, fool, and scoundrel.

In order to establish this new gospel, you can put me down for $5.00, to apply on "around the world" fund, also $5.00 for the "Rig-Veda," in which will be truthfully written the gospel according to St. Bennett, "and it shall come to pass" I will remit the above amount just as soon as you call on me.

Oh! by the bye, don't fail to visit the place of "immaculate conception," and giv us some light on that subject, and stop the flow of human blood which has already coadjulated upon the beautiful forms of twenty million dear souls and discolored nearly all the rivers of Europe for eighteen hundred years, during which time the Christians hav over this one great bone of contention also been the enemies, suppressors, and haters of all inventiv genius, geological and astronomical discovery, and scientific research. What has Christianity not been guilty of? How much longer will this horrible state of affairs continue to exist? Not long. Theology is rapidly drifting into the reefs only to be wrecked by the irresistible surges of science, there to remain stranded upon the rocks as a relic of barbarism. Then reason and knowledge will hav the ascendency in contradistinction to ignorance, superstition, and faith. Man's intelligence will then be his God, enthroned in his developed brain. Man will then turn his attention to this world of ours wherein dwelleth no imaginary gods, no white-winged angels, no cloven-footed devil, no burning, foaming, surging hell, except the hell of ignorance which we to-day see all around us, fostered by a lying, hypocritical clergy, proclaiming to be doing God's work, that they are really his vicegerents, specially called to warn his people of their unpardonable sins inherited by eating from the tree of knowledge, rendering us all totally depraved and nothing more than poor, crawling, abject serfs of hell and damnation. But hark! Man surely is destined for something nobler than this. He is fast becoming conscious of his true destination, and when once fully enshrouded with the knowledge of his own individual possibilities, he will, with roses of beauty strewed along his pathway, come forth redeemed, regenerated, clothed in the armor of right, truth, justice, and love, ever impelled onward by both the moral and natural forces of the world, breaking the fetters of death, and moving irresistibly on to a higher and holier plane of existence. Such is man's destiny.

While writing this I am under the shadows of the most gorgeous church edifice in this city, $200,000 being the cost of construction. It is of the Calvinistic type. Here the poor dupés of ignorance and faith are consecrated to the gods and taught the rudiments of hypocrisy at first cost, the priest being looked upon and believed to be one of God's go-betweens. Under this hallucination his credulous subjects are year after year held in mental bondage and made to believe that his vicegerency really consists in taking care of and having utter control of their souls' salvation. Every Sunday morning I hear the echoes of his voice proclaiming the teachings of old Moses and St. Paul thousands of years ago, which is not worthy of the consideration of an intelligent being. It is only where ignorance and superstition predominate over reason that these teachings of a rude, barbaric age are soberly listened to or believed in. This city is a priest-ridden one, although it has one Universalist church, which I hope is in a prosperous condition, its God being a gentleman in comparison to the orthodox God. The people of the Universalist God are, as a rule, quite plainly to be seen drifting into Liberalism. I hav respect for that people and their God, as I believe them to be enemies of orthodoxy.

So priest-ridden are we here that we hav six gorgeous God-worshiping temples, those of lesser importance thrown in, one mammoth Calvanistic institute for the turning out of Presbyterian ministers, and a counterpart of Comstock's Christian Association. All these we hav to save man's depraved soul from hell, but not even a fire alarm bell to save the city of 22,000 souls from a disastrous conflagration. Should we be some day swept out of existence by the fire-fiend the clergy would proclaim aloud that it was a condemnation brought upon us by providence for not being more imbued with the spirit of the Holy Ghost, irresistible grace, and predestination, thus allowing orthodoxy to come to a "standstill," and overtaken by heresy in which slumbers not only the deathknell of the former, but man's future happiness accompanied with the many possibilities of his individuality. The state prison is another institution, needed for the suppression of crime, but in which there is no need of a chaplain at the expense of the state to dispense the teachings of theology to a class of criminals. Who ever heard of a convict leaving prison after being "nurtured in the admonition of the Lord," even for a long term of years, that did not in a majority of cases turn around and commit some offense? The statistics show that a very large majority of all criminals hav had a theological training forced upon them in their youth. Their souls' salvation received all the priests' attention, their minds none. Had they been first taught morality, and been the recipients of a thorough secular education, been taught the laws of the land and to obey them, thereby becoming good citizens, invested with the profound truths of Science and nature's laws by which the universe is governed, in contradistinction to the gross fallacies and debaucheries of theology, had placed before them the lives and characters of Bruno, Copernicus, Kepler, Newton, Paine, and many more of that class, instead of the lives and characters of saints and the conflicting stories of the crucifixion, been taught to study the realities of this world rather than the wild vagaries of "the world to come," that knowledge is heaven, ignorance hell, there would be no gloomy prisons to cast their shadows over the earth, no criminals to disgrace the name of humanity.

Your letter accompanied with copy of the symbol of cordial sympathy and brotherly love at the hands of the National Secular Society of England was duly received and noted. I could not be with you New York Liberals at the celebration of the 144th anniversary of the author of our American Independence; however, I was with you in spirit. My library contains his great works complete, my parlor walls his life-size steel engraving encased in a beautiful heavy gilt frame. All hail to the life and services of Thomas Paine and the cause of Liberalism!

Our New Book.

[From the Banner of Light.]

AN INFIDEL ABROAD. A Series of Letters written while on a Ten Weeks' Visit to Europe. By D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. New York: Liberal and Scientific Publishing House, 141 Eighth street.

It having been decided to hold an International Congress of Freethinkers at Brussels, in August last, the friends of Mr. Bennett desired him to attend it as their representativ, and proposed to furnish a portion of the funds requisit for that purpose. This was especially pleasing to Mr. Bennett. He had always had a desire to visit Europe, and the favorable opportunity now presented itself. The results of his observations during his sojourn in Europe are given in this volume, and one may be assured that it differs in so many respects from previous accounts of travels that, even to one familiar with the subjects treated upon, it will be new and refreshing reading. Mr. Bennett invests everything with a new interest from the fact that he does not feel obliged to bow down at every shrine, take off his hat to every reputed holy man or place, or do homage with his lips to what his reason tells him is not worthy of it. Again, he calls things by their right names, and recognizes a wrong in the extravagances of church organizations that adorn their temples with tinsel trumperies, while human beings in rags and tatters, famishing for food, sit at their porches, begging for the common necessities of life. The book will giv a better idea of every-day life in Europe than any similar volume that has come to our notice.

[From Truth.]

This volume of 800 pages is made up of a series of letters originally published in THE TRUTH SEEKER. The writer was a delegate to the International Congress of Freethinkers, held in Brussels last summer, and these letters are an account of his experience from the time he left the dock in New York until the vessel on which he returned was moored at it again.
